In a vast, unpopulated country like Venezuela the question of getting rid of guerrillas in certain cases is a different problem, because of the immensity of the forests and plains where they hide themselves. With respect to this, it is worth while to recollect an interesting incident of our history. The war of independence having been terminated, certain marauding bands of guerrillas continued in existence, and among them a band by the name of "Cisneros;" in vain it was pursued; it always escaped. In this state of affairs the President of the Republic, General Páez, resolved to go in person, and an interview was proposed in a forest. Cisneros answered that he would be alone in his den, and Páez went; there the bandit had everything ready to shoot him and drew up his forces and said to Páez that he (Páez) should give the order to fire; the extreme calmness of Páez saved him, and the bandit submitted himself to the authority of the Government.

In order that the revolutionary question might arise it would be necessary that the claimant should have proof (since it is a principle of law that the burden of proof rests upon the one who sets up the fact) that these guerrillas were regular forces of the revolution, as the German Commissioner himself desired that Ermen should prove. But regular forces are only those who are subject to the orders of the chiefs of the revolutionary movement. When this fact has been proven, then in reality the question arises whether the Government is or is not liable for acts of revolutionists, and until then it seems to me that we are within the domain of common law and of ordinary punishment.

The principle of the liability of the state with respect to damages is, in the opinion of the authors (see Pradier-Fodéré), within the rule of common law that everyone is liable for his acts and those of his subordinates. But as the juridic organization of the state is complex and its acts must be governed by many political economic relations, etc., this principle must be restricted with respect to it. In Venezuela, for example, article 9, law of 1873 (Seijas, vol. 1, p. 57) says—

That it can not be contended that the nation should make indemnity for damages and injuries or confiscations which have not been committed by legitimate authorities acting in their public capacity.

The Government is therefore not liable unless it be proved that the authorities committed the injury acting in their public capacity. (See art. 11 of the decree of June 9, 1893, Official Compilation, vol. 16, p. 544.)

The protocol of February appears to have wished to abolish just this distinction, and thereby violence committed by the forces of the Government, which took advantage of their position, it appears to me, involve the liability of the Government.

In the question of a revolution it appears that, according to these same principles, the government is not and can not be liable for acts which are not its own but those of persons occasionally outside the pale of its authority. The rule, therefore, is the nonliability of the government. (See Seijas, vol. 1, p. 50.) This liability may in law be established according to the doctrines of some countries if it is shown that the state is negligent or blamable in a concrete case for not having furnished timely protection. But this is an exception, by virtue of which in judging the case only the negligence or culpability charged can be considered.

The German Commissioner is of opinion that the protocol of Washington has derogated these principles of the law of nations with respect to Venezuela, but such a thing does not appear. If it had been intended to make such a declaration of exception it would have been essential to state it clearly, and it is a fundamental principle of interpretation that the clauses making exceptions should be interpreted restrictively. Besides, article III of the treaty provides that the Commission must decide if the damage or seizure were unjust, and, in accordance with the principles of international law, it can not be said that the acts of the rebels were just or unjust. This is said of the acts of governments.

With respect to persons who are not the legitimate authorities there exists in Venezuela the right of direct action against them for the damages caused, as also for crimes committed—an action which those who have been injured may institute by appearing before the civil or criminal judge, according as the fact is or the relief which the claimant seeks. Article 11 of the law of 1873 says:

Everyone who, having no public capacity, may decree contributions or forced loans, or commit acts of spoliation of whatever nature, as well as those who execute them, shall be liable, directly and personally with their property, to the injured person. (See Seijas, vol. 1, p. 57.)

The executive power is not to intervene in this proceeding and would only be liable if they demanded justice before the judge which should have been impossible for a person to obtain on account of fraud, that is to say, the denial of justice. The law of Venezuela in these matters has its importance, since it is a principle of international law, as I understand, that the foreigner has no greater right than which is granted to nationals, and it is worthy of note that Venezuela does not concede to Venezuelans the right to indemnity for damages committed by the revolution.

The Commissioner of Germany states that Germany is making no special contention, according to the interpretation which he gives to the protocol and the protocols of England and Italy; but I object, for it does not appear that those protocols were interpreted in the manner which he alleges. And nothing appears in the convention of France, and, as that of Paris, payment is to be made in diplomatic debt, not in gold, and there are other reasons or special advantages for Venezuela. The Venezuelan Commissioner might have had sufficient reasons for judging and determining in a different manner, if he did so (which I do not know); or rather to present the questions and their proceedings in other forms. With respect to the United States, I do not know that demands are made on Venezuela such as the demand of the Commissioner of Germany, and I believe that there will not be any such, bearing in mind the doctrine professed by that country. And since the United States and Spain, as well as other nations, share in the division of the 30 per cent pro rata, I do not understand how one nation can ask more than other nations, since the nations that did not join in the blockade did not insert the third clause, which, interpreted in the form the German Commissioner desires, would be a cause of preference. I consider that they did not believe that this article had such a meaning.

The German Commissioner then enters into considerations of a political nature with reference to Venezuela in order to justify his doctrine. These considerations are so devoid of international equity and contain such strong statements against my country that I prefer to abstain from answering them as they deserve, leaving them to the consideration of the umpire and making only a few concise remarks. If the Commission decides in accordance with the principles which I maintain it will do nothing but keep to the doctrine which, up to now, civilized nations and writers of public law have professed. I do not see why it should be charged with liability before history because it does not care to submit Venezuela to the special theories of the Commissioner of Germany.

The Germans then would enjoy, as they have been enjoying, more guaranties than those which the Venezuelans have. I say more guaranties, since, if they preserve their neutrality, they will only be molested occasionally. I shall ask, in my turn, if Venezuela has agreed to establish a mixed commission, and that commission has been established in order to judge in conformity with the principles of equity, what will history say if that commission, because of capricious reasons of a political order, should sanction principles contrary to the law of nations in order to apply them to Venezuela? Will it not say that it has disregarded its trust?

To the sketch which the Commissioner of Germany has made, supposing that the Venezuelans are enriching themselves at the cost of the Germans, I am going to oppose a parallel one. A civil war arises in Venezuela; the Venezuelan, more or less involved in the political strife, fears for his property, and if he has cattle or valuables in an insecure place he wishes to rid himself of them; but this operation is not easy. Then appears the neutral, the foreigner, especially those who by occupation are mere merchants, indifferent to the politics of the country. This latter, who solely thinks of his business, shielded by this especially favorable opportunity, realizes the profit in the negotiation, and obtains everything at a low price. Or even more, the same person has no resources, but he has the advantage that he is a foreigner. He insinuates to the Venezuelan that the goods should be placed in his name, and thereby he obtains an advantage; if the goods are lost, he will certainly make an advantageous claim. Or in the midst of the conflict he will be the manager and partner of him who by violence may be able to take possession of the property of others, and by insatiable greed he will institute its destruction, and later, if he be the victim of the natural redress and should suffer the consequence of his acts, he will make there, in the interior of the country, with four witnesses at his command, a proof of violence, and who shall discover the truth? Nevertheless, it is not impossible that some time the corner of the veil which covers these things may be lifted, and it may well serve as an index of what may happen in the case of Otto Redler & Co. (Considerations like these can be found in Pradier-Fodéré). I do not attempt to make a charge against the claimants, nor a general observation concerning them; I speak of what at times happens.

As an opportune observation, it is well to note that the commerce of Venezuela has generally been carried on by Germans and they have entered into the country, driving out the Venezuelans who theretofore carried on this industry. Is not this the reason why the Venezuelans rob them?

The Commission says the convention of Washington shall proceed upon a basis of absolute equity, and if we adhere to this we must decide against the doctrine of the German Commissioner, returning his own argument, that it is not just to demand the same liability of a state of a political organization which is in a certain manner incomplete, as from another which, to its praise, has enjoyed a solid constitution. The man who comes to the United States, for example, has a right to expect more from that Government than the immigrant who comes to these countries whose historical condition is still that of political disturbances, and therefore if the liability is not to be equal the advantage must be with us. Liability is in direct proportion to capacity.

I repeat, and I desire that the umpire shall carefully investigate, this final portion of my opinion to which the absolute necessity of defense urges me, and remember that I would have desired to keep the discussion upon a more elevated plane.

The Commissioner of Germany says that amnesty in Venezuela frequently shields the acts of revolutionists, and it is natural, therefore, that the Government should be held liable for acts done by them. The honorable Commissioner is in error; amnesty only shields political crimes, but with respect to the liability at common law that a rebel might have incurred a perfect right of civil or criminal action against him remains to the injured party. This results from the general spirit of our laws.

I seek the truth loyally, and I do not attempt to deny the obligations contracted by Venezuela. The umpire will consider and decide in his high sense of equity, and I will conform my conduct to his judgment.

I am of opinion that the claim of Kummerow should be disallowed.

[OTTO REDLER & CO. CASE.]

GOETSCH, Commissioner:

The claim of Redler & Co. is composed of three parts.

I. A claim for 7,647.68 bolivars. This sum was admitted by the Government of General Crespo, after his rise to the constitutional presidency of the Republic, as appears from document No. 1 (decree of the National Executive, signed Velutini). The recognition was published in the Official Gazette, No. 7147, of October 23, 1897. The recognition took place by virtue of a decree of June 9, 1893. It has emanated, therefore, from a legal act of Venezuela. This constitutes, according to the opinion of the German Commissioner, a final adjudication, coupled with the circumstance that Venezuela has not paid up to the present. It is not for the Mixed Commission to examine this decision, nor to seek the origin of this debt; and still less to declare the determination of that Government without force. This would be equivalent to annulling the decree of June 9, 1903, which could not pertain to the jurisdiction of the Commission.

After the Government of General Crespo had become established in a legal and constitutional character, it acquired the right, not only by the constitution of Venezuela, but also by the laws of nations, to adjust, by means of legislation, the claims arising out of the revolution. This right has not been disputed by governments subsequent to that of Crespo, and therefore they have recognized the decree and they have also issued similar decrees. If the German-Venezuelan Commission should alter the decree, it would intervene in the order of things legally constituted and would exceed its powers and create a disastrous juridic conflict.

A decree issued at a later date, in consideration of the financial situation of Venezuela, by which only the payment to the creditors of 15 per cent upon their claims is ordered, in no way impairs the legal right which the claimant has, since the debtor—in this case the Venezuelan nation—has no right to reduce at its discretion claims which have been recognized, to the injury of the creditor. Thus, the claimant has shown in a credible manner, in his letter of June 18 of the present year, that, notwithstanding his repeated attempts and owing to the revolution which afterwards arose against General Andrade, he could not obtain the payment of his recognized claim.

The claim of 7,647.68 bolivars appears, therefore, to be justified, as also the 6 per cent interest, counting from the 7th of October, 1893, the date of its presentation to the Commission, which then had jurisdiction, until the payment of the debt.

II. The second claim amounts to 3,732 bolivars. The juridic foundations which support this claim are the same as those in Case I, with the difference that there is no question of res judicata. But the claimant having presented his demand at a proper time, it is the fault of the Government then existing that until now no determination in the matter has been reached.

It is for the Venezuelan-German Commission to make satisfaction for the omission. The decree issued by the Government of General Crespo should serve as a guide which permits the determination of the claim. The amount of the claim, 3,732 bolivars, not having been disputed, and the legal relation being the same as that in Claim I, the demand should be allowed, including interest at 6 per cent annually, beginning with January 28, 1893, until the complete extinguishment of the debt.

III. The third claim amounts to 9,932.88 bolivars. Neither the agent of the Government of Venezuela nor the Venezuelan Commissioner disputes the amount of this claim. On the other hand, they deny to claimant, as they do also with respect to claims I and II, the right to present his claims before the Mixed Commission, arguing that because of active participation in the revolution of 1892—that is to say, ten years ago—he has violated his neutrality, and has thereby lost his right to be protected by the German Government.

In the first place, the German Commissioner notes the lack of strict proof to sustain the objection that the claimant had violated his neutrality in 1892. Mr. Redler has never acknowledged that he knew that the merchandise sold by him was destined to aid the revolution. The sale was made to individuals. With respect to the sale to Ysava, it was only afterwards that the vendor learned that the merchandise was destined for General Crespo. (See letter of Redler, dated June 15, 1903.) In the second case also the sale was made to an individual. The circumstance that he made demand then upon Carlos Herrera for payment proves the good faith of Redler. (See letter of Redler, June 15, 1903.) In this case also he learned later that the merchandise was for Crespo, for which reason his demand was rejected, and he was compelled to address himself to the Government. But even in the supposition, which is denied, that Redler did not observe the necessary caution, and has failed to observe the neutrality imposed on foreigners, the following observations should be taken into consideration:

The Government of that time would have had to submit Redler to trial and to demand an account of his actions. This has not been done. Moreover, the revolution succeeded and assumed the power. Afterwards amnesty was decreed and put into effect in favor of all the individuals and in relation to all the acts connected in any way with the revolution—a logical attitude, since the triumphant revolutionists could hardly impose punishment upon themselves. The decree of Crespo, dated June 9, 1893, by which all the claims of persons who had furnished aid and support to the revolution are recognized, gave legal expression to the foregoing conclusion.

A similar state of things exists now. All the persons who cooperated in the triumph of General Castro also resisted the laws of the country; but lawfully they must be considered as pardoned, for General Castro had legally attained the constitutional Presidency of the Republic. Thereby Redler, in consequence of the effective and legal amnesty, can not have lost his right to claim before a mixed commission. Moreover, ten years have passed since the pretended violation of neutrality. Therefore the offense made should be considered pardoned, and with it all the consequences which might have been derived therefrom disappear as the general principles of law provide.

It seems absurd to the German Commissioner to contend that the Commission should fulfill the office of a Venezuelan judge, imposing fines upon Mr. Redler for an action which took place ten years ago, and which in general has been wiped out by amnesty.

With reference to the third claim, it is also asked that Mr. Redler be allowed the sum of 9,932.88 bolivars, together with interest at 6 per cent, commencing from the 11th of August, 1902 (the report of the judge of Barquisimeto to the attorney-general of the State), until the extinguishment of the debt. The reasons which impose liability upon the Government of Venezuela in principle in the case have already been set forth in the claim of Kummerow. Reference is made to them.<sup>a</sup>

ZULOAGA, Commissioner:

Otto Redler & Co. claim (1) 7,647.68 bolivars, the value of the munitions of war furnished the revolution in 1892 upon the western coast, near Puerto Cabello. In the proof which they present General Mora says that this is proven by the account which was presented to him with the approval, at the foot, of the gentlemen who composed the revolutionary committee. This sum was acknowledged to be due by the Government and was to be paid in debt of the revolution. They claim, moreover, 3,732 bolivars as a balance of the price of supplies of war furnished also to the revolution in 1892, as appears from the receipt of the revolutionary committee, which is produced in copy. As appears from the receipts presented, Messrs. Redler & Co. were revolutionists in 1892, since they furnished munitions of war to the revolutionary parties.

The revolution in 1892 was successful, and the Government paid those who aided its cause (as Redler & Co.) with bonds of the revolution. In the Official Gazette, No. 7147, of October 23, 1897, which they cite, it appears that the bonds that belonged to them were at their disposal, because of the credit which had been recognized. From the moment that the claimants intervened in the revolution of the country they lost their neutrality and the right of diplomatic protection of their Government. This is a principle of international equity generally accepted. And it is, moreover, singular that protection to recover the value of munitions of war furnished revolutionists and to compel them to be paid for under more favorable conditions than the other aiders of the revolution.

The claimants, in their new application which they make, assert that they sold those supplies, some to Casimiro Ysava, who paid for them partly in cash, which is false, since in the certificate of the company it is said that the supplies were furnished to the revolution on the 20th of June and that a sum on account was paid on the 23d of June, three days after the sale. Carlos Herrera, from information which I have received (I do not assert it), appears to be an individual who at that time had been at arms against the Government. The explanation which the claimants make, even if it were true, would not in any way change the situation, since they themselves say that their credits are for supplies to the revolutionists.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the case of the two credits claimed ought to be disallowed and that, it appearing from them that Otto Redler & Co. had interfered in the political strifes of the country, the other claim referring to the sacking of their house in Barquisimeto ought not to be considered, because they lost their neutrality which gives them the right to claim before this Mixed Commission. It would be impossible to acknowledge the right to recover in persons who take part in the politics of the country if the violences which they suffer are unjust or the work of just retaliation on account of their partial conduct.

P. S.—I disallow these claims in the first place because I believe that there can not be admitted to Redler & Co. the right to present them, having lost their neutrality, against the claim of Barquisimeto. In case Redler had not lost that neutrality, the reasons set up by the agent of Venezuela and the general principle that it was an act of the revolution would prevail.

I do not find that the theory of amnesty is in any way applicable to this matter.

[FULDA CASE.]

GOETSCH, Commissioner:

From the evidence it is proved that the claimant has suffered damages amounting to 5,000 bolivars occasioned by revolutionists. Neither the fact nor the amount of the damage have been disputed by the agent of the Government of Venezuela.

The German Commissioner is of the same opinion as before and refers to his opinion in the other claims, to the effect that Venezuela ought to repair the damage without considering whether or not it could have been avoided.

The agent of the Government of Venezuela objects that the Government was unable to protect Mr. Fulda against the injury of the revolutionists because this took place during the course of an international conflict; but with respect to this proofs have not been produced nor obtained.

The warlike attitude of the allies limited itself, as is well known, to the seizure of the Venezuelan ships to maintain an effective blockade of the ports of Venezuela without any resistance on the part of the latter. Therefore it is not seen why the state was prevented from properly protecting the resident foreigners in the interior where warlike action on the part of the allies was not conducted, not even expected.

Now, if what is proposed with reference to the international conflict is to assert that the subjects of the State which finds itself at war with Venezuela can be deprived with impunity of their property so long as the war endures, this would be a doctrine which would be in conflict with the principles of the law of nations, as well as against those of civilized humanity.

The German Commissioner asks that the demand of Mr. Fulda for an indemnity amounting to 5,000 bolivars be allowed with interest at 6 per cent annually from the day upon which the injury was committed until the complete extinguishment of the debt.

GOETSCH, Commissioner (second opinion):

The umpire of the German and Venezuelan Commissions, the honorable General Duffield, desires to know the opinion of the Commissioners on the following questions growing out of the claims above mentioned:

I. Is it admissible that the liability of the Government of Venezuela should be limited to damages occasioned by revolutionists in such cases as the Government of Venezuela was able to prevent the damages and did not do so?

II. In case of an affirmative answer to the question contained in No. I, is it for the Government or claimant to furnish the proof that the Government was capable of preventing the injuries and did not do so?

The German Commissioner answers the question I negatively. Bearing in mind the clear provisions of the protocol of February 13 of the present year, he does not hesitate in saying, as his personal and juridic opinion, that in case the Commission should reach a contrary decision it might perchance be considered in contradiction to the terms and spirit of the treaty. Besides, in order to better sustain his opinion, he makes reference to the judgments before cited, of prior international commissions, in the judgments of which the culpability of the Government in no way entered. (See seizure of an American ship by Venezuelan revolutionists, Moore, 1693-1732; the case of Easton, Moore, 1629-30; and the seizure of the American ship Montijo by Colombian revolutionists, Moore, p. 1421.) In the last case cited it was said:

The first duty of every Government is to make itself respected both at home and abroad. If it does not do so, even if by no fault of its own, it must make the only amends in its power, viz, compensate the sufferer.

Besides, after this matter has been settled in the French Commission in favor of the French claimants, the German Commissioner, by virtue of the right of the most-favored nation, ought to insist energetically that the German claimants should not be treated worse than the French claimants, or than the American claimants have been in former cases. Do not equity and justice demand that all foreigners, so long as their governments insist upon it, should be treated alike in Venezuela?

II. If, notwithstanding all this, the honorable umpire should arrive at the conclusion that the question of blame is decisive of the case, the German Commissioner is of opinion that the burden of presenting proofs as to the lack of negligence falls on the Government. The German Commissioner agrees with the honorable umpire in the interpretation, which he has occasionally given orally, that in a constitutional state—and he desires to consider Venezuela as such—the ability of protecting its inhabitants is presupposed.

Besides this, it ought to be considered as an obligation that international law imposes upon all civilized nations, to offer protection to foreigners—an obligation from which Venezuela can not escape. All the less, since by the law of May 14, 1869, she has invited foreigners “to embark their capital and skill in Venezuelan commerce.” (Moore, p. 1702.) From the obligation of furnishing protection springs the obligation of freeing itself from blame in case protection in a particular case was not possible.

In the oral discussion of the question the Venezuelan Commissioner set up the analogy of the civil law and deduced therefrom that the introduction of proofs belonged to the party demanding anything—that is to say, to the claimant. But there also exist in civil law “presumptions of law,” which shift the burden of proof (pater est quem justæ nuptiæ demonstrant). The responsibility of railroad companies, etc). According to this, presumption of international law should take the place of proof, or, what would be the same thing, the Venezuelan Government should only be able to avoid the liability by the production of counter proof. This in every case would be in accord with the protocol.

He who has recognized in principle his “liability” in cases of confiscation of or injury to property and wishes to free himself from the liability, conventionally assumed, is at least under the obligation to prove facts which would free him from such liability. Besides this, there is the following: The claimant would almost always be unable to present proofs that the Government could have protected him. He does not know the tactical and strategic dispositions and intentions of the Government, and as the peaceful citizen, in the generality of cases, he will not be able to know the objects, management, and movements of the revolutionary troops. On the other hand, it is easy for the Government to show in a particular case why a village should have to be abandoned to the revolution, or the troops and the police of the Government had to be withdrawn from it. Therefore it is equity which places the burden of proof upon the Government.

ZULOAGA, Commissioner:

I believe that the claim ought to be disallowed, because of the reasons set forth by the agent of Venezuela. The Commissioner of Germany says that it is well known that the warlike attitude of the allies was limited, after having made capture of the Venezuelan vessels, to making the blockade effective. It is also well known that General Castro, President of the Republic, had completely conquered the revolution in the action at La Victoria; that immediately, therefore, in order to be able to dispose of the remainder of the revolutionary armies, he divided the forces of the Government, sending a part to the east in order to stop the passage of General Rolando, who was marching toward that place, and another to the west in order to quickly overtake the rebels, Matos, Riera, and others; that in this state of things the international conflict arose and the Government prevented, on account of the losses of its ships, from concentrating its forces, Rolando was able to rally in the central region, and even to menace the capital, since the army of the Government had to go overland by forced marches for a great distance.

The Government did at that time everything that was reasonably possible to put a stop to the revolution, as well in a military manner as politically. If the international conflict had not arisen, very probably the revolution would have terminated last year.

The imputation which the Commissioner of Germany casts upon the honorable agent of Venezuela, that the latter might assert that subjects of a state which were not at war with Venezuela might be deprived of their property with impunity, is an uncalled-for accusation, since from the words of the agent of Venezuela it is not possible to loyally deduce what the Commissioner seeks to charge him with. This language of the Commissioner is very poorly suited to facilitating the labors of this Commission. I am of opinion that the claim of Fulda ought to be disallowed.

ZULOAGA, Commissioner (second opinion):

The Government is not liable to individuals for the damages which insurgents, revolutionists, or people in revolt, in whatever manner against the constituted authority may cause.

The Government should furnish protection and security, but it is in so far as the means at its disposition and the circumstances under which the acts have been committed permit. And the causes which may make a government more or less culpable are so many and so different that it would be impossible even to form general ideas about the matter. Besides, the circumstances which control in a disturbed society are so complex that it is a question of political tact, which is only exceptionally found in men of the government.

Extreme energy and implacable repression are at times the greatest errors and serve only to foster insurrection. Revolutions are not always occasioned by faults or errors of the Government or by the simple rebellious spirit of the revolutionists. They follow multiple causes, and not seldom upon the political horizon the cloud of revolution is seen and condenses itself without the patriotism of the best citizens of the Government or of the opposition being sufficient to restrain its violent effects, they having their source in such profound economic or political causes.

Europe itself, so proud to-day of the internal peace which its states have been happy to preserve during the second half of the past century, notwithstanding the powerful organization of its governments, with dread, to say the least, how each day the social revolution grows to which the entire working masses are affiliating themselves.

Governments are constituted to furnish protection, but not to guarantee it, and it is absolutely impossible that a tribunal such as this should undertake to investigate the causes of an injury upon general principles of internal politics, under the penalty of finally constituting itself as a judge, not of the cases for damages submitted to it, but of the Government or of the country itself, which would be an act of intervention contrary to the principles recognized by all states.

Nevertheless some governments and authorities maintain that for certain particular acts, taking into consideration the circumstances of the case, liability may be fastened upon the state for damages which an individual may suffer, if the facts show in a clear and evident manner that the state has been negligent in every way, in furnishing protection which he ought reasonably to expect from it. According to this theory the state is not liable because of want of protection, but for such culpable and grave negligence, which is equivalent to its own acts against private property.

He therefore who seeks to recover from a state for damages suffered under those conditions, in order that his action may prevail, has to prove (1) that he has suffered the damage and (2) that the state is in a certain manner liable for its negligence in the concrete case.

This is the doctrine of Fiore. He says:

It is not sufficient that a state should prove that it has suffered an injury resulting from an act of individuals who reside in another state in order to fasten the liability upon the latter, and to oblige it to make reparation; it is necessary that it prove that the prejudicial act is morally chargeable to the other state, or that that state ought or could have prevented it, and that voluntarily it has been negligent in doing so.<sup>a</sup>

But this is nothing except the application of the principles of common law that the burden of proof is upon the claimant.

In the application of these principles of indirect liability it is necessary to bear in mind that the government of a country during times of war finds itself confronted with greater difficulties and problems than in times of peace, and its special attention must be directed first to the reestablishment of the disturbed peace, and that liability is in direct proportion to capacity.

Fiore, speaking of neutrality, says:

The incapacity of a neutral state to prevent the violation of the duties of neutrality also excludes the liability of the Government, and therefore the right of the belligerent to consider the neutral state as liable by reason of the violation of the duties of neutrality.<sup>b</sup>

If this rule was concisely expressed concerning neutrality where the obligations of neutral governments are in a certain manner direct, what shall we say if in the case under consideration there is a question of the internal management of a state? This principle of the liability of a state for negligence would have to be further modified by the one which provides that foreigners can not assert more right in the territory than that which nationals may possess, and by the law of Venezuela the state is not liable for revolutionary damages.

Putting aside all this discussion and the principles of international law to which the necessity of interpreting the meaning of certain provisions of the protocol of Washington has brought us, and confining ourselves solely within the scope of absolute equity, I ask, would it be equitable that foreigners who live in the territory of Venezuela should withdraw themselves from the political conditions of the country, and that in advantage over the Venezuelans they should not only obtain an indemnity from the Government for damages which the latter might have caused them, but also for the damages of revolutionists, against whom the Government has had to contend and against whom it has had to employ all its energy and money and sacrifice the lives of not a few Venezuelans? Would it be equitable that between a Venezuelan and a foreigner the first might say: "My home is in mourning, since beloved members of my family have died in the defense of the Government and the constituted authorities; my ruin has been consummated, since I have not been able to carry on my business, or I have been the victim of passions of its opponents, because I have resisted them," and that the foreigner should say: "But I lose nothing, and I live in this community which is in conflict just as if in the best of times. I do not defend the Government, I am not under this obligation, but the Government pays me not only for the injury which it may cause me, but also for the injuries which its opponents occasion." I believe that in equity the claims of Kummerow and F. L. Fulda can not be admitted.

[FISCHBACH AND FRIEDERICY CASES.]

GOETSCH, Commissioner:

Various witnesses testify that both claimants were taken prisoners on October 20, 1902, near Carúpano by a revolutionary detachment, with the intention of taking money from them, and that to this end they were insulted, assaulted, robbed, bound to a post, threatened with death, and thrown into a house infected by smallpox, in order that the payment of the sum demanded might be accomplished. The claimants demand for this treatment an indemnity, to which Friedericy especially adds the injury resulting in a rupture caused by the tying and other ill treatment to which he was subjected. The detachment in question was commanded by two officers, Gutierrez and Gonzalez, and was distinguished, as one of the claimants states, by a white design with black letters thus: "Libertador Army." This proves that the authors were regular troops of the revolution, and not merely marauders or robbers. Both Commissioners ask the honorable umpire to decide for the present, in principle only, the question whether the Government of Venezuela is obliged to pay to the two claimants an indemnity for the ill treatment suffered. The question of the amount of this indemnity will be a matter for future consideration. It is recognized by the law of nations, and also it has been adjudged by international commissions of arbitration, that States may make themselves liable for the unlawful ill treatment and imprisonment of foreign subjects, and that they are obliged to pay a proportional indemnity. Thus it happened in the case of Col. Lloyd Aspinwall. "Something would seem to be due to the crew of the vessel as indemnification for ill treatment, as it were." (Moore, History and Digest, pp. 1015 and 1016.) (See also page 1171, Henry Dubo's claim for illegal arrest and imprisonment; also page 1579, the Santos case; 1653, No. 15, Charles Weile; page 1852, Van Bokkelen; see also page 1714 and page 1724, the arrest of the crew of the Venezuelan Steam Transportation Company.)

It is undoubted that the liability extends to the arrest and ill treatment suffered at the hands of the officials of the Government; but the liability might also be extended to the hands of officials or revolutionary troops.

The principles of international law and those derived from other sources which imply liability in cases of confiscation or damage of property by officers or troops of the revolution that have been already discussed in detail with respect to the claim of Kummerow I refer to said opinion.

These principles fix also the liability in cases of acts executed against the liberty and health of a person, inasmuch as these are properties more precious than material or monetary ones. Likewise, every Government is obliged to furnish protection to foreigners, whose liberty it ought to guarantee. By not doing so it makes itself liable and should make reparation to the person injured. (See Moore, p. 1444, and the Panama riot, p. 1362.) Neither the Government of Venezuela nor that of the revolution has instituted any sort of proceedings against the officials named and the detachment under their command in order to chastise them for the barbarous ill treatment and tying of which they made German subjects the victims. If with reference to this representation before the Government in Caracas it had been attempted, no other result would have been obtained than the statement that the Government had lost control in the neighborhood of Carúpano. In the claim of the Venezuela Steam Transportation Company, an indemnity was allowed by the Commission, at the solicitation of the Government of the United States of America, to the American sailors imprisoned by Venezuelan revolutionists. (Moore, History and Digest, p. 1714-1724.) The honorable umpire is therefore asked to declare in principle the liability of Venezuela in the present case also.

In any case the Government of Venezuela would be liable for the articles stolen, in accordance with article 3 of the protocol.

ZULOAGA, Commissioner:

The claims of Friedericy and Max Fischbach are founded, as they say, upon ill treatment which a revolutionary band inflicted upon them. Taking into consideration the facts, if they are proved, I find that they constitute a common injury received from a group of highway robbers, and I believe that the penalties of the case, as, for example, a fine, should be put into effect, but I do not understand why the act which constitutes the private wrong has to be gone into and pecuniary indemnity made by the State to the victims of the atrocity. There are precedents, it is true, of indemnities claimed diplomatically for unlawful seizures, but as far as I have been able to see they have been committed by authorities in violation of the laws, and in that case the State is liable because its officials are the wrongdoers—because the one who commits the violation of the law is charged with furnishing protection. From this to seek to make the State a sort of surety against every sort of wrongdoing which individuals suffer in its domains there appears to me to be some difference. These acts, as the claimant himself states, are committed by a band of revolutionists—that is to say, by men who proceed upon their own account, without any other rule than to take advantage of the disturbed situation of the country to commit their depredations. Revolutions or political disturbances and their natural consequence of insecurity and violence are social epochs which in general all countries have passed through and against which none can provide nor believe that it may withhold itself definitely, and it is inadmissible that a State should be made liable for private acts, only because of the fact that they are committed during a revolution. By the Venezuelan law a criminal suit can be instituted (1) if the judge has knowledge of the fact; (2) by a charge made by the party aggrieved; (3) by information of any citizen to the judge of the act committed. It is therefore in the hands of Friedericy and Fischbach to accomplish the punishment of the guilty parties.

DUFFIELD, Umpire:

The Commissioners disagree as to the liability of Venezuela under the protocol for acts of revolutionists in the recent civil war, and as to the responsibility of Venezuela for wrongful seizures of or injuries to property.

The Commissioner for Germany is of the opinion that under Articles I and III of the protocol of the 13th of February the Venezuelan Government is liable in these cases, because of the admission of liability of the Venezuelan Government in those articles, and also upon general principles of international law.

The Commissioner for Venezuela disagrees with the Commissioner for Germany, and is of the opinion that Article III of the protocol contains nothing which differs from the rules—that nations have laid down in general as established in this connection, but is only a confirmation of those principles, with the intention at most, of contradicting the doctrine of absolute irresponsibility of governments in civil wars as held by many governments and sustained by international authorities.

He also is of the opinion that Article I of the protocol, in which the Government of Venezuela acknowledges in principle the justice of the claims of German subjects presented by the Imperial German Government—refers to the claims already [then] presented, which are those of which Article II of the protocol treats, claims which the Government of Venezuela held were, in general, entirely unjustified.

It is insisted by the Commissioner for Germany that because of the admission made by the Venezuelan Commissioner of the justice in principle of two claims heretofore submitted to the umpire based upon acts of revolutionists, and in which the Commissioners only disagreed upon the question of amount, that the principle must be considered as settled by the Government of Venezuela in this and all future cases coming before this Commission. The umpire agrees with this position of the Commissioner for Germany, in so far as the particular claims referred to are concerned. It has been held in former international commissions that there is no power vested in an umpire to grant a rehearing. In the present case the umpire is of the opinion that the true interpretation of the protocol does not authorize any rehearings, unless perhaps in extreme cases where the application is based upon newly discovered substantive and not cumulative evidence. He is unable, however, to go to the length urged by the Commissioner for Germany. It is undoubtedly true, as he says—that in the interest of unity of decisions of the Commission a question of law should not be decided in one way to-day and in another way to-morrow.

But, as the Venezuelan Commissioner frankly says in his opinion in one of said former claims—although I have accepted the claim in principle, a better study of the matter has convinced me that it is an error, and that the principles which are to govern me are those which appear in my opinion in the matter of Kummerow (claim No. 7), in which he says—

I confess that my first impression upon reading it (Article III of the protocol) was one of extreme perplexity and uncertainty, but a more careful study of the matter convinced me that it could in no way contain a rule of exception which goes so far as to make the Government responsible for every injury done a German, the umpire is of the opinion that it is not only the privilege but the duty of the Commissioner for Venezuela to present his more carefully studied opinion on the question, the more so because the first impression of the umpire upon reading it "was one of extreme perplexity and uncertainty," and because the question is complicated and not readily solved. Moreover, the question is one of great gravity and importance, and upon its correct decision will depend the allowance or disallowance of many claims involving in the aggregate a very large sum of money.

The disagreement between the commissioners is evidence that the language of the article appears to be susceptible of two contrary meanings, and in determining which is the correct construction regard must be had to the situation of the high contracting parties and the circumstances preceding and surrounding the execution of the protocol. (Opinion of Umpire Little in the United States and Venezuelan Commission, 1889 and 1890.) After a considerable period of diplomatic correspondence between the two Governments with reference to the claims of German subjects against the Republic of Venezuela, without reaching any agreement as to a satisfactory adjustment of the same, the German Government on the 7th day of December, 1902, submitted an ultimatum containing the following:

In addition, the manner in which the German claims arising from the wars have been treated by the Government of the Republic has led the Imperial Government to believe that the other credits also of her subjects against the Republic need her protection to obtain a just settlement. In that sense are to be considered the German claims arising from the present civil war, the credits of the German houses growing out of the construction of the slaughterhouse in Caracas, and the sums owing the Gran Ferrocarril de Venezuela for the interest and amortization of the bonds of the Venezuelan 5 per cent loan of 1896, which were delivered to it in the place of a guaranty of interest. Instructed by the Imperial Government, I must also ask the Venezuelan Government to immediately make a declaration to the effect that it recognizes in principle that these claims are well founded, and that it is ready to accept the decision of a mixed commission with the object of having them settled and assured in all their details. (P. 40 of Correspondence of the Department of Foreign Affairs of the United States of Venezuela, published under the authority of an executive decree of the Republic of Venezuela, December, 1902.)<sup>a</sup>

A similar position was taken by the other allied powers, and on the 9th day of December, 1902, the allied powers established the blockade of the ports of Venezuela and seized certain of her war vessels.

The protocols of February 13 and May 7, 1903, were entered into by the parties while the war vessels and ports of Venezuela were still in the control of the allied powers, and as the only amicable mode of raising the blockade and restoring peaceful relations between the respective Governments.

Soon after the institution of the blockade the Government requested Mr. Bowen, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States to Venezuela, who was also the temporary representative of British and German interests in Venezuela, to propose to Great Britain and Germany that the claims for alleged "damages and injuries to British and German subjects be submitted to arbitration." With the consent of his Government he was soon after appointed such arbitrator and mediator.

The ability and diplomacy with which he performed the duties of his office have resulted in the meeting now in Caracas of international arbitration commissions between Venezuela and ten of the principal nations of the world, to adjust amicably and according to the principles of justice and equity their conflicting claims; the most notable instance of international arbitration in the history of the world.

In the correspondence which took place during these negotiations the following statements by the representatives of the respective Governments are material:

To the request of the Government of Venezuela through Mr. Bowen, that those Governments would refer "the settlement of claims for alleged damages to the subjects of the two nations during the civil war" to arbitration (Mr. Bowen's pamphlet, Venezuelan Protocols, p. 2),<sup>a</sup> the Government of Great Britain and the German Government replied through the Secretary of State for the United States, December 22, 1902.<sup>b</sup>

His Majesty's Government have, in consultation with the German Government, taken into their careful consideration the proposal communicated by the United States Government at the instance of that of Venezuela. The proposal is as follows:

"That the present difficulty respecting the manner of settling claims for injuries to British and German subjects during the insurrection be submitted to arbitration. The scope and intention of this proposal would obviously require further explanation. Its effect would apparently be to refer to arbitration only such claims as had reference to injuries resulting from the recent insurrection. This formula would evidently include a part only of the claims put forward by the two Governments, and we are left in doubt as to the manner in which the remaining claims are to be dealt with. * * *

His Majesty's Government desire, moreover, to draw attention to the circumstances under which arbitration is now proposed to them. The Venezuelan Government have during the last six months had ample opportunities for submitting such a proposal. On July 29, and again on November 11, it was intimated to them in the clearest language that unless His Majesty's Government received satisfactory assurances from them, and unless some steps were taken to compensate the parties injured by their conduct, it would become necessary for His Majesty's Government to enforce their just demands. No attention was paid to these solemn warnings, and in consequence of the manner in which they were disregarded, His Majesty's Government found themselves reluctantly compelled to have recourse to the measures of coercion which are now in progress. His Majesty's Government have, moreover, already agreed that in the event of the Venezuelan Government making a declaration that they will recognize the principle of the justice of the British claims and that they will at once pay compensation in the shipping cases and in the cases where British subjects have been falsely imprisoned and maltreated, His Majesty's Government will be ready, so far as the remaining claims are concerned, to accept the decision of a mixed commission, which will determine the amount to be paid and the security to be given for payment. A corresponding intimation has been made by the German Government. This mode of procedure seemed to both Governments to provide a reasonable and adequate mode of disposing of their claims. They have, however, no objection to substitute for the special commission a reference to arbitration with certain essential reservations. These reservations are, so far as the British claims are concerned, as follows:

1. The claims, small as has already been already pointed out in pecuniary amount, arising out of the seizure and plundering of British vessels and outrages on their crews and the maltreatment and false imprisonment of British subjects, are not to be referred to arbitration.

2. In cases where the claims is for injury to, or wrongful seizure of, property the questions which the arbitrators will have to decide will only be (a) whether the injury took place and whether the sentence [seizure] was wrongful, and (b) if so, what amount of compensation is due. That in such cases a liability exists must be admitted in principle.

3. In the case of claims other than the above we are ready to accept arbitration without any reserve.

This was sent from Washington December 27, 1902, by cipher cable, and on the 31st of December, 1902, President Castro wrote to Mr. Bowen:<sup>a</sup>

I recognize in principle the claims which the allied powers have presented to Venezuela. They would already have been settled if it had not been that the civil war required all the attention and resources of the Government. To-day the Government bows to superior force, and desires to send Mr. Bowen to Washington at once to confer there with the representatives of the powers that have claims against Venezuela, in order to arrange either an immediate settlement of all the claims or the preliminaries for a reference to the tribunal of The Hague or to an American Republic to be selected by the allied powers and by the Government of Venezuela.

The reply of the German Government, through the United States ambassador at Berlin, to the Secretary of State, and by him to Mr. Bowen, on the date of January 6, 1903, stated among other things:<sup>b</sup>

The German Government learns with satisfaction that the Venezuelan Government has accepted its demands in principle. Before further negotiations can be undertaken with Venezuela, however, it seems necessary that the President of Venezuela should make a definite statement as to the unconditional acceptance of the three preliminary conditions set forth in the German memorandum of December 22, 1902.

On the following day President Castro wrote to Mr. Bowen:<sup>c</sup>

MR. MINISTER: The Venezuelan Government accepts the conditions of Great Britain and Germany; requests you to go immediately to Washington for the purpose of conferring there with the diplomatic representatives of Great Britain and Germany and with the diplomatic representatives of other nations that have claims against Venezuela, and to arrange either an immediate settlement of said claims or the preliminaries for submitting them to arbitration.

At the instance of the German Government Mr. Bowen, under his authority from Venezuela, signed the document of January 24, 1903, containing this language:<sup>d</sup>

II. All the other claims which have already been brought to the knowledge of the Venezuelan Government, in the ultimatum delivered by the imperial minister resident at Caracas—i. e., claims resulting from the present civil war, further claims resulting from the construction of the slaughterhouse at Caracas, as well as the claims of the German Great Venezuelan Railroad for the nonpayment of the guaranteed interest—are to be submitted to a mixed commission should an immediate settlement not be possible.

III. The said commission will have to decide both about the fact whether said claims are materially founded and about the manner in which they will have to be settled or which guaranty will have to be offered for their settlement. Inasmuch as these claims result from damages inflicted on property, or the illegal seizure of such property, the Venezuelan Government has to acknowledge its liability in principle, so that such liability in itself will not be an object of arbitration and the decision of the commission will only extend to the question whether the inflicting of damages or the seizure of such property was illegal. The commission will also have to fix the amount of indemnity.

From these documents it clearly appears that Germany and Great Britain insisted upon the admission of the justice in principle of the claims of their subjects already presented, and specifically demanded that in respect to claims for injuries to or wrongful seizures of property arising from the present civil war, * * * the questions which the arbitrators will have to decide will only be (a) whether the injury took place and whether the sentence [seizure] was wrongful, and (b) if so, what amount of compensation is due. That in such cases the liability exists must be admitted in principle. Three. In the case of claims other than the above we [they] are ready to accept arbitration without any reserve.

The result was the execution of the protocols of February 13 and May 7, 1903, under which this Commission is acting.

All of the protocols between Venezuela and the peace powers are in the same language, mutatis mutandis, as the United States protocol. (Note to the United States protocol in Mr. Bowen's pamphlet, p. 30.)<sup>a</sup>

It is therefore too plain to need argument that if any effect whatever is to be given to Articles I and III of the German-Venezuelan protocol, the rule of liability must be different from that under the protocols of the peace powers.

The umpire, therefore, agrees with the argument of the Commissioner for Germany that Articles I and III of the protocol can not be treated as merely superfluous or redundant. Certainly the admission which was required as a sine qua non to any arbitration, which was the consideration to the allied powers for returning to Venezuela the control of her war vessels and her ports, can not be disregarded in determining her liability.

Marshall, Chief Justice, says, speaking for the United States Supreme Court, in the Nereide, 9 Cranch, 419:

Treaties are formed upon deliberate reflection. Diplomatic men read the public treaties made by other nations, and can not be supposed either to omit or insert an article common in public treaties without being aware of the effect of such omission or insertion; neither the one nor the other is to be ascribed to inattention.

This must be equally true in the case of the insertion of an article most uncommon, if not unprecedented, in treaties, and which contains a general admission of liability. A fortiori in this case, where an admission of liability is contained only in the protocols of those Governments which still held control of the war vessels and ports of Venezuela.

It is therefore the plain duty of the umpire, under the protocol, to treat those provisions in Articles I and III as substantive and material, and to give them the interpretation which they should have in the light of the circumstances immediately preceding and surrounding their execution.

The umpire agrees in opinion with the Venezuelan Commissioner that the fair construction of Article I, in which the Venezuelan Government "recognizes in principle the justice of claims of German subjects 'presented' by the Imperial German Government," is to restrict it to claims which had been presented at the time of the execution of the protocol. This is its literal wording, and Article II restricts the claims to "those originating from the Venezuelan civil wars of 1898 to 1900" and provides for their payment modo et forma. Moreover, there is a plain inference, from the special admission of liability in Article III in cases of wrongful seizures of or injuries to property, that the parties did not consider that Article I covered that class of claims. It is therefore necessary to determine the true intent and meaning of these words in Article III:

The German claims not mentioned in Articles II and VI, in particular the claims resulting from the present Venezuelan civil war, the claims of the Great Venezuelan Railroad Company against the Venezuelan Government for passages and freight, the claims of the engineer, Carl Henckel, in Hamburg, and of the Beton and Monierban Company (Limited), in Berlin, for the construction of a slaughterhouse at Caracas are to be submitted to a mixed commission.

Said commission shall decide both whether the different claims are materially well founded and also upon their amount. The Venezuelan Government admit their liability in cases where the claim is for injury to or a wrongful seizure of property, and consequently the commission will not have to decide the question of liability, but only whether the injury to or the seizure of property were wrongful acts and what amount of compensation is due.

In the opinion of the Commissioner for Venezuela the words of the article can not be literally interpreted—because [he says] that it would then make Venezuela admit her liability for any common crime committed by an individual upon a German subject, and that inasmuch as it is self-evident that this class of seizures or of injuries to property, while within the literal wording of the provisions, is not within its reason, it is the duty of the Commission to classify these wrongful seizures of or injuries to property.

And he suggests this classification: That the admission of liability includes all injuries to or wrongful seizures of property by the governmental troops or Government officials, but that it does not include wrongful seizures of or injuries to property by revolutionists.

The umpire agrees that the admission does not embrace common individual crimes not resulting from insurrectionary events, because it is quite apparent that with respect to wrongful seizures of or injuries to property the high contracting parties had in mind only those occurring during the present civil war. (See the ultimatum of Germany, above quoted, and the British memorandum of December 22, speaking also for Germany in regard to the terms of arbitration.)<sup>a</sup>

The umpire can not agree with the opinion of the Venezuelan Commissioner that the admission of liability by Venezuela is restricted to wrongful seizures of or injuries to property inflicted by the authorities of Venezuela acting in their official character. The Commissioner in support of this position quotes from Seijas the law of Venezuela of 1873, which enacts that the nation will not be expected to indemnify for injuries, damages, or seizures which were not caused by the legitimate authorities, acting in their public character, and he says—the protocol of February seems to have wished to abolish this just distinction, and for the reason that injuries inflicted by the forces of the Government, taking advantage of their position, it seems to me, makes the Government responsible;

and he continues:

In the matter of the revolution [revolutionists] it results, according to those same principles, that the Government is not and can not be responsible for acts which are not its acts, but the acts of persons temporarily withdrawn from its control.

And that this rule of nonliability is—not only declared by the act referred to, but by the consensus of opinion of international law writers and precedents.

His argument, in brief, is that Venezuela only admitted, first, that German subjects would not be compelled to regard the provisions of the law of February 14, 1873, and present their claims to her courts; second, that said law should not be the test of liability in cases of injuries to or wrongful seizures of property, although he insists that the law declares the international rule of liability. It is to be remarked in passing that his statement is not accurate, because he does not deny the liability of Venezuela for acts committed by revolutionists who afterwards succeeded in establishing a new government, thus making the wrongfulness of the seizure depend not upon the act itself, but the result of the revolution.

It is plain that the admission was not demanded by Germany for the first reason, because that purpose was contemplated and actually consummated by the submission to arbitration and is explicitly stated in the first paragraph of Article III. As to the second, passing, for further consideration later in this opinion, the correctness of an interpretation of general words of admission of liability which permits their restriction to one of several grounds of liability, it is equally clear that this purpose is fully accomplished by the provision in the protocol with reference to local legislation.

It is now argued in behalf of Venezuela that her law in respect to acts of revolutionists declared the recognized rule of international law. It would seem logically to follow that her admission of liability would be as broad as the statute. And if the statute and the rule of international law were equally broad, her admission would cover both. It certainly can not be argued that while she admitted in general words her liability, contrary to the conditions of the rule laid down in her own statute, she may now claim nonliability under a rule of international law which she alleges is recognized by the consensus of opinion of all authorities on international law. Manifestly this is no admission at all.

From what has been shown by the correspondence it plainly appears that the principal bone of contention between the parties was their disagreement as to Venezuela's liability for injuries to or wrongful seizures of property resulting from the present Venezuelan civil war. Venezuela claimed nonliability because of her statute which she then insisted and still insists declared the correct international-law rule of liability. Germany denied this. Venezuela, from the necessity of the situation, receded from her position and admitted her liability. Now she contends: "I did not admit my liability under international law, although I did admit my liability under my statute, which declared the same principle of immunity I am now contending for. I did admit my liability under my statute, but I did not admit it under the principles of international law unanimously conceded, notwithstanding the rule of liability is the same in both."

Coming now to the final argument of the Commissioner for Venezuela, that international law absolves Venezuela from liability for acts of revolutionists and that her admission must be interpreted in the light of this rule—

Is his premise well founded? International law is not law in its usually defined sense. It is not a rule of conduct prescribed by a sovereign power. It is merely a body of rules established in custom or by treaty by which the intercourse between civilized nations is governed. Its principles are ascertained by the agreement of independent nations upon rules which they consider just and fair in regulating their dealings with each other in peace and in war. They reach this agreement by comparing the opinions of text writers and in precedents in modern times, and these ultimately appeal to the principles of natural reason and morality and common sense. It therefore rests solely upon agreement. Obedience to it is voluntary only and can not be enforced by a common sovereign power. Any nation has the power and the right to dissent from a rule or principle of international law, even though it is accepted by all the other nations. Its obedience to the rule can only be compelled by an appeal to its reason and love of justice or by the superior force of the particular nation or nations whose interests are involved.

Applying this inherent nature of international law to the question under discussion, it follows that neither Germany nor Venezuela was by force of law compelled to accept the other's judgment as to a principle of international law upon which they differed. Each nation held to its own opinion of what the correct rule of international law was in the premises—Germany, that Venezuela was liable for injuries arising from insurrectionary events, and Venezuela that she was not. Arbitration is proposed by Venezuela. This, if accepted, would unquestionably leave the question of liability to be decided upon principles of international law. But Germany says, "No! I will not refer these claims to arbitration unless Venezuela first admits her liability." Now, Venezuela having by her admission regained control of her ports and her war vessels, contends that she admitted liability only in cases where she was legally liable. Certainly, this position can not be maintained. She was always liable for claims for which she was legally liable. Hence she admitted nothing. And yet we have seen of what momentous consequence this admission was to her. It is perfectly plain that Germany would never have released the ships and ports from which they were in position to make payment of the claims of their subjects if Venezuela had then interpreted her admission as she now seeks to do, or if Germany had had any conception that such interpretation would be sought to be given to words admitting liability generally.

The case of Venezuela falls within the rule stated by Vattel:

If one who can and should clearly and completely explain has not done so, it is to his damage; he will not be allowed afterwards to bring forward restrictions [limitations] which he has not expressed. (Vattel, book 2, sec. 264.)

Here Germany requires from Venezuela an admission of liability in as broad terms as can be used. Venezuela could and should have explained her understanding of them. Not having done so then, she can not do so now. When Venezuela admits, without qualification, her liability for wrongful seizures of or injuries to property growing out of insurrectionary events during the civil war, she must be held to admit her liability for all wrongful seizures of persons and property during that period and under those conditions.

Moreover, substantially all the authorities on international law agree that a nation is responsible for acts of revolutionists under certain conditions—such as lack of diligence, or negligence in failing to prevent such acts, when possible, or as far as possible to punish the wrongdoer and make reparation for the injury. There is, therefore, a rule of international law under which Venezuela would be held liable in certain cases for acts of revolutionists. And there are some very respectable authorities which hold that a nation situated with respect to revolutions as Venezuela has been for the past decade and more, and with the consequent disordered condition of the State, is not to be given the benefit of such exemption from liability. These considerations may be presumed to have been in the mind of either or both of the contracting parties, and to have induced the insertion in the protocol of the admission of liability.

The case, therefore, is one in which two nations who are presumably aware of this diversity of opinion among nations as well as between themselves as to the liability of governments for the acts of revolutionists enter into a solemn agreement containing an express admission of liability for all wrongful seizures of or injuries to property growing out of insurrectionary events in a civil war. Can there be any other conclusion than that they intended to settle themselves this question of liability and not leave it to be determined as a commission might decide, one way or another? Whatever strength the argument might have if there was the unanimity of opinion claimed, and therefore the admission of liability might be interpreted as a mere declaration of an existing uniformly recognized principle of international law, the argument fails when it appears in the case before us that there is a contrariety of opinion on the subject. Moreover, the well-recognized canons of construction prohibit a restricted interpretation of this article. It is a uniform rule of construction that effect should be given to every clause and sentence of an agreement. The result of the construction insisted upon by the Commissioner for Venezuela would be to give the same meaning to the German protocol and to those of the peace powers, in effect striking out Article III. It is a conceded principle of interpretation that an admission is taken most strongly against the party making it. (Vattel, above quoted.) Finally, it is a rule of construction of treaties, sustained by the highest authorities, that if a clause in a treaty is susceptible of two interpretations, one broad and the other restrictive, the courts will give the clause the former interpretation in favor of private rights. In the case of Shanks v. Dupont (3 Peters, 242, 250) the Supreme Court of the United States, in construing the treaty of the United States with Great Britain of 1794, confirmed this rule. Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the court. In it he said:

If a treaty admits of two interpretations, and one is limited and the other liberal, one which will further and the other exclude private rights, why should not the most liberal exposition be adopted? * * * This part of the stipulation, then, being for the benefit of British subjects who became aliens by the events of the war, there is no reason why all persons should not be embraced in it who sustained the character of British subjects, although we might also have treated them as American citizens. * * * In either view of this case, and we think both are sustained by principles of public law, as well as of the common law, and by the soundest rule of interpretation applicable to treaties between independent states, the objections taken to the right of recovery of the plaintiffs can not prevail.

The rule is again affirmed by the same court, speaking through Mr. Justice Swayne, in this language:

Where a treaty admits of two constructions, one restrictive as to the rights that may be claimed under it and the other liberal, the latter is to be preferred. (Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S., 483.)

The principle was recognized by the Commission under the United States and Venezuelan convention, in Aspinwall v. The United States of Venezuela. The Commissioner (Little), speaking for the Commission, says "this doctrine—is thoroughly embedded in the jurisprudence of the United States, and is believed to be, internationally, a sound one. * * * [And] this finds support, if any were needed, in what Grotius says: "In the things which are not odious, words are to be taken according to the general propriety (totam proprietatem) of popular use, and, if there are several senses, according to that which is widest." (De Jure Belli ac Pacis, book 2, chap. 16, par. XII.)

In discussing the language of the treaty of 1819 between the United States and Spain, which it was contended did not include claims on torts, Mr. John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State, referring to the fact that in the course of the negotiations a proposal was made to omit the renunciation which included the latter class of these claims, said:<sup>a</sup>

As there is no limitation in the words of this renunciation, with regard to the nature of the transactions in which the claims originated, whether by contract or by tort, so none was intended. They were claims, of all of which it was believed that the only possible chance of obtaining any satisfaction to the claimants, consisted in the execution of the treaty.

It has been suggested that this interpretation will extend the liability of Venezuela to all injuries, because the word "wrongful" does not precede the word "injury;" that the clause must in that case be read "The Venezuelan Government admit their liability where the claim is for any injury to property," whether accidental or justifiable. Even if the word "injury" is taken in its generic or popular sense, the umpire is of the opinion that this interpretation is forced and untenable. The word "injury" when used in a legal or moral sense involves intentional wrongdoing.

"Injury in morals and jurisprudence is the intentional doing of wrong." (Fleming, Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, "injury.")

Again it is suggested that the word "wrongful" must be interpreted by reference to international law, and that Venezuela admits liability only for those seizures and injuries which are wrongful in the light of international law. This is incorrect. The admission is confined to property rights and must be read in that connection. It clearly means that the injury or the seizure shall be wrongful in respect to the right of property of the owner—his title to the property—and that any act which violates that right is wrongful. This right of property or title must be decided by municipal or local law, because it is derived from and is conferred by that law. One does not derive his title to property in any country through international law, but through the local law of the country. That law confers, permeates, and restricts his title. He takes his title subject to any and all the qualifications and limitations of the local law at the time of its acquisition.

It is also suggested that if Venezuela is held liable for injuries caused by the acts of insurrectionists, it will tend to discourage future revolutions. If the suggestion were pertinent, it might be possible to argue the opposite result; that, in the language of an eminent representative of the United States, "revolutions might then become a pastime for foreigners." But it is not pertinent. The functions of the Commission are strictly judicial. They have nothing to do with questions of statecraft and diplomacy. Their simple duty is to determine the rights of the parties according to justice and equity. They must not be influenced in reaching their conclusions by theories or predictions as to the possible effect of their decisions upon the political future of Venezuela. It is none of their concern. Fiat justitia ruat cælum.

In view of these considerations, the umpire is of the opinion that the admission of liability in Article III extends to claims of German subjects for wrongful seizures of or injuries to property resulting from the present Venezuelan civil war, whether they are the result of acts of governmental troops or of Government officials or of revolutionists.

This, however, does not dispose of the entire question. First, the admission of liability in Article III does not include injuries to the person; it covers only seizures of or injuries to property. Second, of these it only includes those resulting from the present Venezuelan civil war. The liability in these two classes of claims must be determined, therefore, upon the general principles of international law, because under the language of the protocol, read in the light of the British and German memorandum of December 22, 1902, they are referred to "arbitration without any reserve."

In thus determining them it is not, however, necessary to discuss the general question of the character and extent of the liability of a nation for acts of insurgents. There is diversity of opinion among the authorities on the question.

In the opinion of the umpire, however, the modern doctrine, almost universally recognized, is that a nation is not liable for acts of revolutionists when the revolution has gone beyond the control of the titular government. It is not necessary that either a state of war, in an international sense, should exist or any recognition of belligerency. Immunity follows inability.

This rule was very recently affirmed and approved by the United States Spanish Treaty Claims Commission sitting at Washington April 28, 1903 (Opinion No. 8).

Judicial cognizance can properly be taken of the condition of Venezuela during the present civil war. And there can be no doubt that from its outset it went beyond the power of the Government to control. It was complicated by the action of the allied powers in seizing the forts and war vessels of Venezuela; and if it is now fully suppressed (as is to be hoped), its extinction was only within a few days past. During all this period considerable portions of the country and some of its principal cities have been held by revolutionary forces. Large bodies of organized revolutionist troops have traversed the country, and in their train have followed the usual marauding and pillage by small bands of guerrillas and brigands. The supreme efforts of the Government were necessary and were directed to putting down the rebellion. Under such circumstances it would be contrary to established principles of international law and to justice and equity to hold the Government responsible.

It only remains to apply these conclusions to the particular claims submitted for decision.

The claim of Otto Kummerow is for property taken by the revolutionists from his residence in Naguanagua in May, June, and July, 1902.

It is specially objected to by the Venezuelan Commissioner on the ground that the testimony is insufficient to establish it, because the witnesses are servants on the claimant's farm and are so ignorant that they can not sign their names; that their testimony is word for word the same, and their appraisals of the value are precisely alike. From these facts he urges that their testimony is not to be received. He also claims that the time and other circumstances of the occurrence are too generally stated, and that the entire list of articles taken are said to have been taken in the course of three months, without any specification as to the dates or the number of seizures or as to what articles were taken at each seizure. He further objects that there is no evidence of any violence or even that they were taken without the consent of the owner, and finally that the acts were committed by revolutionary guerrillas as shown by the character of the acts mentioned. In reply to the last objection the Commissioner for Germany insists that the witnesses testified expressly that they were revolutionists and give the names of their officers. No reply is made by him to the other objection to the credibility of the witnesses.

In the opinion of the umpire the proof fails to make out a case. While he can not agree with the argument of the Commissioner for Venezuela that the witnesses are to be discredited because they are ignorant farm hands or servants, the vague generality and at the same time verbatim identity of their testimony mark the case as one which might easily be manufactured.

In view of these facts, and the further fact that as to many of the articles it is obvious that the witnesses were not competent judges of their value, the umpire is compelled to disallow the claim for lack of sufficient proof.

Certainly if evidence of this character is to be received, there would seem to be no protection whatever for Venezuela as against manufactured claims, and it is significant in this connection that the claimant claims to have gone to considerable expense in the employment of an attorney, whose first and natural duty should have been to have presented the case of the claimant in a more satisfactory manner.

The first item of the claim of Otto Redler & Co. is for 9,932.85 bolivars, for the sacking of their store on the 26th of June, 1902, by revolutionists under the command of Gen. Lidano Mendoza.

The injuries occurred during the siege of Barquisimeto, which lasted from the middle of June, 1902, until June 26, when the revolutionists occupied the city. The house of the claimants was occupied by forces of the revolutionists under the command of Col. Manuel R. Vilaro, whose troops by night and day took away many articles of gold, hardware, and brass ware.

The proof seems to be complete as to the taking of the articles and the fact of the sacking of the store, and a district judge who took the testimony certifies that he has carefully examined the books of the firm, and the balance sheet shows the loss of 9,932.85 bolivars as correct.

This item of the claim falls within the ruling of the umpire upon the liability of Venezuela under her admission in Article III of the protocol.

The second item of 7,647.68 bolivars is for goods supplied the revolutionary forces under General Crespo, and it is not disputed that the government established by General Crespo, of which he was the constitutional President, acknowledged the claim. It is claimed, however, in defense of this item that the claimants were aiding the revolutionists by supplying them with munitions of war, and that having been shown thereby to have been revolutionists they have forfeited their claim. While, on the other hand, it is contended on the part of Venezuela that the authority of the revolutionary committee, upon whose action is based the third item of the claim for 3,732 bolivars, is not shown. It is further contended, as to the second item of 7,647.68 bolivars, that Venezuela offered to pay the claimant in bonds or evidences of debt, and that the claimant should have taken it, and not having done so can not now assert his claim.

The umpire is of the opinion, first, that it does not clearly appear that the claimant knew, in the case of one of the sales at least, that the purchasers were revolutionists. But in his judgment this whole claim of defense is disposed by the fact that these revolutionary forces were successful, and that Venezuela is estopped to refuse compensation for goods received from the claimants which materially assisted in the establishment of the Crespo government, whose title was never attacked. They are likewise estopped from claiming any pains or penalties or forfeitures against foreigners on the ground that the foreigners assisted the Crespo party in obtaining possession of the government.

The third item of the claim of 3,732 bolivars is based upon the same fact as the second, although it does not clearly appear whether this item of the claim was recognized, as the second was, by the decree of the Crespo government. The same objection therefore obtains against the claim of defense to this item.

The umpire can not agree with the position taken on behalf of Venezuela that the claimants were bound to take bonds of Venezuela in payment of their claim. Even if the Government had tendered them cash in payment of their claim and the tender had been refused, its only effect would be to stop interest. But certainly if Redler & Co. had a claim, as has been adjudged, they were not bound to take in satisfaction thereof anything but cash.

It results, therefore, that the claim of Redler & Co. will be allowed for the full amount claimed, namely, 17,050.05 marks, with interest at 3 per cent per annum from the time of the presentation of the claim to the Commission up to and including the 31st day of December, 1903.

The claim of Luis Fulda is for property taken, a portion by "Venezuelan forces under the command of Gen. Nicolás Rolando" and a portion by forces of General Matos. Both the Commissioners, however, agree that the property was taken by revolutionary forces. Neither the fact nor the amount of the damage is denied by the Venezuelan Commissioner. It nowhere appears in the evidence when these injuries happened, but in the brief of the Venezuelan agent it is stated as a ground of defense that the international conflict, meaning the seizure of the war vessels and ports of Venezuela by the allied powers, had commenced at that time. This statement is not denied by the Commissioner for Germany.

The claims therefore fall within the above ruling of the umpire as to the extent of the admission of liability by Venezuela for acts of insurgents growing out of the present civil war, and as there appears to be no dispute as to the amount, it will be allowed at the sum of 5,000 bolivars, with interest at 3 per cent per annum from the date of the presentation of the claim to the Commission up to and including December 31, 1903.

The claim of Max Fischbach is for 19,200 marks for gross personal injuries committed by bands of revolutionists on October 24, 1902, in Los Azufrales, in Carúpano. They took away from him his watch and kept him until some friends came along and ransomed him and his fellow-sufferer Friedericy by the payment of 10 pesos. On the day of making the declaration of his claim, November 20, 1902, he alleges that he was still suffering from the effects of his injuries.

The claim of Richard Friedericy is based on practically the same assault by the same parties, because he protested against the treatment of Fischbach. He claims he was recovering from a rupture and his treatment brought back his troubles, from which he was still suffering on November 20, 1902. He claims the same amount, 19,200 marks.

These two claims are not within Venezuela's admission of liability, save as respects the watch taken from Fischbach, as to the value of which no evidence is given and no specific claim made, and the money taken from them both.

The claims for personal injuries will be, therefore, disallowed, and each claimant awarded the sum of 5 pesos, with interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum from the date of the presentation of their claims to the Commission up to and including December 31, 1903.

The umpire is under appreciated obligation to the commissioners for their painstaking and able expositions in presenting the important questions arising in these cases.

VALENTINER CASE.

Damages for loss of crop because laborers who were hired to gather it were drafted by Venezuelan troops held to be remote damages and disallowed.

Costs of preparation for suit also disallowed.

Damages occasioned by revolutionary troops allowed because of admissions in protocol.

Where constitution provides against drafting of Venezuelans for army except upon previous proclamation as to the portion of the territory in which guaranties of constitution are to be suspended, the draft held to be presumed to have been legal in the absence of any proof that such proclamation was made.

Opinion of witnesses as to nationality of persons incompetent evidence.

DUFFIELD, Umpire:

The evidence in this case satisfactorily establishes that on the 22d of December, 1901, a detachment of Government troops, under the command of Capt. Pedro Gonzalez, sent out by the jefe civil of Guarenas with orders to recruit soldiers, came to the coffee hacienda, "La Hondonada," owned by the claimant. The laborers, who were taken away by the force, were 63 Venezuelans, and also some foreigners. They had all been hired under valid contract by the agent of the claimant to pick the crop of coffee on the hacienda, which was then ready to gather. The superintendent of the hacienda informed the officer in command of the patrol of these facts, and that if the men were taken away the crop would be lost, to which the officer answered that he must obey orders. It is also satisfactorily established by the evidence that it was impossible to secure new men for twenty-five days after the draft, even in Caracas, and that during this time a great part of the coffee ripened and fell and was lost, the amount so lost being more than 400 quintals, which the testimony shows was worth 45 bolivars a quintal.

The Commissioner for Germany is of the opinion that the claimant is entitled to recover the amount. He is also of the opinion that the claimant is entitled to damages for four huts burned by the revolutionists of the Matos revolution, worth 800 bolivars, and for legal expenses in the matter of preparation of his claim for presentation, 312.60 bolivars.

The Commissioner for Venezuela differs in opinion with the Commissioner for Germany, and is of the opinion that there can be no recovery against Venezuela for the loss of the coffee crop. He does not refer in his opinion to the destruction of the huts or to the question of legal expenses, but he admits that Venezuela should pay for the value of a mule which the claimant alleges he lost, and 50 pesos which the claimant asks for wood burned by the forces of the Government.

It is argued by the Commissioner for Germany, in support of the claim for loss of the coffee crop, that the recruiting officer had no authority to take from the plantation either Venezuelan or foreign laborers, and that such taking was "usurpation of the rights of the claimant," and that, inasmuch as the testimony shows clearly that claimant could not for twenty-five days replace the laborers who were so illegally drafted, the loss of the crop was a natural and proximate consequence of said illegal draft.

In opposition to this position, the Commissioner for Venezuela insists that the evidence shows the drafting of the 63 Venezuelans and only 6 foreigners, so called; that the Venezuelans were liable to draft, and that there is no evidence of the foreign citizenship of the so-called foreigners, and that there is no evidence that the so-called foreigners did not gather the coffee, meaning that there is no testimony showing how long they remained away from the plantation, and there is some testimony that some of them returned very shortly; and, finally, that the loss of the crop is an indirect damage, and remote and consequential.

The umpire is of the opinion that under the testimony in the case the loss of the crop is not a proper element of damage. It is extremely doubtful, in his opinion, whether it would be even if all the laborers who had been engaged to gather it had been illegally taken from the plantation.

It has been held repeatedly that the loss of future crops is too remote to constitute an element of damage where the owner was prevented by the wrongful act of another from planting and harvesting them. So, too, where the seller of an agricultural machine fails to deliver it within the time stipulated, it is held that the loss of crops through the deprivation of the use of the machine is not a proper element of damage against him. Also, where the owner of a crop is deprived of an animal with which to harvest them. But it does not appear in this case whether the deprivation of an animal was by a tortfeasor or because of a breach of contract.

The same is held where the crop is lost by the loss of a servant or a slave. But it is, however, held in the latter case that where the owner of the crop can procure no other assistance he may recover compensation for the loss. (Sedgwick on Damages, Vol. I, p. 298, sec. 202, and the cases cited.) And it was held in McDaniel v. Crabtree, 21 Arkansas, 431, that where the defendant wrongfully seized the plaintiff's negro the profits of a crop plaintiff expected to plant and cultivate by means of the negro were too uncertain to afford ground of recovery.

On the other hand, in an action of contract, it was held in Louisiana, in which the civil law obtains, that on the failure to deliver a sugar mill the purchaser may recover compensation for the crop lost. (Goodloe v. Rogers, 9 Louisiana Annual, 273.)

In Sledge v. Reid, 73 North Carolina, 440, the defendant wrongfully seized the plaintiff's mule, which the latter intended to use to cultivate his crop. The loss of his crop was held both too uncertain and too remote for compensation. But Mr. Sedgwick says of this case (Sedgwick on Damages, vol. 1, sec. 191):

If the mule were intended to be used for the harvesting of a crop already matured, the loss would not be too uncertain.

Access can not be had to these cases cited to ascertain the condition of the crops at the time of the injury or breach of contract. But in the case here presented there are so many elements of uncertainty dependent upon conditions of weather, health, and industry of laborers preparing the crop for shipment and transportation, and ultimate realization on the crop, that the umpire is inclined to the opinion that the damage would be too remote.

However, the number of so-called foreigners drafted, at most only six, less than 10 per cent of the number of the Venezuelans drafted, will not warrant the charge against Venezuela if the draft of the Venezuelans was legitimate.

It is claimed by the Commissioner for Germany that under article 17, paragraph 5, of the constitution of Venezuela, the 63 Venezuelans were not legally liable to draft. On the other hand, the Commissioner for Venezuela insists that according to article 89, paragraph 20, subdivision 7, and paragraph 21, such draft was legitimate. To this the Commissioner for Germany agrees, provided that the previous declaration, required by subdivision 7 of paragraph 20 of article 89, had been made affecting the territory in which the plantation "La Hondonada" was situated, but he insists that such previous declaration is not proven, and that in the absence of that proof it must be presumed that the draft in question was contrary to the constitution and illegal.

The umpire can not agree with this latter contention. It being conceded that given the prerequisite of an antecedent declaration of suspension of the constitution, embracing the locus in quo, the draft would be legal, the umpire is of the opinion that under the general presumption of law, in the absence of any testimony to the contrary, the draft must be considered lawful. Omnia rite acta præsumentur. This universally accepted rule of law should apply with even greater force to the acts of a government than those of private persons. Moreover, it seems at least doubtful whether the provision in subdivision 7 of paragraph 20 of article 89, read in connection with paragraph 21, is mandatory and not merely directory.

Furthermore, the evidence does not satisfactorily establish the nationality of the so-called foreigners. Certainly the testimony of the witnesses in their depositions taken under the commission, does not prove the fact, except as to Beauregard, who testifies as to his own nationality. The opinion of witnesses as to the citizenship of an individual is clearly incompetent to prove the fact. The letter attached to the "expediente," even if admissible in evidence, which is doubtful, because unsworn to and unauthenticated, and the signatures of Serrano, Mosquera, and Pereira not proven, is open to the same objection.

It results, therefore, that the proof fails to make out a case of illegal draft of any of the laborers of the claimant, except Beauregard; but as to him the proof shows he was absent from the plantation but a short time, and there is nothing in the evidence from which the amount of the value of his services, over and above his wages, can be computed. This item of the claim must be disallowed.

The item of legal costs and preparation of his claim for presentation is also disallowed.

As a general rule, costs and expenses of litigation, other than the usual and ordinary court costs, are not recoverable in an action for damages, nor are such costs even recoverable in a subsequent action.

Accordingly, it has been held that the mere fact that a party deems it necessary to resort to law to enforce or protect his rights does not, in general, give him the right to recover as damages the fees he may have paid legal counsel in the cause,<sup>a</sup> in the absence of a contract stipulation therefor, or provision of statute permitting. (American and English Encyclopedia of Law, 2d ed., Vol. VIII, p. 873.)

It results from these conclusions, therefore, that the claimant can only be allowed for the value of four huts burned, 800 bolivars; and wood, also burned, 50 pesos; and a mule taken by revolutionists, 160 pesos, aggregating 1,640 bolivars, with interest from the date of the presentation of the claim, July 1, 1903, to up to December 31 proximo, inclusive, at 3 per cent per annum.

VAN DISSEL & CO. CASE.

(By the Umpire:)

Meaning of the words "present Venezuelan civil war."

Venezuela not liable for revolutionary damages under principles of international law.

GOETSCH, Commissioner.

The Commissioners agree that on July 30 and 31, 1901, a detachment of troops under the orders of Gen. Juan Marquez confiscated from the claimant firm 158 mules, of which there were afterwards returned to the house 43, 9, 3, and 4—in all 59—so that there was a loss of 99 animals (6 saddle mules and 93 pack mules).

They disagree (a) upon the question whether Venezuela is responsible for the loss, (b) the Venezuelan Commissioner denies the responsibility of Venezuela:

First, because there is question of an invasion of Colombian troops; and, second, because there is question of an incident which ought not to be considered, "as of the last civil war," in the sense in which the decision of General Duffield gives to this phrase.

I. The political event upon which the claim is based forms an epoch in the revolution against President Castro—an epoch which the honorable umpire describes in his personal opinion relative to the historical events in Venezuela, as follows:

In July, 1901, General Rángel Garbiras, as provisional leader of the Nationalist party during the imprisonment of General Hernandez, organized an army of about 4,000 Venezuelans and troops of the regular army of Colombia and invaded Táchira by way of Encontrados and overland to the city of San Cristóbal.

A detachment of these troops under the orders of Juan Marquez marched to the north and committed various depredations along the route to Encontrados, and at this last-named place also. Amongst others this detachment sacked, on July 27, 1901, the mercantile establishment "El Finglado," belonging to the firm of Christern & Co., and, moreover, they confiscated the mules mentioned in the claim of Van Dissel & Co. It is clear from every point of view, according to what has been stated, that there is no question of a warlike attack on the part of Colombia, but of a revolutionary uprising of Venezuelans who had fled into Colombian territory and lived in the frontier districts. They were the "Nationalistas," partisans of General Hernandez, and authors of the movement. The generals in chief, Rangel Garbiras, Juan Marquez, and Trinidad Zuleta, are Venezuelans. It is not impossible, and it is even probable, that among the invading revolutionists there were some Colombians, which in no way modifies the fact that there was question of a revolutionary movement of Venezuelans, who perhaps in attending to their own interests and political outlook, knew how to attract some Colombians to their flag. It has not been alleged or proved that the Colombian Government had any knowledge of the invasion, and even less that it had set it on foot. This is the view taken by the Government of Venezuela, who replied to an inquiry of England (see the English Blue Book, p. 55) on the 20th of November, 1901—that is to say, that at the root of the invasion of Garbiras there was not a state of war existing with Colombia. Venezuela would not have received quietly a warlike attack from Colombia and would have replied to its neighbor by warlike measures. In the case of Christern & Co. the Commissioner of Venezuela has taken for granted that the act was committed by Venezuelan revolutionists. Since there is question of the same time, of the same troops, and of the same generals, it can not be seen why the authors of the deed could have suddenly become Colombian troops as against Messrs. Van Dissel & Co. Besides, all the witnesses testify that they were Venezuelan revolutionists.

II. As is seen from a study of the protocol of February 13, 1903, the Government of the German Empire took exclusively upon itself the adjustment of the claims arising out of the civil war of 1898-1900, or, say, the revolution organized at the time when Castro was seeking power, and, as far as they were at that time presented, held them to be fixed (Art. II), while the other claims, especially those arising out of the last civil war, were submitted for their decision to the Mixed Commission (Art. III). The German Commissioner has not the least doubt that under the term "last civil war" the revolutionary movements organized against President Castro ought to be included, the consequences of which have not yet been adjusted. It is this and nothing else which was intended to be expressed. Since how can it be supposed that the Government of the German Empire could only have had in mind the Matos revolution, and that there could not have entered into its scheme the demand of satisfaction for the other damages which had occurred in the intermediate interval? (That is to say, from the time that Castro assumed power up to the uprising of Matos.) It was its idea to clear the table (to liquidate), and that all the claims of German subjects not adjusted up to date should be decided by the Commission.

There is no doubt that this was the intention of the Government of Venezuela. The same reason supports the interpretation that of the revolution and revolutionists against General Castro, enumerated one by one by the honorable umpire and of the individual existence of which perchance the German Government did not have notice, were united by the German and Venezuelan Governments under the term "last civil war." If the opinion of the Venezuelan Commissioner is to be considered correct, according to which only the uprising of Matos should be considered as "the last civil war," this interpretation would in no way modify, because of its slight importance, the judgment of the German Commissioner, who would demonstrate the liability of Venezuela in the present case by a different sort of reasoning.

The first paragraph of article III says:

The German claims not mentioned in the Articles II and VI, in particular the claims resulting from the present Venezuelan civil war, * * * are to be submitted to a mixed commission.

The words "in particular" show that outside of the claims of the "last civil war" ready to be submitted to the jurisdiction of the Commission all those claims remaining which have not yet been adjusted; that is to say, in a given case also the claims for the intermediate period (until the uprising of General Matos). The German Commissioner understanding until now that these claims refer to claims for the failure to fulfill agreements, or claims during the period prior to 1898, but at the same time he asserts that in case the interpretation of Dr. Zuloaga should be correct, there shall be included also claims which bear no relation to the revolution of Matos, but to the revolutions of the intermediate time (Hernandez, Garbiras, Paredes, Peraza, and Acosta).

The second paragraph of Article III refers entirely to the first paragraph. If in the second paragraph the Government of Venezuela has recognized in principle its responsibility with relation to claims for damage to or illegal confiscation of property, its admission refers to the claims of which the first paragraph of Article III speaks—that is to say, to those German claims not mentioned in Articles II and VI—therefore, in particular to the claims of the present civil war, to those of the intermediate interval, and, therefore, to the claims arising out of the invasion of Garbiras and Vargas. Therefore, in the present case also, the liability of Venezuela should be fixed, being based upon contracted obligations.

III. The German Commissioner can not estimate by his own experience the value of the animals confiscated. He must bear in mind the sworn statements of the witnesses, who are agreed that the prices mentioned are reasonable.

Besides, the firm of Van Dissel enjoys such a reputation for honesty and respectability that it is not to be supposed that they would demand false or exaggerated prices. Add to this that the mountain mules must be selected animals of great strength in order to resist the fatigue incident to an exceptionally mountainous and muddy region. Finally, it is necessary not to lose sight of the fact that the house suffered a considerable indirect damage because of the confiscation of the animals (as all the witnesses testify) and that the direct damage will require many years to be liquidated. All this should be taken into account in valuing the mules.

The prices indicated by the Commissioner of Venezuela are not in the first place sworn to, and besides they are given by individuals who did not know the animals in question, while the sworn witnesses ought to have known the exact value of them. Lastly, the prices refer to regions which are not in the mountains of Maracaibo, the high price which is paid in the mountains for mules being well known.

The German Commissioner therefore asks that the honorable umpire shall award the claimant firm the whole of the sum claimed, amounting to 51,000 bolivars, together with interest at 3 per cent per annum from the date of the presentation of the claim to December 31, 1903.

ZULOAGA, Commissioner:

Van Dissel & Co. make claim for 100 mules, which they say the troops of a commander, Juan Marquez, took on the 30th and 31st days of July, 1901, in a pasture field near El Azufre, in the jurisdiction of Michelena, State of Los Andes, and that they took them to Colombia via San Faustino. This claim is based upon acts of an obscure origin, with which the Government of Venezuela charges the Government of Colombia, since it was an invasion of the territory of Venezuela by revolutionary forces which, generally speaking, were battalions of the Colombian army, as appears even from the deposition itself presented as the testimony of the witness, David García. I do not understand how, under these circumstances, liability can be attached to the Government of Venezuela.

Nor even in the case that this act against the property of Van Dissel & Co. could be considered as the work of an internal revolution would the Government of Venezuela be liable, since it is an act of revolutionists, and besides, according to the interpretation given to the protocol by the honorable president of the Commission, the admission of the liability of Venezuela for acts of revolutionists is limited to the present war, which can not be any other except that which had for its leader Gen. M. A. Matos, a political movement perfectly well defined and distinct from every former revolution. I therefore reject the claim upon its merits; but it is also to be observed that mules, in the poor state which those which are the subject of this claim were, are not worth more than 80 pesos, or, say, 320 bolivars, as may be learned from the statements of informed people. The value of things at current prices should naturally govern the arbitrators, and with relation to them they are not to be governed by the declaration of witnesses who are set up as experts. Moreover, in the matter of experts it is universally determined that the judge is at full liberty to accept the valuation or not, and a judge of equity has that right all the more.

DUFFIELD, Umpire:

The claimants in this case base their claim upon injuries to and seizures of property belonging to them at their farm, El Azufre, in the jurisdiction of Michelena, State of Los Andes, by the troops of General Garbiras in July, 1901.

The Commissioner for Germany is of the opinion that the acts complained of occurred during the present Venezuelan civil war, as described in the protocol, while the Commissioner for Venezuela insists that these words in the protocol embrace only the so-called Matos revolution, which originated in or about December, 1901.

The importance of a correct interpretation of the words "present Venezuelan civil war" is self-evident. To arrive at a proper interpretation of them it is material and necessary to ascertain the political situation in Venezuela at and prior to the execution of the protocol. The following statement of the various revolts against the Government, which was established in October, 1899, by General Castro, is accepted as substantially correct by both Commissioners.

General Castro entered Caracas October 22, 1899; assumed power October 23, 1899, as "director y jefe de la revolución restauradora." Shortly thereafter he declared himself "supreme chief of Republic" and appointed a cabinet.

General Hernandez on October 27, 1899, secretly left Caracas, and on October 28, 1899, issued a manifesto against the Castro government. He was defeated and captured and imprisoned until December 11, 1902, when he was released and came to parley with (then) President Castro.

Gen. Antonio Paredes, military governor of Puerto Cabello, initiated a revolt in November, 1899, but on November 11 and 12, 1899, he was completely defeated, captured, and imprisoned until December 11, 1902.

December 14, 1900, Gen. Celestino Peraza issued a proclamation inciting an insurrection against the Castro government. There was no serious fighting, and he was soon defeated, captured, and imprisoned until December 11, 1902.

October 24, 1900, Gen. Pedro Julian Acosta revolted in Yrapa, and after a number of minor engagements in the States of Cumana and Margarita in February, 1901, he was captured and imprisoned and has not been released.

In July, 1901, General Garbiras, as provisional leader of the nationalist party during the imprisonment of General Hernandez, organized an army of about 4,000 Venezuelans and troops of the regular army of Colombia, and invaded Táchira by way of Encontrados and by roads to the city of San Cristóbal. A small skirmish took place at Encontrados July 28, 1901, which resulted in favor of the Government, but on the 28th and 29th he was defeated in a serious engagement at San Cristóbal, lasting from 2 p. m., July 28, until 4 p. m., July 29, between the main body of the Garbiras army and the Government troops under Gen. Celestino Castro, commander in chief of the army under appointment by General Castro.

August 8, 1901, another armed force invaded Venezuela from Colombia, via San Faustino, but was repulsed at Las Cumbres by Gen. Ruben Cardenas.

Finally, in February, 1902, Gen. Rángel Garbiras, with other leaders and a Colombian battalion of the line, again invaded Venezuela, via San Antonio, simultaneously with other officers from other points, but they were all defeated with heavy losses.

During the blockade Gen. Rangel Garbiras issued a manifesto early in 1903, abandoning his pretensions and being still a refugee in Colombia.

Gen. Horacio Ducharme, nationalist leader in the east, and his brother Alejandro joined in this movement from September 30, 1901, to the beginning of November, 1901, when the eastern section of the country was pacified.

In the beginning of October, 1901, Gen. Rafael Montilla revolted in the State of Lara and occupied Coro with a considerable army, but was defeated October 25, 1901, by Gen. Rafael Gonzales Pacheco, president of the State. He took refuge in the mountains of Guaito until the revolution of Matos gained head, when he joined it and participated until the end.

At the end of October, 1901, Gen. Juan Pietri issued a revolutionary proclamation, dated at La Sierra, Carabobo, although he had not then reached that point. He was almost immediately captured, brought to Caracas, and set at liberty in the Plaza Bolívar, while the revolutionists were routed at Guigue, in the State of Carabobo. Pietri again left Caracas by stealth toward the end of December, 1901, presumably to join General Matos's army or raise his own standard, but he was again captured December 31, 1901, and imprisoned until the blockade, when he was released.

November 21, 1901, a number of citizens of Caracas, including Gen. Ramón Guerra, minister of war and navy, who had lent their support secretly to Gen. Manuel Antonio Matos, who was then in Paris stirring up and providing means for an insurrection, of which he was to be the head, uniting the liberal elements and the nationalists, whose leader, Hernandez, was still in prison in the fortress of San Carlos.

December 19 Gen. Luciano Mendoza, whose term as provisional president of the State of Aragua was drawing to a close, and who was supposed to be about to assume the constitutional presidency of Carabobo, went to Vil de Cura, gathering some 300 men whom he had gotten in readiness. He counted on various uprisings on the same day in Carabobo, Cojedes, Lara, and Coro, but Gen. J. V. Gomez pursued him with vigor and dispersed his forces at or near Cojedes, and drove him into hiding.

At the end of December, 1901, General Matos circulated a proclamation dated on board the Libertador, formerly the Ban Righ, and declared by the National Government to be a pirate vessel. The forces of Gen. Antonio Fernandez in Aragua and the rebels in Coro were defeated and destroyed; but early in January, 1902, bodies of revolutionists began to rise in the east, relying on the Matos support and that of the steamer Libertador with General Matos on board, which on the 7th of February, 1902, engaged and destroyed the national steamer Crespo.

February 14 Gen. Gregorio Riera landed at Cauca and issued a proclamation, and engaged in battle the Government troops under Gen. Ramón-Ayala. General Gomez came to his assistance and the revolutionists in Coro were annihilated.

As early as March, 1902, the eastern portion of Venezuela was in arms in support of the revolution. Gen. Domingo Monagas, in Barcelona, and Gen. Nicolás Rolando, in Maturín and Cumaná, commanded troops. They gained signal victories at La Suteña of Barcelona, March 27, San Augustin del Pilar on April 2, and Guanaguana April 22. Gen. Calixto Escalante, who conducted the military expedition in the east, was completely routed and with many officers was taken prisoner. Rolando occupied Carúpano and defeated General Gomez in a hard battle. General Matos then came to Carúpano and began his march to the center, via Maturín and Carúpano. Meantime, in Lara and Yaracuy, General Amabile Solagure had acquired strength and was enlisting support with southwestern states to the movement in connection with General Montilla in Lara and Generals Mendoza and Batalla in the west.

By this time the occupation of Ciudad Bolívar by Col. Ramón Ferreras and his possession of the State of Guayana, after serious engagements at Ciudad Bolívar, San Felix, and other points, had occurred.

While the forces near La Guaira, in the valleys of the Tuy and the Guarico, had been organized in expectation of the coming army of the east in Coro General Riera obtained decisive victories which made him master of that state, and General Ayala was a captive in Barcelona.

During these events General Castro sent General Velutini to Barcelona to check the advance of General Matos's army, but the Government forces under Gen. M. Castro were defeated by the army of the east under General Rolando. President Castro thereupon took personal command of the army, and on August 18, with a considerable army, started for San Casimiro, where he was joined by other troops, and moved rapidly to Cua, but removed to Ocumare because of the defection of the troops under Gen. P. Perez Crespo, and remained until the beginning of September, 1902, when he returned to Valencia to meet the revolutionist forces from the west, who, by a succession of victories, had control of the states of Coro, Barquisimeto, Cojodes, Portuguesa, and Yaracuy. In spite of General Castro's efforts to prevent it, the revolutionist armies united at San Sebastian, and he fell back to Victoria. The united armies of the insurgents here attacked him vigorously from October 13 to November 2, but were compelled by the strong defense to withdraw from the field, and Matos took passage for Curaçao. Many revolutionists then surrendered themselves and the Government regained its coast and interior towns.

But in January, 1903, a reorganization of the revolutionists was consummated with considerable forces in Critinuco and Barlereuto under General Ronaldo; in Guarico, General Fernandez; in Coro, Gen. Gregorio S. Riera; in Barquisimeto and Yaracuy, under Generals Peñaloza, Solaguie, and Montilla. And after the signing of the protocols with the allied powers, February 13 of the present year, the struggle began again. It was only finally quelled by the taking by General Gomez of Ciudad Bolívar in the closing days of the present month.

It is claimed by the Commissioner for Venezuela that the words "the present civil war" in the protocol must refer to the revolution of Matos (so called) only. Is this correct? It is, literally, because at the date of the execution of the protocol there was no other revolution actively and aggressively prosecuted. But may not the parties to the protocol have used these words in a broader sense to indicate all the revolutions which had broken out against the Castro government?

From this statement it appears that prior to the Matos revolution a number of separate and disconnected revolts occurred, most of them of comparatively small importance; two of them in the year 1899, two in 1900, and four, including the Garbiras insurrection, in 1901; but all of these, except the Garbiras movement, were almost immediately suppressed. Of these revolutions that of General Ducharme alone appears to have been in answer to the call of General Garbiras. Of the leaders in these separate revolts, General Hernandez, General Paredes, General Peraza, and General Acosta were captured, and except General Acosta, who is still a prisoner, were imprisoned until December 11, 1902, when they were released by the Venezuelan Government at the time of the blockade by the allied forces. General Ducharme, being hard pressed, reembarked for Trinidad in November, 1901.

The insurrection headed by Gen. Ramón Garbiras in July, 1901, was organized and set out from the neighboring Republic of Colombia, and contained many troops of the regular Colombian national army. It was believed by the Government of Venezuela, and so announced by it in a proclamation addressed to the other nations of the world, dated August 16, 1901, that there was either complicity on the part of the Government of Colombia or an entirely unjustifiable lack of effort to prevent participation in it by its regularly enlisted troops. Notwithstanding the fact that General Garbiras had invaded Táchira by way of Encontrados, and thence by road had proceeded to the city of San Cristóbal with an army of about 4,000 Venezuelans and troops of the regular army of Colombia, on the 28th and 29th of the same month he was defeated in a serious battle at San Cristóbal by the Government troops under Gen. Celestino Castro, commander in chief of the Venezuelan army, and retired to Colombia. It was in this invasion that the injuries complained of occurred.

The so-called Matos revolution was announced by the proclamation of Gen. Manuel Antonio Matos in December, 1901, dated and issued on board the steamer Libertador, formerly the Ban Righ, then cruising in Venezuelan waters. She was denounced by a decree of the Venezuelan Government dated December 30, 1901, and in February, 1902, she engaged and destroyed the Government steamer Crespo. This proclamation, which was extensively circulated by General Matos, was the culmination of an agitation begun by him in Paris some months previously, looking to an extensive insurrection which he was to lead. He hoped to unite upon him as their leader the liberal elements and the followers of General Hernandez, called Nationalistas, whose chief was still a prisoner in the fortress of San Carlos. To this end he had advanced liberally of his means, which were large, and had enlisted the support of the Venezuelan minister of war and navy and a number of the citizens of Caracas. He did not profess or declare any connection with a prior insurrection, or any intention to support the cause of any former leader, but to initiate and successfully carry through a new and independent revolution.

Yielding to public opinion, and attentive to the honor which a large number of my distinguished compatriots have conferred on me, by designating me in their generosity to lead this redemptory crusade, I hasten to comply, and to bring with me the necessary elements of war to strengthen your desires, render them irresistible, and at the same time to serve as a tie of union to all Venezuelans, in order to save our beloved country from ruin. (From Venezuelan Herald of December 31, 1901.)

Through the entire period of December, 1901, until his defeat and proclamation of peace, from Curaçao, whither he had fled after his defeat in June, 1903, there is no indication whatever that the movement he was conducting had the slightest connection with any of the previous revolts. Although he naturally hoped and probably expected to bring together all the dissatisfied elements in the Republic under his banner, it was with a like hope and expectation that they would abandon their former chiefs and adopt him as their leader.

None of these former revolutions compared with the Matos movement in importance or in their chances of success. None of them were still active. All of them had been suppressed. And with the exception of the followers of Hernandez, who was himself in prison, there were no considerable numbers of organized revolutionists. All of their chiefs were imprisoned. General Garbiras only avoided imprisonment by flight into Colombia.

It appears, therefore, that at the time of the signing of the protocol there was no existing civil war with any leader or any organization save that of Matos, and that all previous revolts had been put down by August, 1901, except the comparatively insignificant movement of General Ducharme, Nationalist leader in the east, which existed from September 30 to the beginning of November, 1901, at which date the entire eastern section of the country was pacified, and two small desultory events, one by Gen. Rafael Montijo, in the State of Lara, which was quelled in a few weeks by the president of that State, and one by General Pietri, who was defeated and captured before he reached the point from which his proclamation of revolution was dated, and his followers at the same time routed at Guigue, in the State of Carabobo.

If there were any connection shown between the Matos revolution and these prior ones, there would be much force in the argument of the Commissioner for Germany that the high contracting parties had in contemplation, by the words "present Venezuelan civil war," all the insurrections against the Castro Government, but in the light of the facts stated above it clearly appears that the Matos revolution was independent.

Taking the words in their literal sense, in which they must be interpreted unless some special reasons require otherwise, they refer to the one civil war then pending in Venezuela.

The umpire is therefore of the opinion that the admission of Venezuela in the protocol of liability for injuries to and wrongful seizures of property does not embrace the insurrection headed by General Garbiras, in which the claimant suffered from acts of revolutionists. It is true that in February, 1902, General Garbiras, with other leaders and 4,000 soldiers, including the Colombian battalion of the line, again invaded Venezuela, via San Antonio, simultaneously with forces from other points, but they were all defeated very soon after.

As to this claim, therefore, the liability of Venezuela must be determined by the general principles of international law, and under them the umpire is of the opinion that no liability exists.

As has been shown above, the forces which committed the injuries in this case were composed in large part of the national troops of Colombia; that the expedition was organized in Colombia; that the Government of Venezuela had no warning from Colombia of its preparation and no reason to expect it, because her relations with Colombia were then friendly and included an interchange of diplomatic representatives; that the expedition penetrated only a short distance into Venezuela, coming by way of Encontrados by water, with San Cristóbal as its objective point, and that the Government took such prompt and vigorous means in opposition to it that, although General Garbiras had an army of some 4,000 men, many of which were the trained troops of the Colombian regular army, he was defeated and driven out of the country in less than a month.

Even if the question is to be answered upon the assumption that it is the duty of a government to protect foreigners absolutely from acts of revolutionists by preventive measures, and it is doubtful if the rule goes so far, Venezuela can not be held liable here, because the uprising did not begin in her territory, but in a neighboring state, which gave it immunity from any surveillance or repression, if not a fostering support.

Under these circumstances, in the opinion of the umpire, it would be contrary to justice and equity and at variance with the principles of international law to hold Venezuela liable in this case.

It is not intended by this opinion to decide that Venezuela may not be liable for acts of revolutionists in an insurrection prior to the Matos movement, where that insurrection is shown to be associated with and a part of that movement.

It results, therefore, that the claim must be disallowed.

MOHLE CASE.

Damages occasioned by revolutionary troops allowed because of admissions in protocol.

Doubt expressed by umpire whether he can accept statements of revolutionary authorities who are not experts or agents of the Government as to value of property taken.

Evidence as to values of like articles in another case before the Commission followed by umpire in the fixing of prices.

DUFFIELD, Umpire:

In this claim the Commissioners differ in opinion. The acts upon which it is based occurred during the revolution of General Matos, and the injuries complained of were done by his troops. Under the decision of the umpire in the case of Kummerow, the Government of Venezuela is liable by reason of its admission of liability in the protocol, the Matos revolution being embraced in the present civil war.

The Commissioner for Venezuela, while denying the liability of Venezuela, admits the committing of the injuries, but insists that the values of the property are exaggerated by the claimant, and contends that if Venezuela is liable it is only for 11,923.72 bolivars, for the reason that the appraisal of values made by the revolutionist officials who took the property can in nowise bind Venezuela and is no evidence of value. But the Commissioner for Germany, while admitting that they do not conclude Venezuela, insists that they are competent evidence of value, and is of the opinion that the full amount claimed should be allowed.

The Commissioner for Venezuela lists the articles taken at what he says are current prices, and is of the opinion that if any award is made it should be on this basis.

The umpire is of the opinion that, perhaps, under the Fennerstein Champagne cases, in the Supreme Court of the United States,<sup>a</sup> current prices are admissible in evidence. But there is, in his opinion, much force in the objection made by the Commissioner for Germany as to their accuracy in the appraisal of such property as is here in question. Moreover, the current prices which the Commissioner for Venezuela mentioned are not verified by price lists or any other evidence.

On the other hand, the umpire is extremely doubtful whether he would be authorized to follow the appraisal made by the revolutionist officials, who are not agents of Venezuela, and not shown to be familiar with the value of any of the property, except, perhaps, the horses. In this uncertainty he deemed it entirely proper to refer to the evidence put in the claim of Van Dissel by the Commissioner for Venezuela, stating the values of property of like character with that the values of which are disputed in this case. The competency of this evidence was not questioned by the Commissioner for Germany in that case.

Upon this basis the claimant will therefore be allowed for his items of damage as follows.

The following items the values of which are undisputed:

	Bolivars.
Fence .....	1, 200. 00
1 saddle horse .....	800. 00
Medicine .....	158. 00

Do .....	44. 00
Do .....	197. 60

And the following items, the value of which is disputed, but are fixed by the umpire, as follows:

	Bolivars.
125 head of cattle, at 63 bolivars .....	7, 875. 00
9 donkeys, at 40 bolivars .....	360. 00
24 head small cattle, at 40 bolivars .....	960. 00

Total, 14,631.88 bolivars, with interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum from July 15, 1903, up to and including December 31, 1903.

RICHTER CASE.

Discussion of facts.

DUFFIELD, Umpire:

The Commissioners disagree only as to the amount which should be awarded to the claimant. The claim is for injury to and taking of property of the claimant at his hacienda, Tucua, in the district of Mariño, in the State of Aragua. His original claim was for 19,262 pesos (77,048 bolivars), which sum, less 400 bolivars, viz, 76,648 bolivars, the Commissioner for Germany is of the opinion should be allowed at its full amount, with interest.

The Commissioner for Venezuela, however, is of the opinion that only 22,000 bolivars should be allowed. He bases this claim upon the following grounds: First, that the claimant claimed as lost things of which there is no proof, as, for instance, two trunks and a valise with clothes and jewels, which he values at 500 pesos; cash, 200 pesos; destruction of houses, which he values in different lots at more than 2,000 pesos. He is also of the opinion that the claimant largely exaggerates the value of the property, specifying growing crops of cane ready to cut as valued at 800 pesos per tablon, when it is not worth more than 200 pesos; also a 7-months' cane growth at 500 pesos per tablon, when it is not worth more than 150 pesos. He also thinks it a grave circumstance, indicating bad faith on the claimant's part, and an intention to make his claim as large as possible, that the claimant, after—this Commission decided that he should make his proof anew and before the judge of the court of first instance of La Victoria, the agent of the Government of Venezuela being present, the claimant, without waiting for a note to reach that judge, named two experts to judge of his list of prices.

Taking these objections in their order, the umpire is of opinion that there is proof of the loss of two trunks and the valise with clothes and jewels, and cash, and the destruction of the houses which the claimant values at more than 2,000 pesos. The list of articles taken, which the claimant made the basis of his claim, was, by order of the judge, annexed to the moving papers. And the witness Torealba testifies of his own knowledge that among the losses of the claimant were animals kept for working and breeding purposes, beasts, furniture, personal effects, cash, houses and huts on the hacienda, and a great number of working implements.

As to the exaggeration of values, the umpire finds no specific evidence to confirm the general statement in the opinion of the Commissioner. The testimony of the experts is not contradicted by any other specific evidence, and the appraisal is approved of by the judge after a personal survey of the premises. They are accredited by their appointment by the judge, and the umpire has found nothing in the case to indicate any lack of good faith and honesty on their part.

The objection by the Commissioner for Venezuela that two of the witnesses testify from notoriety and not from personal knowledge is not supported by the proof as to all the matters testified to by them while it is warranted as to certain matters. If they were the only witnesses there would be force in the objection to the extent that their testimony is based upon notoriety or hearsay. But the witness Torealba does testify from personal knowledge and is not contradicted.

The objection as to the exaggerated values is based upon the unsworn statement of the agent of Venezuela. It is not supported by the oath of any witness or corroborated by a detailed statement of particulars upon which the umpire can form any judgment except as to the value of the growing cane and the oxen. As to these a letter from a reputable commission house, dealers in and familiar with the value of these articles, is put in evidence, in which the value of a tablon (10,000 square varas) of cane, in the neighborhood of La Victoria, ready to be cut, is appraised at 800 bolivars, and a tablon of cane 7 months' old is appraised at 600 bolivars, and a pair of oxen at 400 bolivars, as against the claimant's figures on a tablon of cane ready to cut of 800 pesos (3,200 bolivars) and a tablon of cane 7 months' old, 500 pesos (2,000 bolivars). The discrepancy is so large that it is not reconcilable by mere difference of judgment. But on the one hand is the testimony of witnesses who swear they knew the property, while on the other the testimony is based on general market values. Ordinarily the first-mentioned testimony should govern, and if the witnesses had testified more in detail, and especially if they had testified as to a personal knowledge of the crops before their destruction, the umpire would have felt bound to accept their appraisal. In the absence, however, of such particularization, and considering the entire disinterestedness of the commission house in its appraisal, the umpire is convinced that there must be an error in the claimant's figures, notwithstanding their corroboration by the witnesses. For example, he claims for one tablon of "young" cane growth, one-half of which he claims was destroyed, as much as the commission house values a tablon of 7-months growth. For three other tablons of "young" cane growth, destroyed in whole or in part, he claims 500 pesos per tablon. For a tablon of 2-months growth he claims 300 pesos. In the opinion of the umpire these valuations are exaggerated and should be reduced. The umpire is of opinion that a fair value of a yoke of oxen would be 125 pesos. The umpire also allows the expenses of the additional testimony called for by the commissioners, 50 pesos, or 200 bolivars. The total cane destroyed is allowed at 6,500 pesos (26,300 bolivars).

While the testimony therefore is meager, and is especially so as to values, in the absence of any proofs to the contrary the umpire believes it his duty to accept it, save in the particulars above specified. The objection based upon the alleged lack of good faith and apparent intent of the claimant to recover an exaggerated and unjustifiable amount of damages by asking a different judge to select the experts would have had great weight with the umpire if the facts warranted it. But the umpire is unable to find any such proof in the "expediente" or in the proceedings of the Commission. First, it is inaccurate to say that the claimant had knowledge that this Commission decided that new proof must be made before the judge of the court of first instance of La Victoria. The record of the eighth session reads as follows in this respect:

And that he [the claimant] prove also, by means of a formal amplification of the proofs presented, the amount of the damages which he says he has suffered, with the intervention, if possible, of the representative of the agent of the Government of Venezuela, for which purpose the Venezuelan Commissioner will take charge of the steps necessary to be taken and will present at the next session informal letters, which he will address for the purpose to the judicial authorities in whose jurisdiction the above-mentioned properties are situated.

It appears by the records of the next sessions that such letters were not presented. The Commissioner for Germany states that in a letter dated the 27th of June last, a copy of which is attached to his opinion, he stated to the claimant that—the Commissioner for Venezuela will address a letter to the judges having jurisdiction, so that you will not meet with difficulties in the examination of the witnesses or experts you may present.

That the claimant on receipt of this letter asked the Commissioner for Germany if he could go to Tucua to gather proof, and if the communication had yet been sent to the judge, to which the Commissioner replied that it had left, having been shown by the Commissioner for Venezuela the draft of his note to the judge. It is also stated that the claimant had twice demanded that the President of the State of Aragua should name an agent to represent the Government.

It seems to the umpire that this conduct of the claimant is entirely consistent with good faith on his part. The agent of the Government was present at the examination of the experts and made no objection to the irregularity of the appointment. He was the legal representative for Venezuela and acted for her in the premises, and therefore had authority to waive any such irregularity, and by his conduct in making no objection did so waive it. Moreover, it will be borne in mind that the only irregularity was the appointment of the experts, and that the taking of the testimony was before the judge agreed to by the parties.

It is quite clear to the umpire that the understanding evidenced by the record of the eighth session was not to dispense with or throw out the testimony of the witnesses taken in 1902, but to amplify the proof with respect to values, and give the Government of Venezuela an opportunity to be present when testimony as to values was taken. This seems to have been done.

The umpire is therefore of the opinion that the claimant is not entitled to recover, under the proofs, the amount found due him by the Commissioner for Germany. It would undoubtedly have been more satisfactory if the claimant had made a more full presentation of evidence, both as to the property taken and as to its value. On the other hand, the character of the occupation of the hacienda by the troops of the Government was, at least to the claimant, a notorious event, and this may have induced him to think that comparatively little testimony was needed. It is also a fact of which the umpire can take judicial cognizance that occupation by troops of a property of this nature is always very destructive and damaging, especially to growing crops.

The claimant is therefore allowed the sum of 49,288 bolivars, with interest from the 22d of June, 1903, up to and including the 31st of December, 1903, at 3 per cent per annum.

METZGER CASE.

Law of domicile rules as to class of claims for damages to decedent which will survive to his estate.

Under the law of Venezuela the heirs may recover for bodily injuries, but not for damages to personal feelings or reputation.

DUFFIELD, Umpire:

The claimant alleges that on the 28th of May, 1902, while lawfully going from his house to his office, in Carúpano, he was assaulted by an officer of the Venezuelan army because the claimant would not give up the mule he was riding. The officer attempted to take the mule by force, and upon the claimant resisting another officer struck him two severe blows on the shoulder with a saber, inflicting serious injury. His life was also threatened, and he was subjected to other indignities.

If the occurrence had not arisen out of the demand for the mule it might be held that this was a purely wanton assault by the officer, for which, as the Venezuelan Commissioner contends, the Government of Venezuela could not be liable under the circumstances in the case.

But it is so notoriously the practice of army officers to impress property of this kind for the use of the Government, that I think Venezuela must be held liable for the act of the officer, if proven. It is said by Hall (4th ed., p. 226) that a government's—administrative officials, and its naval and military commanders are engaged in carrying out the policy and the particular orders of the government, and they are under the immediate and disciplinary control of the executive. * * * Where, consequently, acts or omissions which are productive of injury, in reasonable measure, to a foreign State or its subjects, are committed by persons of the classes mentioned, their Government is bound to disavow them, and to inflict punishment and give reparation when necessary.

It is contended, however, by the Commissioner for Venezuela, in opposition to the opinion of the Commissioner for Germany, that Venezuela is liable, that the "expediente" does not prove the case. He objects to the form of the testimony of the witnesses, and "their omission to explain the facts." He also claims that "Buran did not see what took place, as is inferred from the letter of the claimant on his complaint," and also that the testimony of the witnesses and the statement of the claimant conflict. Certainly the certificate signed by the two witnesses is irregular in form, and if the case stood only on it the umpire is of the opinion that it is insufficient. It has been held, however, in this Commission that under the protocol the declaration of the claimant is competent evidence.

The letter of the complainant, in the opinion of the umpire, is not susceptible of the inference that Buran did not see what took place. That letter simply named two witnesses. It is true that Buran was not one of them. He, however, took the place of one who was named and presumably for some reason did not testify. Neither do the testimony of the witnesses and the statement of the claimant disagree. The former is, as has been said, scarcely competent evidence, and is confined to the mere statement of the injuries. In this particular respect there is no discrepancy, the only difference being that the complainant amplifies, and properly so, the statement of facts.

Considering the case made by the proofs in its entirety, and especially the letter from General Velutini, in which he states that the "assailant of Mr. Metzger is still in prison expiating his crime," the umpire is of opinion that, notwithstanding the irregularities and insufficiencies pointed out by the Commissioner for Venezuela in the testimony, the fact of the injury itself is established.

The Commissioner for Venezuela, however, insists that the right of action does not survive and pass to the heirs of Metzger, who are, as shown by the proofs, his mother, sister, and brother, all of whom are German subjects. It is conceded that under the laws of Germany such right of action does not survive, but the German Commissioner is of the opinion that this is not a claim between an individual and Venezuela, but "an international demand which the German Empire makes." In the opinion of the umpire this position is not maintainable. A similar question arose before the American and British Claims Commission in the cases of McHugh, No. 357, Elizabeth Sherman, No. 359, and Elizabeth Brain, 447. (Moore's Digest of International Arbitration, vol. 4, p. 3278.) The United States demurred to the claim, insisting that the right of action did not survive, and that that was the law of both Great Britain and the United States. In the McHugh case the demurrer was sustained, apparently because he left only collateral relatives not dependent upon him for support. In the other two cases the demurrers were overruled, Mr. Commissioner Frazer dissenting. Upon the final hearing upon the merits, however, the claim of Mrs. Sherman was disallowed unanimously, and although an award was made in favor of Mrs. Brain it was only on account of property taken from her husband and included no damages for his imprisonment. (Moore, etc., p. 3280). All the Commissioners seem to have agreed with Mr. Commissioner Frazer in the opinion that under the treaty only claims "on the part of citizens or subjects of the respective countries are submitted to the Government." The protocol under which this Commission is acting is substantially similar, and the umpire agrees with the reasoning of Mr. Commissioner Frazer, and is of the opinion that the claim now before this Commission is not a claim of the German Nation but a claim of an individual.

The Venezuelan code gives the injured party a right to recover his damages in a civil action in all cases of torts. (Código Civ., Arts. 1116, 1118.)

ART. 1116. Every act of a man which causes injury to another makes him through whose fault the injury happened liable to make reparation for the same.

ART. 1118. He is also liable not only for the injury which he caused by his own act, but also for that caused by the act of persons for whom he is responsible, or by the things which he has in his care.

This is in addition to fine and punishment in a criminal prosecution.

The heirs of a decedent succeed to all his property rights at the moment of his death, and no actual taking of possession is necessary. (Id., Arts. 894 and 896.)

ART. 894. Succession is opened at the moment of death at the place of the last domicile of the deceased.

ART. 896. Possession of the property of the deceased passes by law to the heir without the necessity of taking physical possession.

A right of action for damages for personal injuries is property. A fortiori is the claim in this case which had been presented and proved before the death of Metzger.

It appears, therefore, that under the laws of Venezuela the right of action for personal injuries does survive and pass to the heirs of the deceased, in so far as damages for corporeal injuries is concerned. This, in the opinion of the umpire, presents a different case from the above cited. The question is ably and, in the opinion of the umpire, convincingly argued in the opinion of Mr. Commissioner Frazer. Following its reasoning, the umpire is of the opinion that the law of the domicile determines the rights. Metzger, therefore, being domiciled at the time of his death in Venezuela, his heirs will take according to Venezuelan law, and they may recover in this case such damages as are just for corporeal injuries, including the expense and loss of time which naturally followed the injury, but not for the damages to his feelings and reputation. Neither can anything be allowed in the way of punitive or exemplary damages against Venezuela, because it appears, as above stated, that the general commanding the army promptly took action against the offender and punished him by imprisonment.

The claimant states his damages at 20,000 bolivars, and the Commissioner for Germany is of the opinion that he should be allowed one-half that sum, or 10,000 bolivars. There is no evidence in the "expediente" to show how severe his wounds were, nor any evidence of medical or surgical treatment or of any expense on account of same, and the clear presumption from the proofs is that the injuries were not permanent and did not in any way conduce to his death. As has been said, the action of the Venezuelan Government in promptly arresting and punishing the offender relieves her from any liability for a malicious injury, and the damages which Metzger might have recovered, if still living, because of the insults and indignities and damages to his reputation and standing in the community, not passing to his heirs under either the German or the Venezuelan law, which excludes all damages save those based on corporeal injuries, the umpire is of the opinion that the amount allowed by the German Commissioner is not warranted. If the claimant had, as was his duty, particularized the nature, extent, and severity of his wounds, it would be much easier to make a satisfactory assessment, and if the amount allowed should not be full compensation, it is because of this lack of evidence.

Basing the amount to be awarded upon the grounds above stated, in the opinion of the umpire the sum of 3,000 bolivars is ample. It results that the claimant will be allowed 3,000 bolivars without interest.

BISCHOFF CASE.

Damages allowed for unreasonable detention of property, and injuries resulting thereto during that time, where original taking was lawful.

DUFFIELD, Umpire:

This claim is based on the taking of a carriage belonging to the claimant, at Caracas, in August, 1898, during an epidemic of smallpox. Information came to the police that the carriage had carried two persons afflicted with the disease, and the police conveyed it to the house of detention, where it remained for a considerable time. During this time it was exposed to the weather, and the claimant alleges it was substantially injured. Upon ascertaining that the information upon which they had acted was false, the police offered to return the carriage to the claimant, and the claimant refused to accept it unless they would pay for damage done to it. The claimant also asks 18,000 bolivars for injury to his business, counsel fees, 40 bolivars, and legal costs, 25 bolivars.

The Commissioner for Venezuela is of the opinion that there is no liability under this state of facts. The Commissioner for Germany, however, while admitting "that the taking was made in good faith, and because of the smallpox epidemic then existing was justified," is of the opinion that the claimant was not bound to accept the return of the carriage, and that Venezuela is liable for its value.

It seems to be well settled by the authorities that in the case of an original wrongful taking of personal property the owner is not bound to receive the property in an injured condition.

Where the owner of personal property has been tortiously deprived of it, he is not, it has been held, bound to accept its return or restoration, if proposed, but may stand upon his legal rights. (American and English Ency. of Law, 2d ed., Vol. VIII, p. 692, and cases cited.)

But this principle only applies in cases of wrongful taking. The case shows, and the Commissioner for Germany admits, that the carriage was taken in the proper exercise of discretion by the police authorities. Certainly during an epidemic of an infectious disease there can be no liability for the reasonable exercise of police power, even though a mistake is made. But it is held in a number of cases before arbitration commissions involving the taking and detention of property, where the original taking was lawful, that the defendant government is liable for damages for the detention of the property for an unreasonable length of time and injuries to the same during that period. (Moore, Vol. 4, pp. 3235 and 3265.)

In the case at bar the umpire is of opinion that these are the only damages recoverable. As the claimant presents no evidence of the amount of these injuries he can not recover on the case as made. His mistake in refusing to accept the carriage was a mistake of law and not of fact, and, in strict right, he perhaps can not demand an opportunity to show the amount of these injuries. The case, however, is a hard one, inasmuch as he has lost his carriage through the mistaken though law action of the police, and has undoubtedly suffered damage to his business, which, however, is not legally recoverable. Under the words of the protocol providing for the examination and decision of claims "according to principles of justice," and that "the decisions of the Commission shall be based upon absolute equity," in the opinion of the umpire it is a proper case in which to allow the claimant an opportunity to show his actual damage. If the Commissioners can not agree upon this amount without further proof the claimant will be allowed five days in which to make the same.

It results, of course, that there can be no allowance made for extra-judicial or other legal costs. In any event, the former are not recoverable under the opinion of the umpire rendered in the case of Hugo Valentiner. As to the latter, the umpire is of opinion that there is no power in the Commission to allow the costs of proving the claim. In all civil actions costs are created by statute, and only such are allowed as the statute provides for. It is true in the claim of Richter the claimant was allowed the costs of the additional testimony, but that was because the Commission itself had directed him to take it.

An entry will be made in the record in accordance with the above opinion.

FLOTHOW CASE.

Meaning of protocol in the provision for extending time for submission of claims.

DUFFIELD, Umpire:

In this case the opinion of the Commissioner for Germany is that the case should be received by the Commission and acted upon notwithstanding the fact that the time fixed by the protocol has expired, as has also the extended term fixed by the Commissioners at the seventh session, June 22, 1903. The Commissioner for Venezuela disagrees with this conclusion and is of the opinion that the extension of time made at the seventh session of the Commission, on the 22d day of June, 1903, exhausted the power of the Commissioner to make further extension, and that, moreover, the period covered by that extension having expired, the Commission has no power to create a new term.

The extension of the term at the seventh session was made by the agreement of the Commission without consultation with the umpire.

There is a decided misunderstanding by the Commissioners as to their action on the 22d of June, 1903, and even as to the accuracy of the record of that date. Fortunately it is not necessary to decide this difference. It appears upon a careful examination of the protocols that the translation into English which the Commission have been using contains a material error in the first paragraph of Article III of the additional agreement of May 7, 1903, the language of the translation being:

The claims shall be presented to the Commissioners by the Imperial German minister at Caracas before the 1st day of July, 1903. A reasonable extension of this term may eventually be granted by the Commissioners—while the original English duplicate, signed by Mr. Bowen and Baron von Sternberg, reads:

The claims shall be presented to the Commissioners by the imperial German minister at Caracas before the 1st day of July, 1903. A reasonable extension of this term may in proper cases be granted by the Commissioners.

If the former translation were correct, there would be much force in the argument of the Commissioner for Venezuela. The Commission, however, must accept the language of the protocol signed by the representatives of the two countries. Under its language no authority is given to the Commission to make a general extension of the term for the presentation of claims. This is the necessary and only inference from the words "in proper cases." The umpire is therefore of the opinion that the action of the Commissioners on June 22 does not affect the power of the Commission to consider on its merits the application of the claimant for permission to present his claim.

In the German text of the original protocol, signed by Baron von Sternberg and Mr. Bowen, the word "Commission" is used instead of the word "Commissioners" in the clause providing for the extension in proper cases. Basing his argument upon the English translation, the Commissioner for Venezuela has suggested that this may be a case in which the umpire, in case of disagreement of the Commissioners, has no power to decide. Even if the German original did not differ from the English, the umpire is of opinion that the word "Commissioners" as used in this article should properly be interpreted to mean the Commission. In other parts of the protocol the words "Commissioners" and "Commission" seem to have been used synonymously, and it is obvious that if the umpire had no authority to decide what is a reasonable extension in case of disagreement of the Commissioners, it would be entirely in the power of the Venezuelan Commissioner to prevent any extension that did not seem to him reasonable. Such an intention on the part of the representatives of the two countries can not, in the opinion of the umpire, be fairly presumed. Moreover, in the original protocol of February 13, 1903, to which the agreement of May 7 was supplemental, it is provided in Article IV: "in each case where the two members come to an agreement on the claim, their decision shall be final. In cases of disagreement the claims shall be submitted to the decision of an umpire to be nominated by the President of the United States of America." The claimant asks leave to present his claim upon the following grounds: It is based upon alleged injuries to and wrongful seizures of property on his breeding ranch, some of which occurred as late as May, 1903. This property was in charge of an agent of the owner, the latter having left Venezuela in 1901 and removed to Madrid with his family, where he still lives. It appears that the agent took the proofs which are offered in support of the claim in the latter part of June. They seem to be in proper form, although perhaps the evidence of the agent's authority may be subject to technical objections. Possibly on this account or for prudential reasons the agent deemed it necessary to send it on to his principal for approval. For some reason which does not appear they were sent to Germany and did not reach the claimant until about July 31, 1903. This occasioned the delay.

Under these circumstances the umpire is of the opinion that the case falls within the provision in the additional agreement of May 7, and is a proper one in which to grant an extension of the term fixed by the representatives of the two Governments.

While there is force in the objection of the Commissioner for Venezuela that the claimant may be presumed to have had knowledge of the protocol of February, it appears that the two Governments did not consider their convention complete as to modes of procedure and other matters provided for by the additional agreement of May 7. The earliest date, therefore, at which it would seem to have been incumbent on claimant to set about preparing his claim and proofs would be May, 1903, and as it also appears in this case that the injuries and seizure of property continued into that month, the case does not show, in the opinion of the umpire, an unreasonable delay on the part of the claimant.

In accordance with these conclusions, the claim will be admitted for the consideration and such disposition as the proof may warrant.

BREWER, MOLLER & Co. CASE.<sup>a</sup>

Taxes apparently legally levied and paid without protest can not be recovered.

DUFFIELD, Umpire:

The claimants ask to be allowed the sum of 20,283.20 marks which they have paid on account of taxes assessed against them by the municipality of San Cristóbal. They introduce in evidence a resolution of the municipal council of the district, dated the 28th day of September, 1902. This resolution recites that in the exercise of their authority under article 32 of the law providing for taxation for municipal purposes they have assessed the warehouses of the first class the sum of 3,000 bolivars every three months, and directs the junta clasificadora—board of assessors—to make the proper assessment and classification. Under this municipal action the claimants paid the sum above mentioned. They now seek to recover it from the Republic of Venezuela.

The Commissioners disagree as to the liability of Venezuela.

The umpire is unable to see any ground whatever on which to sustain this claim. The uniform presumption of the regularity and validity of all acts of public officials applies to this case, and there is not the slightest evidence or attempt to prove that these taxes were illegally levied. There is a statement in the expediente that only warehouses owned by Germans fell under the operation of this law. If it were shown that this tax was specially levied upon Germans owning warehouses, because they were Germans, or that for any other reason they were unlawfully classified, the allegation might need further consideration; but it so clearly appears that the tax is a general one, and that the classification is made upon a basis of the values of property, that it excludes any such inference. Moreover, the claimants do not appear to have raised any objection to the classification, but paid the taxes voluntarily. It is a settled law that the voluntary payment of taxes purporting to be levied under a valid law waives all irregularities in the assessment. It is very doubtful if the Republic of Venezuela could under any circumstances be made liable to the amount of irregular or illegal taxes collected by one of the municipal districts. But it is not necessary to decide this, as upon the whole case as made there is an absolute want of equity in the claim, even as against the municipal district of San Cristóbal.

It results that the claim must be wholly disallowed.

CHRISTERN &amp; Co. CASE.

Beckman case affirmed (see p. 598).

In the absence of specified rate of interest only legal rate recoverable. Compound interest refused.

DUFFIELD, Umpire:

The claimant asks the sum of 21,256.12 bolivars. This sum is made up of 2,800 bolivars for cattle taken by the Government, 7,996.71 bolivars for war duties, so called, being an increase of 30 per cent of the previous customs duties imposed by a decree of the National Government dated the 16th of February, 1903, and 10,459.41 bolivars for a debt of the State of Zulia.

The Commissioners disagree as the liability of Venezuela for the first and third items, but agree to the disallowance of the second item.

The umpire is of the opinion that the proofs do not make out a case of vested right in the claimants under the customs law which they count upon, and that the decision of the Commissioners in respect of this item is correct.

The Commissioner does not dispute the fact or the value of the cattle taken by the Government of Venezuela, but he claims that Venezuela is discharged from liability because of a novation between the claimants and the State of Zulia. Granting this premise, the umpire is of the opinion that the Government of Venezuela is still liable for the claim. His reasons for this conclusion are stated in full in the case of Beckman.<sup>a</sup>

The decision in that case also decides the liability of Venezuela for the loan to the State of Zulia. The Commissioner for Germany, however, allows the claimants the full amount of this item of their claim, 10,459.41 bolivars, with the usual interest. This amount includes interest at 1 per cent a month, compounded with yearly rests, and increases the original amount of the item thereby 4,589.37 bolivars. The umpire is unable to concur in this finding. He does not find any warrant or authority in the proofs for compounding interest. Neither do the proofs show that under the agreement made on the 14th of February, 1900, between the representatives of the government of Zulia and the parties who made the war loan for the purpose of adjusting the amount due, of which the claimants' share was 11,625.04 bolivars, there was any agreement for any rate of interest on the amount then agreed upon. There is also an entire absence of proof as to the rate of interest which the original loan was to bear. It is too clear to need argument that if no rate of interest is agreed upon by the parties, only the legal rate can be allowed. This rate in Venezuela is 3 per cent per annum. Instead, therefore, of allowing the sum named by the Commissioner for Germany, the item is allowed at the sum of 6,083.22 bolivars, being the original amount of loan, 11,254.04 bolivars, with interest at 3 per cent from February 14, 1900, to December 31, 1903, less the payments made thereon and interest on those payments.

For the same reasons the umpire concurs in the decision of the Commissioner for Germany as to the first item, and awards therefor the sum of 2,800 bolivars, with interest from the date of the presentation of the claim, August 3, 1903, up to and including December 31, 1903. Total amount awarded claimants, 8,917.74 bolivars.

ORINOCO ASPHALT CASE.

A government has no right to close ports of the country which are in the hands of insurgents unless it can maintain the blockade by force.<sup>a</sup>

DUFFIELD, Umpire:

The Commissioners have agreed upon the allowance of the first six items of the claim, at 4,414.82 bolivars. They disagree upon items 7 and 8. These are based upon the alleged refusal of the Venezuelan consul at Trinidad, for the period between April and October, 1902—twenty-two weeks—to give clearance papers to the boats of the company, Ibis and Explorador, from Port of Spain, Trinidad, where the principal office of the company is, to the Island of Pedernales, where its mines are, in consequence of which the said boats were forced to lie in Port of Spain for the period in question, and communication between the mines and the outside world was cut off. In addition to its rights under international law, the company asserts the concession to it from the Government of Venezuela to maintain communication between its mines and Trinidad by means of its boats used for that purpose, and in support of it sets up an Executive decree of February 7, 1901; it also claims a right under the laws of Venezuela—la ley XVI de Hacienda, Artículo 39. The damages arising from this act of the Government are presented in detail.

The Commissioner for Venezuela maintains that his Government is not liable, because in April, 1902, revolutionary forces occupied the country about Pedernales, where the mine of Pedernales is, and Guiria, where the custom-house of Venezuela for that territory is situated, and the Venezuelan consul refused to clear the boats on that account. He insists that the action of the consul was justified because the—boats which were cleared from Guiria would serve the revolution which took them; and besides, if the revolution collected duties it would bring them in money resources, and that the Government of Venezuela had declared the blockade of these regions, and the consul in Trinidad obeyed the Government's decrees. That because of the war, guarantees were suspended, and in such a period free transit or free traffic especially suffers when it is a traffic of boats which may serve or do serve the revolutionists, and that in no event would Venezuela consuls clear boats for places occupied by the rebels.

The first contention of the Commissioner for Germany, based upon an alleged concession to the company, is not supported by the facts. Article 1 of the Executive decree of the 7th of February, 1901, is as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The port of Pedernales, on the island of the same name in the delta of the Orinoco, is established only for the exportation of asphalt and petroleum which is taken from the mines belonging to the Orinoco Asphalt Company.

In the opinion of the umpire, this is in no legal sense a legal concession; no consideration appears to have been given for it. It is a mere privilege or favor shown to the company, by which, instead of clearing for or from Guiria, they may clear from Port of Spain to the island where their works are, and vice versa. So far as this decree goes, the umpire is clearly of the opinion that it might be at any time revoked by the Government of Venezuela.

The argument that any special rights were conferred upon the company or any other importers by article 39 of the sixteenth law of hacienda is not, in the opinion of the umpire, maintainable. The law merely provides and prescribes the official duties of consuls, for the ordinary breach of which it would seem clear that Venezuela would not be liable, and that the party injured thereby must look to the consul and his bond for indemnification.

The case, therefore, must be decided upon general principles of international law, whether Venezuela, even though her ports were in the possession of revolutionists, might lawfully close them to traffic with neutrals. That she did so in this case, and that the consul acted under her instructions, is not disputed.

It is said in Wharton's Digest of International Law, section 361, that the received tenets of international law do not admit that a decree of a sovereign government closing certain national ports in the possession of foreign enemies or of insurgents has any international effect, unless sustained by a blockading force sufficient to practically close such port.

Mr. Lawrence, in a note on Wheaton, Bk. IV, chapter 4, paragraph 5, states the rule and the reasons for it as follows:

Nor does the law of blockade differ in civil war from what it is in foreign war. Trade between foreigners and a port in possession of one of the parties to the contest can not be prevented by a municipal interdict of the other. For this on principle the most obvious reason exists. The waters adjacent to the coast of a country are deemed within its jurisdictional limit only because they can be commanded from the shore. It thence follows that whenever the dominion over the land is lost by its passing under the control of another power, whether in foreign war or civil war, the sovereignty over the waters capable of being controlled from the land likewise ceases.

In 1861 New Granada being in a state of civil war, its Government announced that certain ports would be closed, not by blockade, but by order, and it was held that the method was one which could not be adopted against a foreign enemy holding the ports in question, and consequently could not be adopted against a domestic enemy. Lord John Russell said on this subject that—"it was perfectly competent for the government of a country in a state of tranquillity to say which ports should be open to trade and which should be closed; but in the event of insurrection or civil war in that country, it was not competent for its government to close ports which were de facto in the hands of the insurrectionists, and that such a proceeding would be an invasion of the international law relating to blockades." Subsequently the Government of the United States proposed to adopt the same measure against the ports of the Southern States, upon which Lord John Russell wrote to Lord Lyons that "Her Majesty's Government entirely concur with the French Government in the opinion that a decree closing the southern ports would be entirely illegal, and would be an evasion of that recognized maxim of the law of nations that the ports of a belligerent can only be closed by an effective blockade." In neither case was the order carried out. In 1885 the President of Colombia, during the existence of civil war, declared [certain ports] to be closed without instituting a blockade. Mr. Bayard, Secretary of State for the United States, in a despatch of April 24th of that year fully adopted the principle of the illegitimateness of such closure, and refused to acknowledge that which had been declared by Colombia. (Hall, p. 37, note.)

In the case of the Only Son the umpire of the United States and British Commission of 1863 allowed the claim of the owners of the schooner of that name for the wrongful act of the collector of customs at Halifax, Nova Scotia, compelling the master of the schooner to enter his vessel and pay duty on his cargo, instead of reporting for a market and proceeding elsewhere if he thought it advisable. In the preceding diplomatic correspondence the British Government had acknowledged its liability, but claimed that no loss was suffered. (Moore on Arbitration, pp. 3404-3405.)

In the case of the William Lee, a whaling ship detained for three months by the refusal of the port to give a clearance, the claimant was allowed $22,000. (Moore, pp. 3405-3406.)

In the case of the Labuan, United States and British Claims Commission, 1871, the claimant was allowed by the unanimous judgment of the Commission $37,392 because the custom-house officials at New York refused his vessel a clearance from November 5 to December 13, 1862. The action of the custom-house in New York was in pursuance of instructions from the United States Government, which claimed the right to detain the ship, in common with other vessels of great speed destined for ports in the Gulf of Mexico, in order to prevent the transmission of information relative to the departure or proposed departure of a military expedition fitted out by the authorities of the United States. The contention of the claimant's counsel was that the refusal to clear the vessel was in effect taking private property for public use, and, while it may have been justified by the necessity of the case, it involved the obligation of compensation, citing 3 Phillimore, 42, and Dana's Wheaton, 152, note. (Moore, pp. 3791-3793.)

The umpire is therefore of the opinion that the Government of Venezuela was not justified in directing its consul at the Port of Spain to refuse clearances to the ships of the claimant company. It appears from the case, however, that the Venezuelan consul at the Port of Spain offered to clear—the boats belonging to that company, which she intends shall carry provisions to the laborers in the mines. * * * But under the written conditions sent by the Government * * * that that company must pay into this consulate, upon the delivery of the clearance of this boat, the amount of all the duties which it would have to pay at the custom-house at Guiría.

This conditional permission was not accepted, and the claimant was justified in refusing it.

It results that the claimant company is entitled to recover such damages as they have established by their proof, which are:

Item 7a, 640 bolivars for the loss of freight for the lighter Ibis, 40 tons capacity, one trip in the month of April.

Item 8a, for loss of freight of lighter Ibis, twenty-two weeks, 22 voyages, at 1,248 bolivars the round trip, 27,456 bolivars. It is held by the courts of England and the United States that damages in cases of demurrage, which is entirely analogous to the claimant's claim, if it is not in fact demurrage, are measured by the value of the use of the vessel. (Re Trent v. Humber Company, Eng. Law Reports, 4th Chancery, 112; The Pietro G., 39th Federal Reporter, U. S., 366.) The United States Supreme Court have held, in The Potomac v. Conor (105 U. S., 630), that the average of net profits on the trip for the season may be adopted as the measure of damages for the loss of the use of the vessel resulting from collision. This latter case, however, was the case of a merchant vessel doing a general carrying business. The Ibis, it appears, was the company's own property and engaged in transporting the company's freight. It is quite certain that it would have had full freight from Pedernales to Trinidad on every voyage, and, taking into consideration the carrying on the return trip of supplies for the mines and food for the men, as well as machinery, it is fair and reasonable to believe that she would have had full freight on her return trip.

The umpire therefore agrees with the Commissioner for Germany in the allowance of items 7 and 8a, viz, 624 bolivars and 27,456 bolivars.

Item 8b, for injuries occasioned to the Ibis by her long stay in salt water, 728 bolivars, is certainly a proper charge. It is held by the Supreme Court of the United States, if a vessel is capable of being repaired and restored to her original condition, the cost of such necessary repairs is a correct rule of damage. (The Granite State, 3 Wall., 310; The Baltimore, 8 Wall., 377.)

Item 8c, 4,520.66 bolivars for the wages of the captain and crew of the Explorador during the time she was detained in Port of Spain, seems reasonable in amount, and no reason is presented in the opinion of the Commissioner for Venezuela why it should not be allowed. The umpire agrees in the allowance by the Commissioner for Germany of this item.

The same is true of item 8d, which is like 8b except that it is for the Explorador instead of the Ibis. For the reasons stated in the other item, the amount is allowed, 829.74 bolivars.

Item 8h, 161,200 bolivars, is made up by the claimant as follows: By reason of the action of Venezuela, through her consul in Trinidad, the Explorador and the Ibis were practically put out of commission from the latter part of April to some time in October, 1902—twenty-two weeks. As the claimant was unable to use the boats, and presumably for the same reason which prevented their use could not have obtained the services of any other vessels, even if they could have cleared for Pedernales, which under the decree establishing that port is doubtful, all operations at the mines were stopped because the character of the asphalt was such that any long exposure depreciated its quality and value. The claimant therefore charges for one hundred and twelve working days during this period, and claims that the normal production of the mines was 30 tons a day, and they could have produced during those days 3,360 tons, which was worth $25 United States gold (130 bolivars) a ton, which was the average price for the whole of that year, aggregating 436,800 bolivars, less the expense of production, transportation, and exportation, 275,600 bolivars, leaving a balance of 161,200 bolivars. It will be seen, however, that this makes no deduction for the value of 3,360 tons of asphalt at the mine; but this asphalt was never removed, and is still presumably as good in its natural state as it was during the period in question. There is no claim that the market value of the asphalt has fallen, and for three months of the year 1902 the claimant's basis of $25 United States gold (130 bolivars) per ton would govern. There is no evidence of the value of the asphalt at the mines in its natural state, although in its trial balance of December, 1901, the company puts in the item of real estate, including the asphalt mine at 405,326 marks. It seems very clear that the principal sum of 161,200 bolivars can not be recovered.

In the absence of any testimony on which any definite appraisal of the value of the asphalt at the mines can be based, the claimant has not shown the actual amount of his damage. In the opinion of the umpire a fair, and perhaps the only, measure of damage is interest on the amount for which the product of the mines would have sold during the period of stoppage of traffic. Perhaps mathematical accuracy might require this interest to be calculated for the average time, but under all the circumstances of the case the umpire is of opinion that it is just to allow interest for the entire period. The award made by the Commissioner for Germany on this item will therefore be reduced to interest for one hundred and fifty-four days at 5 per cent on 161,200 bolivars, namely, 3,447.84 bolivars.

On these figures the aggregate sum of 42,027.78 bolivars is awarded to the claimant, which includes the 4,466 bolivars agreed to by the commissioners for items 1-6, inclusive, with interest at 3 per cent per annum on 37,606.46 bolivars from the date of the presentation of the claim, August 10, 1903, to and including December 31, 1903.

WENZEL CASE.

Amnesty granted by the Chief Executive of Venezuela, being in excess of his powers, does not make the State liable for damages inflicted by the persons pardoned.

DUFFIELD, Umpire:

This claim is for 19,801.31 marks. The commissioners agree that certain items of the claim should be disallowed, but disagree as to item 4, for injuries to property inflicted by the revolutionist forces under General Hernandez in November, 1899, and March 1900, for which damages are claimed in the sum of 15,035 bolivars.

The Commissioner for Germany is of the opinion that this item should be allowed at its full amount, with interest, while the Commissioner for Venezuela is of the opinion that it should be entirely disallowed. The Commissioner for Venezuela is of the opinion that because the acts complained of were those of revolutionists Venezuela is not liable and because the claim is covered by the decision of the umpire in the case of Van Dissel & Co. In the claim of Van Dissel & Co. the acts of revolutionists under General Garbiras were under question, and the opinion specially confined the effect of the decision to that revolution, saying: "It is not intended by this opinion to decide that Venezuela may not be liable for acts of revolutionists in an insurrection prior to the Matos movement." Following this decision, the claim of John Koehl, No. 31, was disallowed. In that case the injuries complained of were by Hernandez revolutionists. The case, however, was presented to the umpire for a formal decision, the commissioners agreeing upon the amount and that it was controlled by the Van Dissel case.

In the present case the Commissioner for Germany insists that Venezuela is liable for the acts in question, first, because the admission in Article III of the protocol should receive a broader construction than given to it by the umpire in the Van Dissel case,<sup>a</sup> and, second, because a general amnesty was granted to the Hernandez revolutionists and General Hernandez himself is now representing the Government of Venezuela as its minister to the United States.

The umpire is unable to agree with the Commissioner for Germany in his construction of Article III, but adheres to his former opinion. The second point, however, is for the first time raised in this Commission. The precedents of former arbitral commissions seem to be in favor of the contention of the Commissioner for Germany. In the Montijo case the Hon. Robert Bunch, British minister to Bogotá, was the umpire. It was argued by the arbitrator for Colombia on this point that as a general amnesty in favor of Messrs. Herrera, Díaz, and all other persons concerned in the attempted revolution of April and May, 1871, was subsequently granted by the President of the State of Panama in the exercise of his constitutional powers, no judicial proceedings could be instituted against them as revolutionists, and consequently for injuries done by them nothing could be recovered from them by either foreigner or native.

To this argument the umpire noted two objections:

The first is that, even in the absence of any express stipulation to that effect, the grantor of an amnesty assumes as his own the liabilities previously incurred by the objects of his pardon toward persons or things over which the grantor has no control. In the present case it will scarcely be contended that the captors of the Montijo had any right beyond that emanating from a revolutionary movement to take the vessel from the dominion of her owners. * * *

If no amnesty had ever been granted, and had Herrera, Díaz, and their associates been honestly and effectively proceeded against in the courts of the Republic and cast in damages toward the owner, the aspect of the case would have entirely changed. It would have been at least an open question whether their possible or even notorious inability to pay those damages would have rendered Colombia at large responsible for their act. But the amnesty deprived the Messrs. Schuber of the power of trying the question. Therefore the President of Panama, having no right to dispose of interests which were not his property, and which, on the contrary, he was bound by a public treaty to protect, assumed the responsibility to the owners of those interests of the persons by whom they had been injured. It is an old saying that one must be just before one is generous. In Spanish the version is "La bolsa ajena es muy franca."

The distinguished rank of the umpire as a diplomat and the legal ability which is shown in all his opinions, as well as the reasons given for his conclusions, make his opinion worthy of the most serious consideration. (Moore on Arbitration, 1421, 1427, 1438. See also decision of the Mixed Commission in the Col. Lloyd Aspinwall case; Moore, 1015-1016.)

But it must be borne in mind that it appeared in that case that a treaty of peace was made by the president of the State of Panama with Herrera, chief of the revolutionists, by Article VII of which a complete amnesty was reciprocally granted and "the Government assumes as its own the expense of the steamers and other vehicles which the revolution has had to make use of up to that date." (Moore, p. 1428.) The decision might well have put in this provision, and that portion of the opinion as to the effect of amnesty generally may be treated as obiter dictum.

Venezuela was held liable in damages by the United States and the Venezuelan Commission, under the convention of December 5, 1885, for not punishing the insurgents who attacked General García's forces on board the American steamer Apure in 1865. The Commission held that there was not a state of war in Venezuela, although there was an armed conflict between the president of the State of Apure and his enemies under Generals Sosa and Mendez. (Opinions, pp. 481-482; Moore's Arbitrations, p. 2967.)

Mr. Commissioner Little said:

The criminals were the conspirators upon the shore. Venezuela's responsibility and liability in the matter are to be determined and measured by her conduct in ascertaining and bringing to justice the guilty parties. If she did all that could be reasonably required in that behalf, she is to be held blameless; otherwise, not. Without entering upon a discussion of the investigation instituted and conducted by her, * * * it was notorious who they were. It does not seem that any attempt was made before any local authority to bring them or any of the band to justice. Had there been a well-directed effort of that kind, or had the Government's investigation disclosed their innocence and failed to discover those actually guilty, its responsibility would perhaps have ended, assuming the investigation, as I do, was a fair and just one. But neither of these things appears to have occurred. * * * On the whole, however, considering the heinous character of the offense, it may fairly be said that Venezuela here fell short of her entire duty.<sup>a</sup>

Mr. Commissioner Findlay said:

A State, however, is liable for wrongs inflicted upon the citizens of another State in any case where the offender is permitted to go at large without being called to account or punished for his offense or some honest endeavor made for his arrest and punishment. (Opinions, p. 486; Moore's Arbitrations, p. 2969.)

It must be borne in mind that this case was a seizure of an American steamer, which may be distinguished from injuries or seizures of property by movements of opposing troops in active operations. (See brief of counsel for claimant in the Venezuelan Transportation Company case.)

In the United States and Venezuelan Claims Commission in 1895, in the case of the Venezuelan Steam Transportation Company, the Commissioners awarded the claimant damages for injuries to the steamers belonging to the claimant inflicted by insurgent authorities.<sup>b</sup> (See Report of Commission.)

In an exceedingly able opinion, Mr. Commissioner Andrade dissents from the award of the Commission. But in the course of his reasoning he does not deny the above rule, but impliedly, if not expressly, admits it. He says:

As a general rule the private acts of citizens do not compromise the liability of the State, save when it can prevent these and fails to do so, or when, after their consummation, it approves or ratifies them in some way. (Moore, p. 1730.)

In the case before him, however, he claimed that if for reasons of state Venezuela thought proper, in 1873, to seal the national peace with forgiveness for all political offenses, no other sovereignty has the right to call her to account for that sovereign act.

In the opinion of the umpire, while this statement is true, it does not follow, and the learned Commissioner seems to have refrained from saying, that the consequences of such forgiveness of political offenses which have injured neutrals may not be a liability on the part of the State. In that case, however, the revolutionists who committed the injuries succeeded and their leader, General Blanco, established a constitutional government.

There are no reasons stated by the majority of the Commissioners for the award, but from the brief of counsel for the claimants it appears that it may have passed on other grounds, viz, the culpable failure of the Venezuelan Government to take adequate measures to prevent the seizure of the company's steamers, although they knew that they were in danger, and that they were carrying Venezuelan mails under the United States flag; that the Government allowed the town of Bolívar to remain for nearly six months in the hands of the "Blues," and permitted them to move quietly away when the Government forces approached; that a fort near the mouth of the Orinoco was held against the Venezuelan Government as late as January, 1872, by a "Blue" officer and his wife with two old-fashioned smoothbore guns, equally dangerous at both ends; and that the right granted the company by the Venezuelan Congress to fly the flag of the United States on their vessels was a pledge by the people of Venezuela that they would not violate any of the rights and privileges of the vessels or their officers under its protection. And special stress was laid by counsel upon the distinction between injuries to persons or property in the theater of active hostilities, "for which," they say, "governments are not responsible, and deliberate seizures of neutral vessels under the flag of their country."

The case of Divine (Moore, p. 2980) is contra. The claim was for setting fire to a house and all its contents in Matamoras, Mexico, in 1851.

The city [says Moore] had been in the possession of General Avalos, military commander of the State of Tamaulipas, and General Carvajal had placed himself at the head of a movement to displace his authority. Carvajal besieged the city, and at length assaulted it. In the course of the assault the house in question was destroyed, though the American consul, at the risk of his life, placed himself between the combatants, and, displaying the American flag, besought them to spare the property.

Mr. Ashton, agent of the United States, in his brief to support the claim, established that General Carvajal, having been conquered in Tamaulipas, was pardoned by means of a general amnesty and restored to his civil rights; was afterwards a brigadier-general and civil and military governor of Tamaulipas and other States, and was afterwards, in 1864, sent to the United States as commissioner with extraordinary powers, and was named and continued to be a major-general in the Mexican army. Under these circumstances Mr. Ashton sustained the liability of the Mexican Government.

The umpire, Sir Edward Thornton, said:

It is alleged by the claimants themselves that the destruction of the property on account of which the claim is made was due to the acts of rebels, and for this reason alone the umpire is of opinion that the Mexican Government can not be called upon to make compensation for the damage done. * * * It is urged [he adds] that the Mexican Government granted an amnesty to Carvajal, and therefore made itself responsible for his acts. Other governments, including that of the United States, have pardoned rebels, but they have not on this account engaged to reimburse to private individuals the losses caused by those rebels.

But it is further contended by the Commissioner for Venezuela that there was no amnesty granted to the Hernandez revolutionists, and the imprisonment of General Hernandez, the leader, lends this position some support.

In connection with the release of General Hernandez, General Castro, on the 9th of December, 1902, issued a proclamation in which, after denouncing the action of the allied powers in seizing the war ships and ports of Venezuela, and calling on all Venezuelans to lay aside all differences and rally to the defense of their country, said:

And seeing that this [the country] can not be great and powerful except in the pure air of brotherhood of all its sons—and circumstances demand the union of them all—in the name of my sentiments and her necessities above expressed, I open the doors of all the prisons of the Republic to the political prisoners who are still confined therein. I likewise open the doors of the country to Venezuelans who for the same reasons are in foreign lands, and I restore to the enjoyment of the constitutional guaranties property of all revolutionists which was embargoed for reasons of public order.

It is contended by the Commissioner for Venezuela, first, that this language can not be interpreted as an amnesty; and, second, that under the constitution of Venezuela the President has no power to grant amnesty. In the opinion of the umpire a general pardon of past offenses by a government is an amnesty, which is commonly defined to be an act of oblivion. Its effect is that the crimes and offenses named in the act are obliterated, and they can never again be charged against the guilty parties. Where no offenses are named in the act the amnesty is general. The preamble of this proclamation would seem to necessitate an interpretation of the paragraph above quoted, which absolves from all punishment in the courts or by the authorities of Venezuela all political prisoners in Venezuela and all political offenders in other countries for any act committed by them while in rebellion.

Under a system of Government in which the Executive has the pardoning power it might be difficult to sustain the contention of the Commissioner for Venezuela. But it is not necessary to decide this question. The constitution of Venezuela is peculiar in this respect, and in the opinion of the umpire it sustains the position of the Commissioner for Venezuela. It confers no power upon the Executive to grant amnesties, but in express terms gives the legislative branch of the Government that power. Article 54, section 21, of the constitution of Venezuela of 1901 provides:

The Congress of the United States of Venezuela shall have the following powers:

General Hernandez on the 2d of March, 1898, organized an insurrectionary movement which extended to all the States of the Republic. It ended with the capture of General Hernandez at La Vega on the 12th of June. It comprised eighty-four armed encounters, in one of which General Crespo was killed—the battle of Carmelora, in the year 1898. General Hernandez was captured and imprisoned at San Carlos fortress. The revolution of the restoration under General Castro began on May 23, 1899, on which day, after his first battle at Tonono, he issued a manifesto, taking for the standard of his armed movement the restoration of the constitution he alleged had been violated by the high powers of the nation. General Hernandez was still in prison in San Carlos fortress, but many of his followers joined in the Castro insurrection. On the day after General Castro made his triumphal entry into Caracas, he set at liberty the political prisoners whom the government of Andrade had imprisoned, and among them General Hernandez, leader of the first nationalist revolution, and appointed the latter his minister of public works. A few days thereafter Hernandez left Caracas by stealth, accompanied by the forces of Gen. Samuel Acosta, his companion in arms in the first nationalist revolution, and proclaimed a revolution against the government of General Castro. It was in this last revolution that the injuries complained of occurred. He was again defeated, and on May 27, 1900, imprisoned in the fortress of San Carlos for some time. He remained there until the 11th of December, 1902, when he was set at liberty under the proclamation above referred to and came to Caracas, to parley with General Castro. He has since then supported the Government and has been sent to represent it as minister to the United States.

The claim therefore falls within the decisions in the cases of Van Dissel & Co., No. 11, and John Roehl, No. 31, and is disallowed.

BREWSTER, MOLLER &amp; CO. CASE (second case).

Beckman case (p. 598) affirmed.

Faber case (p. 600) affirmed.

Meaning of "local legislation" and "technical objections," as set forth in protocol.

DUFFIELD, Umpire:

The claim in this case is for 843,705.36 bolivars, made up of the following items:

1. War duties.
2. Acts of piracy.
3. There is no proof of item 3 and no reference to it in the expediente.

4. The debt of the State of Zulia.

5 and 6. Injuries to and seizures of property by Government troops and revolutionists.

Part of 7 and all of 8. Damages caused by the closing of ports on the Catatumbo and Zulia rivers.

Part of 7. Stoppage of mails in connection with the closing of the ports on the Catatumbo River.

9. Share of claimant in the claim of the Lake Maracaibo and Catatumbo River Navigation Company.

Of these items 1 and 2 were disallowed by agreement of the Commissioners; 5 and 6 allowed by agreement of the Commissioners at 33,958 bolivars.

Item 4, for the debt of the State of Zulia, is allowed by the umpire under the decision in the case of Beckman & Co., No. 47, in the sum of 53,296.67 bolivars.<sup>a</sup>

Part of 7 and all of 8 are disallowed by the umpire under the ruling in the case of George Faber, No. 53.<sup>b</sup>

The remaining portion of item 7, for damages alleged to have been suffered by the interruption of the postal service in connection with the closing of the ports on the Catatumbo River, 75,000 marks, is, in the opinion of the Commissioner for Germany, a valid claim against Venezuela and should be allowed. He is of the opinion that the stoppage of the mails is in violation of the International Postal Union treaty of Washington.

It appears from the statement of the claim that following the closure of the ports on the rivers Zulia and Catatumbo this stoppage of mails occurred. It is evident that the established postal route between Maracaibo and Cucuta was necessarily abrogated by this action of the Government of Venezuela, and it is difficult to see how a claim can be sustained before this Commission on this ground. However, it clearly appears from the "expediente" that there is no proof of any special elements or items of damage to the claimants upon which any calculation or legal estimate of the amount of damage they suffered in consequence can be made. In the absence of any such proof, therefore, the sum claimed can not be allowed.

Item 9, 98,240 bolivars is for the claimant's share, 25 per cent of the credit which the Lake Maracaibo and Catatumbo River Navigation Company have against the Government of Venezuela. It is agreed by the Commissioners that this credit amounts to 162,218.03 bolivars. But it is claimed by the Commissioner for Venezuela that claimants have no legal interest therein. In support of this contention he cites the Venezuelan Code of Commerce, page 388, articles 242-247. The first five articles describe "Associations of accounts in participation" (Asociaciones de cuentas en participación), and the rights and liabilities of persons interested therein. Article 247 exempts these associations from the formal requisites required from companies by articles 162, 163, and 168.

By article 242 the party giving participation in the profits or losses of his business on one or more operations thereof is the managing agent, and by article 244 the persons participating in the profits or losses have no right of property in the effects and property of the association, not even in that which they themselves have contributed. Their only right is to have an account of what they have contributed in the losses or profits of the operation. By article 245, in case of failure, they are placed in the column of creditors in case their contribution of capital exceeds its proportion of losses.

It is agreed by the Commissioners that there is no regularly formed association or partnership known as "Lake Maracaibo and River Catatumbo Navigation Company," but that the concern popularly so known is in reality Piñedo, García & Co., Brewer, Moller & Co., Luciano Añez & Co., and Van Dissel & Co. On the 1st of October, 1900, they formed this association by the articles of agreement marked "Exhibit 6" in the "expediente." Under them Piñedo, García & Co. are made administrators and have entire charge of the management of the business and the control and conduct of its properties, and in all respects appear to be the "merchant"—"comerciante"—described in article 246 of the code of commerce above referred to. Under these circumstances the umpire is clearly of the opinion that none of the other parties to the agreement of October 1 have, in the language of article 244, "any right of property in the effects of the association, not even in those in which they themselves have contributed."

But it is claimed by the Commissioner for Germany that under the precedents of decisions by former international tribunals coowners of property such as the "owners of commercial funds may enforce their several interests in a claim in a diplomatic proceeding," and that the objection of the Venezuelan Commissioner that "the company can only figure as an entity," and that it is inadmissible to award their parts to each of the partners, is a technical objection, lacking support in international law; and, further, that the provisions of Venezuela are not binding on this Commission under the protocol which requires that it disregard provisions of local legislation.

Taking up these objections in their inverse order—

First. The umpire is of the opinion that the articles of the code in question are not local legislation within the meaning of the protocol. The parties to the protocol primarily intended by these words, it is quite evident, that Venezuela should be estopped from insisting upon the general provision in her law requiring foreigners as well as citizens to present their claims against the Government to the courts of Venezuela. Incidentally, of course, like provisions of local legislation were intended to be excluded; but it can not be presumed that all the laws of Venezuela with reference to the formation of corporations or of partnerships, or of limited associations, or in respect to the rights and obligations of holders of real estate were so included. Neither can it be reasonably presumed that it was intended to estop

Venezuela from invoking the provision of local legislation to which foreigners, by associating themselves with Venezuelans, and by their voluntary and solemnly executed consent, had agreed. A fortiori must this be the case under circumstances like those under consideration, where, by the agreement between the foreigners and the Venezuelan citizens, the foreigners expressly stipulate that all right of property in the effects of the association shall be vested in the Venezuelan citizen.

Second. The umpire is unable to regard the objection of the Commissioner for Venezuela as a technical one, in the sense of the protocol. Certainly under the protocol this Commission can not take jurisdiction of a claim which is not owned by a German subject, and if, as has been stated, Piñedo, García & Co. were the owners in law of the property, and their German associates have only a right to an accounting for their contribution and its profits, they are not the legal owners of the debt or of any interest therein.

It appears by the code of commerce above cited that in case of failure of the "merchant"—comerciante—with whom they are associated they would be required to suffer the loss of their entire contribution of capital, if that should be the proportion of the total losses, after which they would be considered creditors pro tanto their contribution. It is therefore in law entirely uncertain whether they will receive, upon an accounting, any part of the claim against the Government.

In a case where all of the parties interested are foreigners, and therefore all of them are competent to associate themselves together in such a manner as has here been done, without need of or regard to the provisions of Venezuelan legislation, quite a different question would arise. The question, however, does not arise in this case, and it is not necessary for the umpire to decide it. He therefore expresses no opinion upon it. The item will therefore be disallowed without prejudice.

The claimant will therefore be allowed the amount of items 5 and 6, agreed to by the Commissioners at 33,958 bolivars, and 53,296.67 bolivars, allowed by the umpire on account of the debt of the State of Zulia, aggregating 87,254.67 bolivars, without interest.

CHRISTERN & CO. (LIQUIDATORS) CASE.

Assignees for the benefit of creditors considered purchasers for value and entitled to recover, although claim in its origin was not entirely German.

DUFFIELD, Umpire:

It is conceded that the claimants are the properly appointed and lawfully authorized assignees for the benefit of the creditors—liquidadores—of Minlos, Witzke & Co., of Maracaibo. The latter have a claim against the State of Zulia under an agreement entered into between the representative of that State and Brewer, Moller & Co., dated January 2, 1902, adjusting the amount of the debt of the State with the various members "of the commerce"—del comercio—of Maracaibo, for a loan enforced by the State of Zulia on behalf of and for the benefit of the Venezuelan Government.

The validity of the claim as respects Minlos, Witzke & Co. is adjudged by the decision of the umpire in the case of Beckman & Co.,<sup>a</sup>

No. 47, but it is claimed by the Commissioner for Venezuela that Christern & Co. can not recover in this case because one of the two partners of Minlos, Witzke & Co. was a Dane. The umpire is unable to perceive the force of this objection. By an instrument attached to the "expediente" Christern & Co., whom it is conceded are German subjects, are vested with a full and absolute title, legal and equitable, to the share of Minlos, Witzke & Co. in the fund in question. It is true Christern & Co. hold it in trust for the creditors of Minlos, Witzke & Co., and of course any surplus thereafter will go to the latter. But that does not affect the title which Christern & Co. have to the fund. It is a familiar rule of law that assignees for the benefit of creditors are bona fide purchasers for value, and that after the assignment the assignors have no title whatever to the assigned property; and Christern & Co. stand in this position. Certainly if Minlos, Witzke & Co. had sold and conveyed this claim to Christern & Co. the fact that one of the former was a Danish subject could not affect the latter's right to recover. It is true that the debt was of such a nature as to be nonnegotiable in the sense of the law merchant, and that Venezuela would, as against any subsequent holder of the debt, avail herself of any defense she might have against the original holder; yet it was assignable in law and capable of having the entire legal and equitable title to it transferred and conveyed.

In the opinion of the umpire, therefore, it is clear that Christern & Co. are the legal owners of the claim and, being German subjects, are entitled to an award by this Commission for the amount thereof.

The claim is therefore allowed at the sum of 28,135.85 bolivars, which includes interest up to and including the 31st of December, 1903.

BECKMAN & CO. CASE.

Central Government liable for forced loan by one of the constituent states the proceeds of which were used for the defense of the entire nation.
Where no rate of interest is specified only the legal rate is recoverable.

DUFFIELD, Umpire:

The claim is for 227,756.54 bolivars, composed of the following items:

	Bolivars.	Marks.
A. Debt of the Government of the State of Zulia.....	13,584.62	10,867.70
B. War duties on importations .....	10,772.24	8,617.79
C. Export duties.....	19,749.24	15,799.39
D. Loss on coffee and hides caused by prolonged storage ..	25,014.36	20,011.49
E. Interest on capital lying idle .....	50,496.08	40,396.86
F. Loss caused by the suspension of mail service .....	50,000.00	40,000.00
G. Losses in salaries, rent, etc .....	58,140.00	46,512.00

As to the first item (A) there is no disputed question of fact. The State of Zulia confessedly owes the claimant the sum of 13,584.62 bolivars. The amount due the claimant was agreed upon and officially published in detail in the Official Gazette of the State of Zulia of the 16th of February, 1900, together with the stipulation of the Government for its liquidation in monthly payments. Since the 20th of August, 1901, these payments have been suspended, and there remains of the original debt due the claimant the sum stated above.

The Commissioner for Venezuela denies the liability of his Government, because, in his opinion, the debt is that of one of the States of the Republic of Venezuela and that the latter can not be held responsible. The expediente shows that the origin of the debt was forced loans made by the State of Zulia for the benefit of the National Government, and presumably by its direction. At all events, there is no denial that the money was expended for the benefit of the National Government, with its knowledge.

It is argued by the Commissioner for Germany that in any event the National Government is responsible for the debt of one of its States, and in support of this contention is cited the very able opinion of Mr. Robert Bunch in the Montijo case. (Moore on Arbitration, 1421-1447.)

In the opinion of the umpire it is not necessary in this case to decide the question. He prefers to put his opinion upon the concrete base, which is that in the efforts of Venezuela to suppress insurrection and put down rebellion she called upon the State of Zulia for assistance. In pursuance of this call the State enforced the loans in question. It now finds itself either unable or indisposed to make any more payments to the creditors on this account.

Under these circumstances, in the opinion of the umpire, it would be inequitable and unjust to the State of Zulia, as well as to the claimants, to remit the claimants to a suit at law against her. Morally and equitably, if not stricto jure, the Government of Venezuela is bound to repay the State of Zulia these moneys which were advanced for the common defense of the nation. The citizens of the State of Zulia can properly be called upon to pay their quota of the national debt, but it is manifestly unjust to assess upon them the entire amount of these forced loans, and absolve the other citizens of the Republic of Venezuela from the payment of their own proportion thereof.

The Commissioner for Germany, however, allows the claimant the full amount of this item of his claim, 13,584.62 bolivars, with the usual interest. This amount includes interest at 1 per cent per month, compounded with yearly rests, and increases the original amount of the item thereby 5,147.26 bolivars. The umpire is unable to concur in this finding. He does not find any warrant or authority in the proofs for compounding interest. Neither do the proofs show that under the agreement made on the 14th of February, 1900, between the representative of the government of Zulia and the parties who made the war loan for the purpose of adjusting the amount due, of which the claimant's share was 15,417.36 bolivars, there was any agreement for any rate of interest on the amount then agreed upon. There is also an entire absence of proof as to the rate of interest which the original loan was to bear. It is too clear to need argument that if no rate of interest is agreed upon by the parties only the legal rate can be allowed. This rate in Venezuela is 3 per cent per annum. Instead, therefore, of allowing the sum named by the Commissioner for Germany, the item is allowed at the sum of 12,186.54 bolivars, being the original amount of the loan, 15,417.36 bolivars, with interest from February 14, 1900, to December 31, 1903, less the payments made thereon and interest on those payments.

The umpire agrees with the Commissioners in the disallowance of Claim B, 10,772.24 bolivars, for the reasons stated in his opinion in the case of Christern & Co., No. 50.<sup>a</sup>

Item C of the claim for 19,749.24 bolivars, in the opinion of the Commissioner for Germany, should be allowed at its full amount, but he gives no reason for that opinion. The Commissioner for Venezuela, without giving any reasons therefor, is of the opinion that this item should be disallowed. It appears from the expediente that the Government of Venezuela on the 16th of February, 1903, imposed an export duty of 2 bolivars on each 50 kilograms of coffee and 4 bolivars on each 46 kilograms of hides. It is not contended by the claimant that this duty in and of itself would have been injurious to them or was an unlawful exercise of power by the Government; but they claim that because of the closure of the river by the Government decree of the 15th of January, 1903, the duties fell upon coffee which would otherwise have been exported prior to the date of the decree. This claim, therefore, depends for its allowance upon the decision of the question of the liability of Venezuela for closing the River Zulia, and is disallowed for the reasons stated in the opinion in the case of Faber, No. 53.<sup>a</sup>

The remaining items of the claim—namely, D, E, F, and G—for injury to coffee and hides caused by the prolonged storage of the same, and interest on the capital lying idle during the closure, and loss caused by the suspension of mail service, and loss on account of salaries, rent, etc., also depend on the decision of the same question, and are disallowed.

The claim is therefore allowed at the sum of 12,186.54 bolivars, which includes interest to December 31, 1903.

FABER CASE.

(By the Umpire:)

Consular certificates admissible as evidence.<sup>b</sup>

International mixed commissions not bound by strict technical rules of evidence.

<sup>b</sup> The question as to what papers are receivable in evidence before international commissions was extensively discussed by counsel for the claimant and respondent governments before the United States and Chilean Claims Commission of 1897, the briefs being summarized as follows:

The position of counsel for the United States upon this question is:

(1) That this Commission must receive as evidence all written documents and statements which are presented by either Government and must consider them in arriving at its conclusions.

(2) That these documents and statements are to be given such weight as they seem to be entitled to, both intrinsically and in view of surrounding circumstances and other facts proven in the case; and

(3) That the mere fact that they are ex parte may possibly affect their weight when contradicted by other proof, but can not possibly affect their admissibility as legal evidence.

Reliance was placed upon Article V of the treaty, stating that—

They (the Commission) shall be bound to receive and consider all written documents or statements which may be presented to them in behalf of the respective Governments in support of or in answer to any claim.

The United States counsel conceded that the civil law upon this subject was not as strict as the common law, as might be seen in the following citations:

French Civil Code, articles 1317-1333; Code of Civil Procedure (in force in Spain, Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines), articles 577, 595, 601; Mexican Code of Civil Procedure, article 289; Colombian Civil Code, articles 1758-1766; Chilean Civil Code, articles 1699-1707; Louisiana Civil Code, articles 2234 (2231) to 2251; Walton's Civil Law in Spain and Spanish America, pages 346-348.

It was, however, contended further that all Government reports were so closely related to the claims as to be almost part of the res gestæ.

Citations were made from the Claims Treaty of 1794 with Great Britain. Treaties and Conventions between the United States and Other Powers, pages 383 and 384;

States through the territory of which navigable streams flow, although these streams rise in the territory of other States, have the right to close these rivers to navigation.

L., 393), and act of June 19, 1878, authorizing the Court of Claims to take jurisdiction of the Caldera claims (20 Stat. L., 172), for the purpose of showing that the universal diplomatic rule was that the commissioners should receive all documents or statements which might be presented to them on behalf of their respective Governments. Reference was had to the Caldera case, 15 Court of Claims Reports, 546-606, for the purpose of showing that—

International tribunals are not bound by local restraints. They always exercise great latitude in such matters (Meade's case, 2 Court of Claims Reports, 271), and give to affidavits, and sometimes even to unverified statements, the force of depositions.

The Meade's case, above cited, was quoted as authority for the fact that the adjustment of international claims should not and could not be subjected to the narrow technical rules of ordinary tribunals.

The treaty of Washington of May 8, 1871, Article XXIV, was cited to show that the Commissioners "shall be bound to receive such oral or written testimony as either government shall present," and that, as appears by Moore, page 728, the Commission decided that ex parte affidavits should be admitted.

Moore, pages 1435 and 1753, was cited as equally conclusive, the first reference being to the Montijo case and the second being to the claims of Pelletier and Lazare.

To the third point attention was called to the convention between the United States and Chile of November 10, 1858 (Moore, p. 4690), where the decision was of necessity made solely upon ex parte testimony.

Reliance was placed upon the Walker case in the Chilean Commission. All such letters as were introduced were strictly ex parte, and a decision of the Commission, dated December 22, 1897, was to the effect that a lengthy affidavit by Bacigaluppi was evidence, and in the Levek case Chile had introduced a letter.

Reference was made to the fact that some question arose before the former Chilean Commission, as shown by pages 152 to 155 of the agent's report, being raised in the Murphy case, and the Commission ruled that it was "at liberty to take affidavits into consideration and to attribute to them a limited value or no value whatever, according to circumstances," and to the fact that in the Read case, No. 13, agent's report, general affidavits were accepted as the foundation for an award.

Upon the same subject-matter, the agent for Chile filed a brief, in which, after citing the opinion of Mr. Hale, agent of the United States before the Anglo-American Commission, as shown on page 4 of his report, with relation to the disadvantage of the Government in defending claims, he maintained:

First. That the officers before whom the various affidavits filed in those cases were taken were not duly authorized to certify to the affidavits; and Second. That affidavits can not be considered as evidence by this Commission. The Commission is governed by the rules of law existing in the two countries, which in this case are in harmony in regard to the nature of the evidence by which claims may be supported or refuted.

His brief further cited Article V of the convention of August 7, 1892, authorizing the Commissioners to decide "upon such evidence or information only as shall be furnished by or on behalf of the respective government," arguing that this emphasized the evidential character of the information to be furnished. He further cited the seventh article of the rules of procedure of the Commission established in 1893, showing that the claimant "shall be required to establish" all the material allegations of the petition "by legal and sufficient evidence." He relied upon Article XV of the rules of 1893, as follows:

The rules of evidence as to the competency, relevancy, and effect of the same shall be determined by the Commission, with reference to the convention under which it is created, the laws of the two nations, the public laws, and these rules.

From this he argued that the claimants should support the facts upon which their allegations were founded with legal and sufficient evidence. He argued against the propriety of accepting affidavits taken before ministers of the United States, secretaries of legation, or consuls, citing Calvo, Droit International, section 612, third edition; Heffter, Le Droit International Public, section 216, No. 2; Bluntschli, Le Droit International Codifié, article 221, and Field's International Code, article 172.

gation at their discretion, and no appeal will lie therefrom. This doctrine would seem to apply even though these rivers emptied directly into the sea instead of

As fortifying the opinion that ex parte proofs should have no legal weight, the Chilean agent quoted Greenleaf, volume 1, chapter 3, section 446, page 541, and as showing the necessity for notification to the other side, so that the witnesses might be cross-examined, he cited the Laws of Chile, Prontuario de los Juicios, law xxiii, title 16, paragraph 3.

As indicating the little weight to be given to ex parte evidence and the necessity for cross-examination are cited People v. Cole, 43 New York, 508; Revised Statutes, United States, chapter 17, title "Evidence;" Foster's Federal Practice, second edition, pages 502 and 1267; Greenleaf's Evidence, section 321, page 414; volume 1, section 164; Best on Evidence, page 83; Wharton's Law of Evidence, section 177; Wharton's Book 3, section 110, chapter 13, and sections 872, 873, 875, 879, 881, and 882 of the New York Code of Procedure; as also A. 425, A. 426, A. 430, A. 434 of the Code of Procedure of Louisiana, and section 2033 of the Code of Procedure of California.

As showing that affidavits are not receivable in the Court of Claims, section 1083 of the Revised Statutes is cited, and 2 Court of Claims, 345, as well as the rules of procedure of that court.

As showing that ex parte affidavits were excluded by the Court of Claims, citation is made of Main v. U. S., 21 Court of Claims Reports, page 54.

Attention is called to the Shrigley before the prior Commission (Moore, 3711), in which depositions, not taken in accordance with the rules of the Commission, were suppressed, and showing that there was no appearance on the part of the claimant or notice for taking depositions.

The case of Murphy (Moore, 2262) was relied upon as showing that the kind of evidence under discussion should be received "not as evidence but only as elements which in certain cases may contribute to a limited extent, collateral or secondary, to confirm or strengthen a conviction appearing to be based on proofs of a more conclusive character," and the decision in the Thorndike case (Moore, p. 2274) is referred to as indicating the opinion of the Commission that such evidence lacked sufficient legal weight to warrant a decision against the respondent.

The French-American Commission, sitting in Washington from 1881 to 1884, it is said, citing from the Murphy case, adopted the same principle.

The agent admitted that official communications written in the discharge of official business should necessarily be admitted in evidence.

The agent for the United States replied to the foregoing brief, contending that the following propositions had been established:

1. The Commission is "bound to receive and consider all written documents or statements" presented by either Government as evidence.
2. This ipso facto makes all such writings, whether affidavits or mere letters, legal evidence, no matter what the ordinary rules of law may be concerning them, but leaves it open for the Commission to attach such weight to them as they intrinsically seem to deserve.
3. This rule, as established by the convention, is different (and is conceded by both sides to be different) from the rule either of the common or the civil law upon the subject, although the civil law seems to be much more liberal in this respect than the common law, as witness the case cited in the preceding brief from 159 United States Reports, page 204.
4. The rule now contended for by the United States is the only rule in diplomatic settlements, and the usual rule in commissions such as this, as witness the authorities, decisions, and citations from the proceedings of other commissions, and of the Court of Claims set out in the former brief.
5. The former commission under the present convention held in the Murphy case that ex parte affidavits were admissible, and in fact used them as evidence, but considered that the ones on file in that case were intrinsically improbable, and therefore a majority of the commission declined to permit their judgment to be controlled by them. In the Reed case, afterwards decided by the same commission, they unanimously treated similar documents as evidence, and believed the statements contained in them, and decided the case accordingly.
6. It is manifest, therefore, that the objection now made by the agent for Chile can not properly avail to destroy the effect of all affidavits and writings as evidence. It is likewise manifest that all such papers must be considered by the Commission, and each one weighed as to its individual merits and inherent probability.

Referring to the French-American Commission, he stated that upon verifying the reference all that appears is as follows:

The affidavit of Philibert Rozier referred to in the motion of the United States assistant counsel is stricken from the record.

He argued that it did not appear officially why it was so stricken out.

He further contended that letters and telegrams sent from one official to another were literally ex parte statements, and that all writings submitted by either Government should be received in evidence, carefully weighed as to their convincing force, and permitted to influence its decision much or little, or not at all, according as that convincing force is found to be present or absent in each particular case.

A majority of the commission made an award on the evidence in question in favor of the claimant.

debouching into an inland lake, as in the case under consideration, wholly within the territory of the State seeking to control the navigation of these rivers. This doctrine being applicable to the inhabitants of the State at the headwaters of the streams is all the more applicable to domiciled foreigners.<sup>a</sup>

GOETSCH, Commissioner:

The Department of Santander of the Republic of Colombia, with its capital at San José de Cúcuta, has been very poorly endowed by nature, since it lacks means, which pass exclusively through Colombian territory, to establish commercial communication with the ocean. The commercial traffic of the Department with the rest of the world can not be effected except through the port of Maracaibo—that is to say, by passing over Venezuelan territory. The traffic from the capital, San José, to the Atlantic Ocean takes place in the following manner: From Cúcuta to the Colombian port Villamizar by rail (the frontier custom-house upon the Zulia River); from Villamizar by the navigable river Zulia to its mouth in the Catatumbo River, near Encontrados (the frontier custom-house of Venezuela); from Encontrados continuing along the Catatumbo River as far as its mouth, in Lake Maracaibo; thence by Lake Maracaibo to the city of Maracaibo. A few leagues farther down from the port of Villamizar the Zulia River crosses the frontier line of Venezuela. At the Venezuelan railroad station El Guayabo the railroad from Uracá to Encontrados touches. The Lake Maracaibo and the Catatumbo River as far as Encontrados are navigable by steamers of considerable draft, while the river Zulia from Encontrados to the port of Villamizar only permits the passage of small steamers of a slight draft and other lighter vessels.

From time immemorial the Department of Santander has used that highway for the exportation of its national products, principally coffee and hides, and for the importation from abroad of those necessities which it is not able to produce. The importance of the commercial traffic by this route is shown by the fact that the commerce duties of Colombia received in Villamizar amount to from 680,000 to 800,000 bolivars.

A very considerable portion of this commercial traffic is carried on by German firms and German capital. We are treating here of the firms of Van Dissel & Co., Brewer, Moller & Co., Beckman & Co., Steinworth & Co., and Faber & Co., of Hamburg, respectively, from Maracaibo and San José de Cúcuta, besides the German stores in Maracaibo. This last enterprise is an exclusively German house, and performs its navigation by the lake and the rivers, with proper steamers and steel lighters, and in company with another transportation company, in which the firm of Brewer, Moller & Co. have an interest of 50 per cent, while all the other German firms, which almost all have their principal houses in Hamburg, busy themselves with the exportation of coffee and other products from Santander and the importation of merchandise to said Department. The German capital in these enterprises amounts to many millions of marks. These commercial relations, existing from very remote periods, were destroyed at a blow by an executive decree of the Government of Venezuela dated September 11, 1900. The decree is of the following tenor:

Commencing upon the day of the promulgation of this decree, the clearance of vessels which carry on river commerce along the Zulia and Catatumbo rivers is suspended in the coastwise custom-house at the port of Encontrados.

Because of this prohibition of the clearance of all vessels the commercial blockade with respect to the Department of Santander was established de facto. No vessel could thereafter pass by Encontrados either going up or coming down the river. Commerce was totally destroyed.

The Government of the German Empire has protested before the Government of Venezuela against said measure, which very seriously injured German interests. The officer at the imperial legation at Caracas, under the date of February 4, 1901, protested, as is seen by the following extract:

Mr. Minister EDUARDO BLANCO, etc.:

From an order received, I have the honor to notify your excellency that, according to the interpretation of the Imperial Government, the closing of the Catatumbo and Zulia rivers, because it interrupts the German commerce with Colombia, is contrary to the principles of international law, and that therefore the German Government should reserve to itself the right to hold Venezuela liable for the injuries resulting on account of said measure.

In his answer, dated February 16, 1901, the minister of foreign relations in Venezuela has upheld the legality of this measure, alleging the sovereignty of Venezuela as an independent state, but has agreed upon the existence of the commercial blockade as such, as follows:

Upon the stopping, temporarily, of the passage of commerce upon the Zulia and Catatumbo. * * *

To this the German legation replied, under date of February 19, 1901, repeating the protest already quoted.

Upon the 4th of March, 1901, the Government of Venezuela modified said decree as follows:

River commerce is permitted upon the rivers Zulia and Catatumbo, but only in lighters or canoes, and while new fears of disturbance of the public order should not require the contrary.

But after a few days the primitive state was restored by a decree of July 29, 1901, and by it the commercial blockade was restored by the decree of July 29, 1901, and reestablished in its full extent. The decree reads as follows:

The decree of March 4, 1901, which permitted river commerce along the Zulia and Catatumbo rivers from Encontrados by lighters and canoes, is revoked, the decree of September 11, 1900, remaining in its full force and effect.

Under date of June 14, 1902, the following decree was issued:

Until the definite reopening of the port of Encontrados the way of Urena is temporarily open for the passage of merchandise between Cúcuta and Maracaibo, and vice versa, the way of Encontrados being open only for the coastwise service.

Finally, what follows was ordered by a decree of January 13, 1903:

ARTICLE 1. The decree of July 29, 1901, by which traffic between Encontrados and Puerto Villamizar was absolutely forbidden, is revoked.

ART. 2. The decree of March 4, 1901, which permitted traffic between Puerto Villamizar and Encontrados by means of lighters and canoes only, is made effective.

The traffic by lighters and canoes, to which the foregoing article refers, shall be carried on by Guayabo, transporting by rail the merchandises which are exported.

ART. 3. Navigation of steam and sailing vessels, carrying merchandises in transit for Colombia, shall hereafter be permitted only by the ports of Maracaibo and Encontrados in accordance with the laws which are in force in the premises.

Lastly, another decree, under date of April 3, 1903, was issued, the second article of which reads as follows:

The effects of article 2 of the decree of January 15, already cited, are revoked with relation to the importation of merchandise in transit for Colombia by said route, until the causes which make said transportation undesirable may be removed.

This state has continued until the present day.

By the commercial blockade established there, which now can not be considered as totally removed, but which in any case was maintained in full force for about two years, the interests of German firms and those of German commerce have suffered serious injury, as has already been shown.

The damages consisted principally in the following: The crops of coffee bought of German houses in Cúcuta could not be exported during the time of the blockade, which lasted two years. The coffee had to undergo a long storage in Villamizar, exposed to the warm climate and extreme humidity, which occasioned a loss of a part of it and the payment of high rates of insurance. The capital invested in coffee ceased to produce interest; thus also the capital invested in German houses in Cúcuta could not be utilized later on and could not produce profit, while the general expenses continued to run, such as the salaries of employees, the rent of the commercial establishments, etc. The imported merchandise from Europe and the United States suffered like injury, which could not be transported from Maracaibo to Santander, these latter remaining stored in Maracaibo, where they suffered deterioration in part, and later it was necessary to sell them at a loss. A part of the general expense of the business of Maracaibo was disbursed without return. The vessels and steel lighters belonging to the transportation companies of German houses, which carried the commerce to Villamizar, could not fulfill their object, and remained loaded, without being used, and were injured to some extent by the brackish water of Lake Maracaibo. All these injuries are immediate consequences of the stoppage of the commercial traffic.

Let us pass on to prove how Venezuela may be made liable for them.

(a) In the first place it is undeniable that a sovereign state holds absolute authority over its rivers and water courses until these touch the frontiers of other states. This principle is nevertheless limited in two senses by international law. When a river constitutes the only way of communication, indispensable for the subsistence of another nation, or part of it, its use can not be entirely prohibited. (See Heffter's International Law of Europe, Berlin, 1867, sec. 77.) Besides, the use of navigable rivers for traffic with other friendly peoples when they cross independent states can not be prohibited when their use is not offensive. After all a state can not deny to another nation the inoffensive use of routes by land or water within its territory without committing an act of hostility, and no State can exclude another from commercial communication with the market of a third without committing an offense and injury unless the latter desires and puts in force the exclusion. (See Heffter, p. 63; Puffendorf, T. N., III, 3, 6; Groot, T., 2, 13; Vattel, II, 123, 132-134.) These international maxims are the creation of close association between nations. They have been applied in treaties of distinct periods. (Treaty of peace of Paris, 1814, art. 5; the official record of the Congress of Vienna, art. 8, 117-118; art. 15 of the treaty of peace of Paris, dated March 30, 1856; art. 1 of the provision of navigation for the Danube, dated November 7, 1857; treaty between Spain and Portugal, August 13, 1835, concerning the free navigation of the Duero; treaty of reciprocity between Canada and the United States dated June 5, 1850; art. 4 of the treaty of the Republic of Argentina with other powers dated July 10, 1853; and others.)

On account of everything that has been said it is considered as an international doctrine that the navigation of rivers which flow through portions of several States together with their affluents shall be free from the point where they first become navigable to where they empty into the sea, so far as commerce is concerned—provided this latter be in itself free—should not be denied to anybody; besides, each riparian state shall exercise its authority within the limits of its fluvial domain, impeding as little as possible the liberty of navigation. (See with respect to this Phillimore, pp. 189, 191, 192, 195, 204, 207, 209, et seq; Grotius Book II, chap. 2, sec. 12; Wheaton, Pt. II, chap. 4, sec. 11; Heffter, p. 63, 147; Carathéodory, du Droit International, concerning large water courses, p. 155-158; Moore, 1718.)

As there was no war between Colombia and Venezuela the latter had no right to prohibit the foreign commerce with a Colombian port.

The principles above stated have not been limited to the territory of European states, but have found application in states and circumstances outside of Europe. It was especially the part of England at a former time to make this principle respected and to defend it energetically against Spain with respect to the traffic on the Mississippi. (Phillimore, sec. 170.) Thus also the United States of America have invoked against England the application of the principles above set forth and attained their recognition with respect to the commerce of the St. Lawrence River, the mouth of which is situated exclusively in Canadian territory. It is true that England maintained at first an interpretation of the expression of natural right should not be given to the principles of the treaty of Vienna, but that they should be considered as the conventional arrangement of an exceptional privilege granted by the contracting parties, and the enjoyment of which did not belong to a third noncontracting party. Nevertheless this attitude of England was not in harmony with her own opinion in the claim of the Mississippi (see Phillimore, sec. 170), and it was also rejected by the United States with reason and success. Secretary of State Clay, in Washington, ordered the American minister, Gallatin, under date of June 15, 1826, in London, to oppose the following to the English pretension (see Mr. Secretary Clay's letter to Mr. Gallatin, American minister in London, June 19, 1826, session 1827-28, No. 43, Am. State Papers, For. Rel., vol. 6, p. 764); that the provisions of the treaties should not be considered as of a merely conventional character, since ordinarily it would be necessary to give them a positive and natural right in order to settle differences; that the right to navigate the ocean had also been the subject of rules and divers treaties; that the provisions of Vienna and other similar ones should rather be considered as an homage which men render to the great Lawgiver of the Universe by which His works should be free from the chains that human caprice strive to put upon them. Also, among other German publicists this opinion prevails. Thus Wurm (see Five Letters upon Free River Navigation), has called the treaties above-mentioned a concentration of the great principles which are gradually illuminating the reason of nations. (See also Carathéodory, pp. 139-141.) England was compelled to yield, although only after some years, by a treaty signed on June 5, 1854, by Lord Elgin, which recognized in article 4 the freedom of navigation upon the St. Lawrence River. (Treaties and Conventions between the United States and Other Powers, p. 451.) The Argentine Republic took a similar course upon another occasion by confirming by a treaty of July 18, 1853, the freedom of navigation of the Paraná and the Uruguay for the ships of all nations.

If these principles are applied to the present case, it follows that the blockade of commercial traffic upon the navigable rivers Catatumbo and Zulia, which cross the territories of Venezuela and Colombia, was an act contrary to the law of nations, and therefore illegal. As is seen from the correspondence exchanged with the German legation, Venezuela based her proceeding upon the declaration that her relations with Colombia were at that time strained and that the closing of the rivers was a necessary measure for the national safety. Nevertheless, this excuse is not admissible. There has not existed a true state of war between Colombia and Venezuela, and Venezuela herself (November 20, 1901), in answer to an inquiry of England, expressly stated that a state of war did not exist. (See the English blue book of Venezuela, No. 1, 1903, p. 55.) But neither should there have occurred, even in the case of a state of war or the probability of war-like complications, a complete commercial blockade, or, say, total interruption of neutral commerce upon navigable rivers. (See Wurm, Freedom of River Navigation, p. 55, et seq.; art. 131 of the convention between the German and French Governments upon the control of the navigation of the Rhine, dated August 15, 1804; the Clayton-Bulwer treaty between the United States and England; art. 6 of the treaty between Argentina and the United States of America, England, and France, dated July 10, 1853.)

Venezuela, if she had the right to control the commerce upon the Zulia and Catatumbo, as her safety required in view of the strained relations with the neighbor Republic, could have inspected and regulated the commerce of merchants—the first in order to prevent the transporting of Venezuelan revolutionists or Colombian troops, and the second in order to submit to register vessels suspected of transporting arms or contraband.

To exercise greater control, she could compel vessels or steel lighters to be accompanied by constabulary or troops as far as the Venezuelan frontier, and to receive them there again upon their homeward journey. The absolute blockade, or, say, the prohibition thereby resulting to the exportation of coffee, which was German property, and to the importation of German merchandise, appears to be an act not justified by the circumstances, and therefore inadmissible and illegal according to international law.

(c) The Government of the German Empire, because of what has been said, was entirely right in protesting to the Government of Venezuela against the commercial blockade, and to reserve to herself the right of enforcing an indemnity, since a state which, by an illegal act, injures the legal interests of foreign subjects should make reparation for the damage caused.

The Government of Venezuela has expressly recognized its liability in the protocol of peace for claims presented up to that date, and therefore also for claims arising out of the commercial blockade. Because of what precedes the German Commissioner asks of the honorable umpire that he fix the liability of Venezuela in principle for such damages as may be proved to have been suffered by subjects of the German Empire because of the commercial blockade.

ZULOAGA, Commissioner:

In the extreme west of the Republic of Venezuela is the lake of Maracaibo, a beautiful sheet of fresh water, entirely surrounded by Venezuelan territory. The lake communicates with the port of Maracaibo, or the Gulf of Venezuela, by a narrow channel, about 1,500 meters wide, which forms the two islands of Zapara and San Carlos. In the eastern extremity of the latter is situated the fortress of San Carlos, which guards and defends the entrance to the lake. Although it is not provided yet with modern pieces of artillery, it serves its purpose when necessary, and up to now no other ships except those which the master of the country has seen fit to allow to enter have plowed the lake. The whole of Lake Maracaibo belongs absolutely to Venezuela, and it has not occurred to any nation to throw doubt upon this.

The navigation of this lake, which is interior navigation, has never been done except by Venezuelan ships. On the northern part of it is found the city of Maracaibo, the only port of that region equipped for foreign commerce. Here only foreign ships touch, which must not have more than 10 feet draft, without running a great risk of stranding on the bar. There at the foot of the lake toward the south the river Catatumbo empties, which river belongs almost exclusively to Venezuela, since only a small portion of it belongs to Colombia. The Catatumbo has, generally speaking, in Venezuelan territory a depth of 5 feet. It has never been navigated except by Venezuelan river boats. At a distance of about 100 kilometers from its mouth in Lake Maracaibo the Catatumbo receives the waters of the Zulia, a river which rises in Colombia, in the State of Santander, which ordinarily has not more than 2 feet of water, especially in Colombia, and in summer still less. This river has never been navigated in Venezuelan territory except by Venezuelan vessels (boats or small steam launches).

The commerce which Colombia carries on upon this river has had a certain development since 1875, when the wagon road from Cúcuta to Villamizar was built, and later, during the years 1881 to 1882, when the railroad was built between the same places. Colombia has never been able to consider that she has a perfect right to carry on commerce through the Zulia and Catatumbo, since at present she has no treaty with Venezuela, and Venezuela has not recognized that right directly or indirectly. By Law XXIII of the Code of Hacienda, Venezuela has allowed commerce in transit from Colombia, but in a precarious manner as to the latter Republic, because article 1 of that law expressly says that the passage of merchandise by the port of Maracaibo destined for Catatumbo is permitted.

Transitory commerce can therefore be prohibited by Venezuela at any time, as she is not obliged by any treaty to permit it. That commerce in transit Venezuela regulates in a detailed manner, and the importation of foreign merchandise through the port of Maracaibo is subject (art. 2, Law XXIII, cited) to all the formalities required and penalties established in the law of the government of customs for merchandise coming from foreign countries destined for Venezuela and to the provisions which are therein set forth. This commerce in transit is carried into the interior of Venezuela by two roads, either by the river Catatumbo, and later shipped over the railroad of Táchira, or in barges or small steam launches on the Zulia, which in reality can not properly be done except in the rainy season, when the river is sufficiently deep.

Venezuela, as a sovereign nation, regulates this commerce in transit in its territory as it sees fit; it determines the roads which must be used; it establishes the rules and prescriptions which it believes proper for its security or its interests. It is a matter exclusively its own, concerning which it has to give account to nobody. In the exercise of its right by virtue of necessities of public safety and order, well recognized and well appreciated by this Commission, the Venezuelan Government has issued a series of decrees regulating this transit, especially concerning the navigation on the Zulia. These decrees are those of September 11, 1900; March 4, 1900; July 29, 1901; June 14, 1902; January 15, 1903, and April 3, 1903. By virtue of them commerce upon the river as far as Colombia has sometimes been stopped. Other times it has been permitted by barges and canoes, but not by steam launches. This happened especially after the invasion of Rangel Garbiras with Colombian troops on the 25th of July, 1901, and because of the necessity to guard this road, so important to the defense of the territory.

Colombia at first sought to obtain from Venezuela the revocation of the decree that prohibited traffic upon the Zulia, but Venezuela answered her that she could not allow this traffic while the motives of public order which had given rise to the decree existed. After that the breaking off of diplomatic relations between Venezuela and said Republic took place, and such a serious aspect was assumed that the frontiers were guarded by armies of the respective States, and only the civil war which existed in both countries avoided, perhaps, the great calamity of a war being declared between the two sister nations. The matter of commerce in transit between the two nations is still complicated, on account of questions of boundary not yet settled, and it occupies the attention of both countries.

In this condition of affairs Germany intervened and pretends to assume for herself the cause of Colombia and force Venezuela to open the Zulia route, under the pretext that there are some German merchants in Cúcuta who are injured by the Venezuelan decrees. It is impossible to imagine intervention by a third party more unreasonable and unlawful.

The question is between Venezuela and Colombia, and if decided can only be decided by those two countries alone and exclusively, and I must emphatically deny the allegation of the Commissioner for Germany and affirm that it is entirely contrary to the tenor and spirit of the Washington protocol and the powers vested by it in this Commission; that according to this treaty Germany is not authorized to put in dispute any matter which may compromise the sovereignty of Venezuela nor put in dispute her present legal status which gives her exclusive sovereignty over her rivers and lakes. To sustain a claim for injuries to Cúcuta merchants with the reasons adduced, to the effect that the river Zulia must be opened to international commerce, is to surreptitiously introduce questions as to the sovereignty of Venezuela into a tribunal which is called upon to take cognizance only of matters of fact, in conformity with absolute equity, which precisely supposes the exclusion of those questions which exact another kind of study and another standard of judgment.

If there should possibly be a controversy between Venezuela and Colombia in regard to the matter, the consequence of this surreptitious intervention of Germany would lead to a legal precedent being found in the question which is submitted to the umpire, a precedent which would be a very singular one in the relations between the two republics, whichever way it might be decided.

But in this matter there can be no controversy. The right of Venezuela is clear, and the action of Germany appears to tend towards nothing less than to make Venezuela tributary to Columbia by virtue of supposed principles of international law concerning the navigation of rivers.

I reject, therefore, expressly and categorically, all this argument of the German Commissioner as unfounded, and since the question of George Faber has been submitted to the umpire, I maintain that he has no jurisdiction to take cognizance of the matter in the form which the Commissioner of Germany contends, because this Commission has no power to overlook the rights of Venezuela.

Venezuela exercising her right has regulated, in the manner which it has considered proper, the commerce in its territory in its passage to Colombia. Therefore no liability of the State ensues for consequent damages which an individual might suffer by virtue of these general provisions. If some Germans have suffered material damages, perchance Venezuela and its Government have suffered greater ones in enforcing decrees which it judges necessary for the moment. When the German Empire, by virtue of its political policy, curtails amicable relations with any nation said measure of reprisal undoubtedly injures individual interests, and I do not believe that thereby it is obligated to make any reparation.

To the argument of the German Commissioner sustaining the claim of George Faber, who says that he has been injured by the decrees which have regulated the commerce in transit, it is sufficient for me to set up the right of Venezuela to enforce laws and regulations in her territory as she sees fit.

Nevertheless, in order to show to what extent the argument of the Commissioner of Germany is without foundation and to what extent the condition set up by Germany is unjustly oppressive, I am going to make some general observations.

That argument has as a foundation that, in accordance with the principles of international law, the navigation of international rivers is free, and that Venezuela in shutting off the commerce on the portion of the river flowing into the ocean (at the mouth of the river) has violated the law of nations.

In order that this reasoning might have any force it would be necessary in the first place for the river Zulia to be considered as an international river, but this river does not flow into any open sea—an essential condition in the case—but into the Catatumbo River and the Catatumbo into Lake Maracaibo exclusively the territory of Venezuela, and closed in accordance with international law to international commerce. It would be necessary, in the second place, that the river should, properly speaking, be navigable, and such a thing could never be said of a river which has a depth of 2 feet, and even less, in the dry season.

The Rhine has a depth at Bazel of from  $1\frac{1}{2}$  to 3 meters, and it is only, properly speaking, navigable from that place. The depth farther down is several meters. The Danube has, even in Donauwerth, a depth of 2 meters and 2.35 meters, and nearly 50 meters in the port of Hierro. These rivers are, properly speaking, navigable. Lastly, it would be necessary that Germany should have been navigating the Zulia with German vessels, in order to carry on commerce with Colombia, and this is not only not alleged, but is not physically possible, because a trans-Atlantic steamer could not navigate even the Catatumbo. The pretense therefore narrows itself down to holding that Venezuela is obliged to carry on with Venezuelan vessels the commerce in transit with Colombia upon the river Zulia because there are in Cúcuta and in Maracaibo some merchants to whom this would be convenient, and therefore Germany demands it of Venezuela, making her liable in case she does not agree to it.

The theory that navigable international rivers are free to navigation has not been admitted as a general rule of the law of nations. No nation up to now has recognized this absolute principle or this obligation as a perfect one, and in the cases where it has been agreed to by nations it has always been by virtue of special treaties by which free commerce, such as the Commissioner of Germany desires to establish, has never been admitted. Not even in the Danube does such a rule appear to have been established, since in accordance with the treaty of Vienna of 1837 the free navigation does not exist except with vessels which enter from the sea to the Danube, or if they come from the Danube to the sea. (Bluntschli, International Law codified, sec. 314; Pradier-Fodéré, vol. 2, p. 295.)

that navigable rivers which are in communication with the open sea (which is not so in this case) or which separate or traverse various states are to-day open in the time of peace to the ships of all nations would be to accept hope for reality. The reality is that absolute freedom of rivers, that which is based upon the equality of all nations and which comprises all the direct tributaries of the sea, is not only not generally recognized and adopted, but it is still in dispute. (Pradier-Fodéré, vol. 2, p. 300, sec. 749.)

And Fiore, after discussing the diverse and contradictory opinions of the authors, says:

These few citations suffice to show how divergent the opinions of the authors are, who in a large part are our contemporaries, with respect to the navigation of rivers, and how little the theory can serve to regulate the practice. They recognize the right to use the navigable river for the interests of commerce, but they declare this right to be imperfect, and they accord to states through whose territory they pass the right to declare themselves proprietors of that portion of the river which has its bed in their territory and to dictate conditions to those who desire to navigate it.<sup>a</sup>

The theory of free navigation of rivers (which strictly can not be understood to be what has been asserted in this case) is not, therefore, recognized as a principle of international law, and, in any case, Venezuela has not recognized it with respect to Colombia, and it is proper to bear in mind here the ideas of the Hon. Mr. Duffield, umpire of this Commission, in one of his former opinions:<sup>b</sup>

International law is not law in its usually defined sense. It is not a rule of conduct prescribed by a sovereign power. It is merely a body of rules established in custom or by treaty by which the intercourse between civilized nations is governed. Its principles are ascertained by the agreement of independent nations upon rules which they consider just and fair in regulating their dealings with each other in peace and in war. They reach this agreement by comparing the opinions of text writers and in precedents in modern times, and these ultimately appeal to the principles of natural reason and morality and common sense. It therefore rests solely upon agreement. Obedience to it is voluntary only, and can not be enforced by a common sovereign power. Any nation has the power and the right to dissent from a rule or principle of international law, even though it is accepted by all the other nations. Its obedience to the rule can only be compelled by an appeal to its reason and love of justice, or by the superior force of the particular nation or nations whose interests are involved.

In conclusion we must say that the theory of the free navigation of rivers is in no way applicable to the case under consideration, and that it is a measure of interior order of Venezuela which the latter has decreed in her territory by virtue of her sovereignty. To overlook this right is to do her an injury, and it is then not Venezuela who has violated the law of nations, closing the passage of the Zulia, which many motives of political well-being dictate, but Germany overlooking the legitimate rights of a sovereign nation. (Bluntschli, International Law Codified, art. 81 and art. 472.)

The obligation of observing justice with respect to other nations, at all times and under all circumstances, constitutes for a state one of those perfect and imperative duties which none can deny. (Calvo, Mutual Duties of States.)

The liberty of commerce has been invoked, but "the liberty of commerce is not an absolute principle; it may be subject to various restrictions." It is not possible, for example, to seek to carry on commerce in the territory of a state against its will; and the exercise of the right to carry on commerce necessarily presupposes the express or tacit consent of the state in whose territory one proposes to institute traffic by way of land or sea. The internal political policy of each state dictates means that must be taken. Should it open its territory freely to foreign commerce? Should it make this commerce subject to justified conditions on account of considerations of public interest, and to limitations, for example, established on account of a fiscal interest or an object of safety and health, etc.? It is impossible not to admit that every state has the right to regulate every class of commerce in accordance with its intention, and it is necessary to conclude that it is entirely free to establish every measure that it may believe conducive to this end. The territorial sovereign may prohibit the injurious branches of commerce; subject the traffic of foreigners to certain rules; close places or provinces to foreign commerce; impede the importation or exportation of certain merchandise; favor the national products, imposing upon foreign products different duties; raise or lower the tariff as it believes proper; determine the way of importation or exportation; map out the road which foreign products must follow into its territory, submit them to the necessity of bond; decide of the desirability to favor foreign duties by treaty, by the creation of free ports or like establishments; to accept for itself certain relations which do not affect either the right of independence or the progress of interior development of the state, etc. In its turn each state which carries on commerce itself or by means of its nationals outside of its boundaries ought to submit itself to the restrictions which that sovereign may make upon the liberty of commerce. To respect the rights of others is to assure the respect of one's own rights. Not to trample upon the liberty of others is to give more force to one's own liberty.

The case that is submitted to the umpire is the claim of George Faber, of Cúcuta. (In the claims of the firms in Maracaibo the claim is even more unjust, if possible, since they are individuals domiciled in Venezuela and subject to all provisions of public order.) Is it worth while for me to make an examination of the proof of the claimant Faber, when I reject the principle upon which it is based? Since the Commissioner of Germany appears to accept the truth of the facts, I shall make some passing observations concerning them.

The claim is proved by the declaration of two witnesses of Cúcuta, who say that they have seen the books of the house of Faber, and that the data upon which the claim is based is in accord with these books, and that the estimates which are made correspond, according to their understanding, to the truth. The books of merchants are evidence against them, but not in their favor. (1273, Venezuelan Code of Commerce.) This is a general principle of law, and it is natural, since it is not possible to believe that a person can make proof alone. Amongst merchants their books are of value, because each one presents his own; but in a particular case their books can not be presented in opposition to the state, and still less in opposition to a foreign state. I do not know who Faber is, and whether this proof is or is not ad hoc. Besides, the consul is not the legitimate authority in Colombia to certify to an acknowledgment. The local authorities are such, and we do not even know who these witnesses are who say they have seen the books. For my part, I consider this a claim which has been submitted absolutely without proofs, and it might be said that it is not, properly speaking, a claim in form, as it evidently is not. With respect to several items, such as one which refers to the correspondence which is said to have been withheld, I do not believe it worth while to make a further examination; but I should observe that if the road through Villamizar was closed, there were others, and therefore the fact itself upon which the claim is sought to be sustained is false.

GOETSCH, Commissioner (second opinion):

The German Commissioner believes that he has exhausted the question of international law in his opinion, which is in the hands of the honorable umpire, and it only remains for him to answer the opinion of the Commissioner of Venezuela, as follows: The fact that Lake Maracaibo is exclusively within Venezuelan territory in no way changes its condition as a natural continuation of the rivers Zulia and Catatumbo, the waters of which, accompanied by the vessels which float thereon, lead to the ocean. The question as to whether by international law a foreign flag is authorized to use a lake or river, when there is no question of coastwise trade, is not to be decided here. Rather there is under discussion only the question of the right to restrict neutral commerce from passing thereby to a part of Colombia which has no other means of communication.

The depths of the waters of both rivers is a matter of small importance so long as their courses shall be considered as navigable in international law, as is undoubtedly so, since small steamers navigate them as far as Port Villamizar, in Colombia. This international river route which unites two independent states has been considered before as such by Venezuela, and upon it commerce and traffic from time immemorial have had a right to pass, as is seen from the report delivered to the honorable umpire, published by Venezuela, at Madrid, 1884, page 10.

It is seen, moreover, from the Yellow Book, likewise in the hands of the Hon. General Duffield (Caracas, 1900, correspondence of the legation of Colombia, pp. 3, 4, 7, 13, 14, 15, 16, 23, 25, 27, 29, 42, 51), that the least doubt does not exist on the part of the Colombian Government with respect to the judicial question, and that it has always contended for itself the right of free river navigation.

From the right which Venezuela has to supervise and regulate commerce in transit with Colombia in the interest of her own safety, and because of her traffic, as is provided in the code of Hacienda, the right to decree the complete commercial blockade can not be deduced.

The insinuation that Germany in representing the respective claims of her subjects is partial in favor of Colombia and proposes to take the chestnuts out of the fire for that Republic should be disputed. If a measure directed in the first place against Colombia injures German interests—and it does injure them seriously—it is only duty which compels the German Empire, and which the constitution imposes upon the Imperial Government, to secure protection of the rights of its subjects abroad. From a note of protest upon the matter in question, addressed to the Government of Venezuela by the Imperial Legation, it will be seen, moreover, that Germany only desired to make Venezuela liable for the blockade in so far as injuries to German commerce and interest might result therefrom. It has always been a political principle of the German Empire not to interfere in differences of two foreign nations.

With respect to the objection to the jurisdiction made by the Commissioner of Venezuela, it is proper for this Commission not to annul the decrees of the Government of Venezuela which order the commercial blockade, but to submit to a determination whether Venezuela shall pay the damages which the German firms claiming because of the blockade have suffered.

These claims are of the same character as all the others. They are demands for indemnity directed against the Republic. By article III of the protocol of February 13 of the present year there were submitted to this Commission for its decision German claims against Venezuela which were not made special exceptions.

The Government of His Majesty the Emperor of Germany, long before the conclusion of the treaty in question, had called the attention of the Government of Venezuela to the injuries suffered by German interests because of the commercial blockade and to the prospective claims. The contracting parties therefore ought to have further limited in the protocol the jurisdiction of this Commission in order that the objection to the jurisdiction made by the Commissioner of Venezuela could be considered justified. The Commissioners, therefore, and the umpire, because they have not reached an agreement, have the right and are bound to determine the claims in question in order to bring within the scope of their deliberations the admissibility of the acts of the Government of Venezuela.

In order to substantiate his opinion the Commissioner of Venezuela makes reference to an opinion rendered in another case by the honorable arbitrator in accordance with which international law is not a law nor a rule which can be imposed upon a state whose opinion differs from general international law. This in itself will not be disputed, but since Germany and Venezuela have agreed to adjust the claims of the subjects of Germany by means of arbitration, it is the duty of this Commission to apply to the different cases the law of nations, such as the Commission and not Venezuela understands it to be. By the treaty Venezuela has renounced the right to decide the claims in such a manner as she understands international law. Let it be further considered that equity is to serve as a rule for the decisions of this Commission. The German claims are equitable, since the claimants have suffered serious injury, because of the governmental measure adopted exclusively in the interest of Venezuela.

The fact that Germany is not a riparian state of the rivers Zulia and Catatumbo appears of little importance, since the commerce upon international rivers is open for all nations, according to the opinions of the best known jurists in international law. Besides, the German claimant firms are located in Colombia and Venezuela. All the firms in Maracaibo have branches in Cúcuta. There is question, therefore, of the rights of the inhabitants of the riparian states, since foreigners enjoy the same rights as Venezuelans and Colombians with respect to commercial law and navigation in Colombia and Venezuela. The common neutral use of the waterways which unite Venezuela and Colombia can not be denied them, a right which on the part of Colombia has been exercised since time immemorial and which Colombia has claimed for herself even after the decree of the commercial blockade.

To the final objection of the Venezuelan Commissioner, that there remained open to the firms an overland route, answer should be made that the same objection was made without success by England with respect to the United States of America, upon the opening of the St. Lawrence River. Overland communication is not a river route. By the report, a copy of which is presented herewith, it is seen, moreover, that freights overland were not open except by a decree of June 14, 1902, and they were so high that the adoption of this means of communication was equivalent to a complete stoppage.

With respect to the claim itself of G. Faber, it is seen, from the nature of the matter, that the damages suffered by German firms because of the commercial blockade could be individually proved and judicially substantiated only with difficulty. The principal proofs would consist of the books of the houses and the declarations of the claimants, and to give credit to these is a right which the supplemental convention gives to the Commission, as the honorable umpire has decided upon various occasions. The firm of Faber & Co. is a respectable German house of Cúcuta, the head of which is the consul of Germany. The items contained in its books merit entire belief, since it can not be supposed that the firm would have falsified its books for the purpose of presenting a possible future claim. The exactness of the data furnished by the firm upon which the amount of indemnity is based has been certified to by two experts, after an examination of the books. The German Commissioner, therefore, does not doubt that the facts upon which the estimation of the damage is based are true. The Venezuelan Commissioner objects that, according to the laws of Venezuela, the books of a commercial establishment are only regarded as proof when they serve to give evidence against the merchant. In accordance with the supplemental convention, Venezuelan legislation shall not be considered. Besides, by virtue of the principle of free estimation of proof, which no doubt also serves as a rule for a Venezuelan judge, it ought to be denied that in no case can the books of commercial houses be presented as means of arriving at the truth in favor of merchants. Everything depends upon the circumstances of the particular case. The judge may give credit to the items of the books; he must do so in so far as they militate against the merchant.

I. With respect to the different parts of the claim, I reject the first part, not because I consider the demand unjust, but because it is impossible to determine approximately that a portion of the labor of the employees was superfluous because of the commercial blockade.

II. What has been said with respect to item 1 is also applicable to item 5. It can not be calculated or estimated that part of the stores could not be utilized because of the blockade.

III. I consider item No. 3 well founded. The loss of interest upon money invested in crops of coffee which existed before the blockade was made effective is a true damage occasioned by the blockade, which must have resulted and ought to have been foreseen. The blockade had as an object the damaging of the Colombian exportation to force this State to make concessions in the question of boundaries and other matters. The injury arising for this reason and occasioned to German property ought, therefore, to be repaired. As the claimant asserts, and as it is also well known, money in Venezuela and Colombia can only be procured at the rate of 12 per cent, and the loss of interest estimated at 12 per cent does not seem exaggerated.

IV. The extension of insurance against fire upon the coffee held in Puerto Villamizar, an extension which was made necessary by the commercial blockade, ought likewise to be considered as a direct damage occasioned by the Venezuelan attitude, and therefore to be satisfied.

V. The same is true of the damage which the claimant house suffered from the storing of green coffee in Villamizar. The truth of the facts is moreover proved by the certificates of the Chamber of Commerce of Maracaibo and well-known merchants of that place. Reference is made for the present to the respective documents in the record relative to the claims of Beckman & Co., Brewer, Moller & Co., and Van Dissel & Co.

VI. What has been said under III is also true with respect to part VI and VII of the claim.

VIII. The duty of exportation upon coffee seems to me to be established with the object of burdening coffee which came from Colombia for exportation after the special reopening of the traffic upon the Zulia and Catatumbo rivers. It is clear also that if this Colombian coffee could have been exported in time, which was not possible because of the commercial blockade, it would not have had to pay the Venezuelan duty, since the duty was not established until February of the present year. I believe, therefore, that this claim can be maintained also. Nevertheless, if the honorable umpire considers it as a remote damage, I shall be obliged to agree in the rejection of the demand.

IX. The stoppage of all postal correspondence coming from and going to Cúcuta is the direct consequence of the commercial blockade, and, like it, is an illegal act. The stoppage of the mail, which is more clearly proven by the certificate of the German consul in Maracaibo under date of August 14 of the present year, is in violation of the treaty of the Universal Postal Union, to which Venezuela and Colombia are parties. The fact does not require any proof that commercial interests must have suffered serious injury because of this stoppage. I have attempted to obtain from the claimants detailed specifications of this damage and the Imperial German consul has answered me as follows:

After having conferred with the interested parties with respect to the proof of the amount of damage occasioned by the interruption of the postal services, I take the liberty of communicating to you their opinion * * * that it is very hard, and perhaps impossible, to obtain it in any concrete form. One of them lost one or more credits abroad, which were withdrawn because dispatches could not be sent to cover them, nor * * * could he even answer the letters of demand and warning * * * which did not reach his hands. Another, who had a branch house or friendly relations along the coast, found himself obliged to satisfy at a great loss the demands of his creditors and was hardly able thus to preserve his credit. From a third proofs and valuable documents were stolen. Under these circumstances the interested parties believe that the umpire ought to decide this point, taking into consideration all circumstances possible, the importance and extent of the commercial enterprises and each one of the commercial houses, as a civil judge does in cases of a demand for indemnity for a wanton killing or for the loss of a member of any house because of negligence. It would, for example, be nearly impossible to prove the exact value of a man's arm.

These remarks contain a great deal of truth. As a member of a tribunal of equity I believe that I am authorized to allow to the claimant a round sum, which I estimate according to my best endeavor and understanding at 10,000 bolivars, for the illegal stoppage of the commercial correspondence contrary to the treaty of the Universal Postal Union.

Because of what has been set forth, I ask the honorable umpire that he allow the claimant the following sums, together with the usual interest, that is to say, 21,724.76 bolivars, 1,200 bolivars, 10,112 bolivars, 14,211 bolivars, 5,182.23 bolivars, 16,103.88 bolivars, and 10,000 bolivars.

ZULOAGA, Commissioner (second opinion):

Articles 1 and 2 of Law XIV of the Code of Hacienda fixes what ports in Venezuela are opened for foreign commerce, exportation and importation, and those opened for exportation. In the western part of the Republic the port so qualified is Maracaibo. In article 10 of that law the National Executive is authorized to suppress and to remove these custom-houses already set up, which, by reason of contraband trade, or for any other causes prejudicial to the public treasury, may make it necessary in his opinion to adopt this measure.

Law XVIII regulates coastwise commerce—that is, interior maritime or coastwise commerce. This can not be carried on in conformity with article 1 of that law except in national vessels.

The interior commerce of the country along its navigable rivers is not, properly speaking, regulated; since these rivers are considered public highways, it is governed by the general laws of transportation (code of commerce).

The commerce which is carried on on Lake Maracaibo is coastwise commerce (art. 28, Law XXVIII), and therefore it can not be effected except in national vessels. The port of Encontrados is a coastwise port. (Art. 3, Law XIV.)

The rules concerning the register of vessels as national are those which appear in Law XXXIII. Foreigners (art. 24) may own national vessels, but the captain must be Venezuelan (art. 10), and for no reason can they make claims which could not be made by any Venezuelan owner and master of vessels. (Art. 24, above cited.)

The coastwise commerce of the Catatumbo is carried on in the manner and form which the Government of Venezuela considers proper, since it has its own interior commerce. There is this circumstance, that communication by the river Zulia as far as Colombia does not appear by the laws of Venezuela to be the most approved, but that of San Antonio does. The National Government, because of reasons of public order, can naturally regulate all the interior commerce, and respecting all other matters relating to the frontier the National Executive has the power which No. 14 of law 89 of the constitution gives him “to preserve the nation from every foreign attack.”

The decrees which the Government has issued closing to the commerce of Colombia the way along the upper part of the Zulia are not only the exercise of its own right, but also, as has been shown many times to this Commission, a duty imposed by the circumstances. Venezuela had been fearing an invasion from Colombia, and the way of the Zulia is particularly dangerous in case of an invasion. If river commerce were permitted, the steam launches and lighters which carry on this commerce could go over to Colombia, and at a given moment might serve very efficiently for invasion, taking possession in the first place of the railroad of Táchira in Encontrados, and later threatening the lake. The Government, according to the circumstances and the gravity of the situation, has forbidden all traffic, or has only permitted it to be carried on in lighters or has permitted launches to ascend. It has tried to reconcile the interest which commerce might have with the public safety. Besides the protest of the Government after the revolution of Rangel Garbiras, I find in the record of one of the claims a letter of Gen. Celistino Castro, chief of the volunteers, to one of the claimants, which I present with this argument, showing clearly the situation with respect to Colombia during the past months.

It is inexplicable that the measures adopted by the Government in these circumstances could give rise to the least objection, and for my part it seems still more inexplicable that the claimants should strive to prove that Venezuela was closed to commerce in transit with Colombia (which was certainly her right) when precisely the contrary appears; that is, that the Government had attempted to facilitate the passage of commerce, and that it had always done so in one way or another. The key to all this has been made plain to me at last by the study of two claims—that of the German warehouses and that of the navigation company of the lake and Catatumbo River. The claimants, because the Zulia was closed to traffic, are interested in these enterprises, and the foundation in reality has no other cause than the direct interest of these companies in the navigation of the Zulia.

In the claim of Faber, who is not domiciled in Venezuela, I have already stated the considerations which I believed pertinent. In the claim of Beckman & Co., of Maracaibo, I should further call attention to the fact that this is an individual domiciled in Venezuela, and therefore subject to its police laws and decrees of public safety.

I do not accept that distinction or difference which the Commissioner of Germany wishes to establish with respect to the German commerce of Cúcuta and the German commerce of Maracaibo, from which it would not appear that both places were German colonies. The commerce of Cúcuta is Colombian commerce, no matter what the nationality of some of the merchants there may be, just as the commerce of Maracaibo is Venezuelan. There are no colonies in this country. The injustice of the claims of Faber and Beckman submitted to the umpire is flagrant, and a further explanation is unnecessary.

Germany considered it proper in diplomatic notes to protest against the closure of traffic by the Zulia, and Venezuela answered, setting up her entire right to govern her own territory as she might consider proper. Venezuela does not need to concern herself in this Commission with a protest of powerful Germany. The greater the power of the nation may be the greater should be its justice, which is the very essence of modern civilization, and it is just this impartiality and justice which constitutes the honor of the international tribunal and elevates the mission of the umpire. Nevertheless, I must doubt that the Government of the Empire had an exact knowledge of the facts, since if they had been revealed to it in such a definite manner as they appear before this Commission, it is not to be believed that it would have assumed the attitude which it adopted.

I do not believe that I ought to concern myself in any way with the proofs presented by the claimants. If I did so briefly in my first opinion I did so only with the object of showing how strange it is that a claim should be sustained which has no foundation in law or fact. The right of Venezuela to reject these claims is too clear for me to occupy myself in discussing their amount.

There remains for me one last consideration. In his first opinion the German Commissioner insisted that these claims ought to be considered as admitted by Venezuela by virtue of article I of the protocol. This is to return to the question already decided by the umpire contrary to the opinion sustained by the German Commissioner.

The umpire agrees in opinion with the Venezuelan Commission that the fair construction of Article I, in which the Venezuelan Government "recognizes in principle the justice of claims of German subjects 'presented' by the Imperial Ger-ernment," is to restrict it to claims which had been presented at the time of the execution of the protocol. This is its literal wording, and Article II restricts the claims to "those originating from the Venezuelan civil wars of 1898 to 1900" and provides for their payment modo et forma.<sup>a</sup>

There are 22 records of claims for injuries already paid. Those of Faber and Beckman were not among them, and they could not have appeared before this Commission. It appears useless to continue to argue further upon a point already decided.

Faber makes, moreover, a claim for supposed damages because of the interruption of his correspondence. If Venezuela had prevented this postal correspondence with Colombia (which does not appear), it is her right (Bluntschli, Droit International Codifié, art. 500), and she need not render account to individuals, and if any sack of mail of other countries might have been lost in this territory it is a subject to be treated of by the respective postal offices. It is not the business of individuals, and I understand that there is in the treaty of the Postal Union no clause to make an office liable in case of loss. There are many causes which might occasion it.

DUFFIELD, Umpire:

This is one of several claims which grow out of the suspension of river traffic on the river Zulia by Executive decrees of Venezuela in 1900, 1901, and 1902. The claimant Faber is a German subject who resides and has his place of business in Cúcuta, in Colombia.

The Commissioners radically disagree as to the liability of Venezuela. The Commissioner for Venezuela first objects to the jurisdiction of the Commission or the power of the umpire to decide the question of Venezuela's right to control and, if in her judgment necessary, to suspend the navigation of the rivers in question. After explaining the discussion of this question between the two Republics, as shown by the published official diplomatic correspondence, and pointing out that the matter is additionally complicated by disputed questions of boundary in the territory tributary to these rivers, he says:

In this condition of affairs Germany intervened and pretends to assume for herself the cause of Colombia and force Venezuela to open the Zulia route under the pretext that there are some German merchants in Cúcuta who are injured by the Venezuelan decrees. It is impossible to imagine intervention by a third party more unreasonable and unlawful.

The question is between Venezuela and Colombia, and if decided can only be decided by those two countries alone and exclusively, and I must emphatically deny the allegation of the Commissioner for Germany, and affirm that it is entirely contrary to the tenor and spirit of the Washington protocol and the powers vested by it in this Commission; that, according to this treaty Germany is not authorized to put in dispute any matter which may compromise the sovereignty of Venezuela, nor put in dispute her present legal status which gives her exclusive sovereignty over her rivers and lakes. To sustain a claim for injuries to Cúcuta merchants with the reasons adduced, to the effect that the river Zulia must be opened to international commerce, is to surreptitiously introduce questions as to the sovereignty of Venezuela into a tribunal which is called upon to take cognizance only of matters of fact, in conformity with absolute equity, which precisely supposes the exclusion of those questions which exact another kind of study and another standard of judgment.

If there should possibly be a controversy between Venezuela and Colombia in regard to the matter, the consequence of this surreptitious intervention of Germany would lead to a legal precedent being found in the question which is submitted to the umpire—a precedent which would be a very singular one in the relations between the two Republics, whichever way it might be decided.

He also, without waiving in the least, but reiterating his objection and protest to the jurisdiction of the Commission over the claim, contends that the decree is a lawful exercise by Venezuela of sovereignty over that which is in her own territory and under her absolute dominion. He claims that under the recognized principles of international law governing such cases Venezuela has a general right to regulate and control the use of those portions of any rivers which are in her territory, even though they may come from or flow into the domain of another nation.

In addition, he contends that the laws of Venezuela confine river navigation to Venezuelan boats, and that such legislation is a lawful exercise of sovereignty by Venezuela; that neither the Zulia nor the Catatumbo has ever been navigated by German boats; that the draft of water in the Zulia River is only 2 feet, and in summer much less, until it flows into the Catatumbo, which has a normal depth of 5 feet about 100 kilometers above Lake Maracaibo; that Lake Maracaibo "is absolutely Venezuelan, and it has occurred to no nation to doubt it."

He also insists that the proofs are insufficient, because they consist of the testimony of two witnesses, of Cúcuta, who say that they have seen the books of Faber's house; "that the data on which the claim is supported agree with those books, and that the appraisals made, in their opinion, correspond with the truth;" that under article 1293 of the código civil the—books of merchants are evidence against them, and not in their favor, [and] that this is a general principle of law also, that a consul is not a proper authority in Colombia to legalize documents, which can be done only by the local authorities, and that no official can certify conclusions of law, and that the claim is absolutely without proof.

Taking up these objections in their inverse order, the objection to the inadmissibility of the consular certificate because of want of authority in that office to certify documents or copies thereof, is not well taken. It was decided by the Mixed Commission under the treaty of Ghent that a certificate of a British consul, or any British functionary, should be received in evidence.

It is true this was done in the formulating of rules of procedure and in specifying what the Commission would receive as evidence. It is well known to be the settled practice of consuls to certify copies of documents and private agreements.

The other objection to the admissibility and effect of the certificate, that it certifies to conclusions of law only, and not to facts, and that the only proof of the claimant consists in the testimony of two witnesses who say that they have seen the books of Faber's house, and testify to their conclusions therefrom, raises a more difficult question.

The language of the protocol commands the Commission—to receive and carefully examine all evidence presented to them by the Imperial German minister at Caracas and the Government of Venezuela. [And] In particular they shall be authorized to receive the declaration of claimants or their respective agents and to collect the necessary evidence.

If the word "evidence" as used in the protocol is to be interpreted in its usually accepted legal sense in law, namely, such testimony as is admissible under the rules of either the civil or common law, the objection of the Commissioner is well taken. It has been held, however, by a former justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Pelletier (Moore, p. 1752), that the technical rules of the common law in respect to evidence were not adapted to the proceedings before a mixed commission, and that "he would feel disposed to act upon whatever evidence satisfied his mind as to the actual facts."

Judge J. C. Bancroft Davis said, in Caldera cases (15 C. Cls. R., 546):<sup>a</sup>

In the means by which justice is to be attained the court is freed from the technical rules of evidence imposed by the common law, and is permitted to ascertain truth by any method which produces moral conviction.

This proposition is self-evident. * * *

In its wider and universal sense it [evidence] embraces all means by which any alleged fact, the truth of which is submitted to examination, may be established or disproved. (1 Green. Ev., sec. 1.)

International tribunals are not bound by local restraints; they always exercise great latitude in such matters (Meade's case, 2 C. Cls. R., 271), and give to affidavits, and sometimes even to unverified statements, the force of depositions.

In deference to these decisions, and because of the character of the conclusions of fact which the consul and the witnesses erroneously substitute for copies of the papers, and because of the provision in the protocol requiring the Commissioners to disregard objections of a technical nature, and, further, because there is no doubt in the mind of the umpire as to the truth or correctness of these conclusions, which do not involve any question of law, the umpire will accept the same as proof.

Coming now to the main objection of the Commissioner for Venezuela, first, the umpire is unable to sustain the claim that—the question is between Venezuela and Colombia, and if decided can only be decided by those countries alone and exclusively, and that according to the protocol Germany is not authorized to put in dispute any matter which may compromise the sovereignty of Venezuela.

While it would be regrettable that any decision of the Commission might have a direct bearing upon an international dispute between Colombia and Venezuela, certainly if a case arose in which a German subject had been deprived of property or rights of property by an act of Venezuela the jurisdiction of this Commission over his claim would be as complete as its jurisdiction over any other claim. This Commission does not decide the dispute between Venezuela and Colombia. Incidental to its decision on the merits of the claim it may have to express its opinion on the question between them. While it is true that such opinion would probably be quoted by the State in whose favor it would happen to be, it would have no authoritative force, and be only entitled to such consideration as the logic of its reasoning might give.

As to the main objection of the Commissioner for Venezuela that her acts in closing the ports in question were fully within the attributes of her sovereignty, the Commissioner for Germany insists to the contrary. In the course of a very able discussion of the question, to which he has brought great research, he maintains:<sup>b</sup>

To begin, it can not be denied that a sovereign state possesses absolute authority over its rivers and water courses as far as the boundary lines of other states. This principle is nevertheless limited in two ways in international law. When a river is the only route of communication and indispensable to the existence of another state or part of it, its use can not be entirely prohibited. (Citing Heffter, Int. Law of Europe, Berlin, 1857, p. 147.)

He also cites Heffter, Puffendorf, Groot, and Vattel, that a state can not deny to another nation without committing an act of hostility.

and no state can prevent another from getting its commerce to the market of a third without giving offense and inflicting injury, and he claims that "these international maxims whose object is to draw nations together have been at different times embraced in treaties," a number of which he cites, and concludes:

It must be considered as an international doctrine that the navigation of rivers passing through the territory of several states, together with all their affluents, must be free from the point where they begin to be navigable to the point where they empty into the sea.<sup>a</sup>

The respect due the Government of Germany, which presents the claim as a proper one in case the facts alleged in support of it are proven, and the rights of the claimant in the large amount involved, together with those of others in like situation (2,401,685 marks), calls for the most careful consideration by the umpire of the respective opinions of the Commissioners, each of whom has filed responding opinions, and necessitates a discussion of their different contentions.

The general subject of the free use of rivers running to the sea has been very much discussed by writers on international law from the earliest times.

The territory of the Republic of Colombia encompasses the Republic of Venezuela on the north, west, and south. Its boundary begins at Point Peret, on the western shore of the Gulf of Maracaibo, thence running in a southerly direction along the Sierra of Periga to a little south of San José de Cúcuta, where it turns and continues in an easterly direction to the Orinoco; thence up the Orinoco, which for this distance forms the boundary between the two Republics; and thence in a generally southern direction to the northern boundary of Brazil.

The principal commercial waterways, domestic and oceanic, of Colombia are the Magdalena and its main affluent, the Cauca, which flow almost the entire length of Colombia northward to the sea, and the rivers Meta and Guaviare, rising in the oriental Cordilleras and flowing eastward until they reach the Orinoco, on the boundary line between Venezuela and Colombia, and thence by that stream through the territory of Venezuela to the sea. In addition, Colombia possesses a great extent of coast line, on both the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Venezuela is not so well equipped by nature for ocean commerce. Its main arteries east of the Andes Mountains and north of the numerous sierras on the boundary of Brazil are the Orinoco river and its affluent, the Apure. In the western portion of the Republic the only avenue of oceanic commerce is through the Gulf of Maracaibo, the western shore of which as far into the gulf as Calabozo Bay is Colombian territory, thence through Lake Maracaibo and the Catatumbo River, which is only navigable for vessels of 5 feet draft of water, to about 6 miles above Encontrados, at or near which point the Zulia River flows into the Catatumbo. The Zulia has normal depth of water of 2 feet, and is navigable for small steam vessels and lighters and canoes as far up as Port Villamizar.

The Catatumbo River rises in Colombia a short distance from the Venezuelan boundary. Thereafter it continues in the territory of the latter exclusively until it discharges into Lake Maracaibo. The Gulf of Maracaibo is from 250 to 300 miles east of the mouth of the Magdalena River. The western shore of the Gulf of Maracaibo, from Point Gallinas to Calabozo Bay, is Colombian territory. The point at which Lake Maracaibo empties into the Gulf of Maracaibo is, however, entirely within Venezuelan territory. The depth of water at this point is  $10\frac{1}{2}$  feet. The bar at the point where the Catatumbo River enters Lake Maracaibo has a normal depth of but 5 feet. The Catatumbo River from Lake Maracaibo to Lake Encontrados has a normal depth of not to exceed 5 feet. It is not accurate, therefore, to say that the Zulia River is indispensable to the existence of Santander, or that it is the only route of communication of Santander through the Republic of Colombia to the sea. The Magdalena River, which furnishes a route to the sea for most of the fertile part of Colombia, is navigable to Honda, a point more than a hundred miles south (inland) of the latitude of the port of Villamizar, and is navigable from Honda to the ocean for larger-draft vessels.

Normal physical conditions require freight from San José de Cúcuta and the Caribbean Sea to be carried as follows: From Cúcuta to Puerto Villamizar, on the Zulia River, by Colombia Railroad, the termini of which are Puerto Villamizar and a point in Colombia on the Táchira River, opposite San Antonio. At Puerto Villamizar it must be reshipped onto small stern-wheel steamers of not more than 2 feet draft of water; or lighters, with a capacity of 400 quintals, called bongos, which are propelled by poling; or canoes, and carried to Encontrados. Here it is reshipped onto lake-going vessels, which carry it to Maracaibo, where it is again reshipped onto seagoing vessels.

There are two railroads which can be made use of in the carriage of freight for the territory tributary to the Zulia and Catatumbo rivers—the Táchira Railroad, which is entirely within Venezuela, with its termini at Encontrados and Uraica and La Fria; the Cúcuta Railroad, above mentioned, which is entirely in Colombia, with its termini at Cúcuta and Puerto Villamizar; also, a highway called the Urena road, leading from Colombia into Venezuela and crossing the boundary of the two Republics near Urena, in Venezuela.

The effect of the several decrees of Venezuela, translations of which are appended, was as follows:

The decree of September 11, 1900, suspended all river traffic above Encontrados, whether bound up or down; that of March 4, 1901, modified this suspension so as to permit "commerce to be carried on on the rivers Zulia and Catatumbo," but only by means of lighters and canoes, so long as new fears of public troubles do not exist to the contrary, "but did not permit the use of steam vessels;" that of July 29, 1901, "revoked the decree of the 4th of March, 1901, and revived the decree of September 11, 1900," suspending all river traffic above Encontrados. This condition of affairs continued until the decree of June 14, 1902, which "temporarily permitted transportation of merchandise over the Urena road between Cúcuta and Maracaibo, and vice versa, the Encontrados way being left open for river trade only."

The decree of January 15, 1903, however, by—

Article I, revoked the absolute prohibition of traffic between Encontrados and Puerto Villamizar prescribed by the decree of July 29, 1901;

Article II, revived the permission of traffic by means of lighters (bongos) and canoes, but limited it to the El Guayabo, whence it must be by rail;

Article III, permitted steam and sailing vessels to carry merchandise en route for Colombia only between Maracaibo and Encontrados.

Finally, the decree of April 3, 1903, by—

Article II, abrogated the provisions of Article II of the decree of January 15, 1903, in respect to the importation of merchandise en route for Colombia "until the objections to said importations are removed." This decree has not at any time been modified and is still in force. The present situation, therefore, only permits navigation of steam and sailing vessels en route for Colombia between Maracaibo and Encontrados (Art. III of decree of January 15, 1903) and the transportation of merchandise over the Urena road between Cúcuta and Maracaibo (decree of June 14, 1902).

There had been in the year 1899 much discussion between the two Republics as to their respective rights on the Orinoco River. It terminated without reaching any satisfactory understanding, and is still unadjusted. The situation of the Orinoco River, however, is materially different from the Catatumbo and Zulia. The former river rises in Brazil and forms the boundary line between Venezuela and Colombia, as above stated, and thence runs entirely in Venezuelan territory, to the sea. The two Republics, as to that portion of it which forms their boundaries, about 200 miles in length, are coriparian proprietors, a relation they do not at any point sustain as to either the Catatumbo or Zulia rivers.

The Catatumbo, so far as it is navigable, is entirely within the boundaries of Venezuela after the confluence of the Zulia with it.

On account of these and other differences in the situation and the physical conditions of the two rivers and those of the Orinoco, this decision is not intended to, and must not, be considered as even intimating any opinion in respect to the Orinoco River.

We are met on the threshold of the discussion with the fact that no direct oceanic navigation was interrupted. Physical limitations deprive Colombia of the enjoyment of direct oceanic traffic through Venezuelan territory. No seagoing vessels can thus pass into Colombian territory. All must stop at Maracaibo, where all ocean freight must be reshipped. The case, therefore, is not one in which a foreigner is deprived by the act of Venezuela of the use of waters to which nature has given him direct access. That right Venezuela has not attempted to restrict. She permits him to carry his goods in the vessel in which they entered her territory as far as nature permits him. But the claimant insists that because of the nature of his business he suffers damage because goods are not permitted to be twice reshipped in the territory of Venezuela and thus transported into Colombia. Obviously this is a very different matter. First, it of necessity involves the use of land of Venezuela not incidental to navigation merely, but for the transshipment, carriage, and handling of freight on her shores. Second, it extends the claim of free navigation of rivers to a new case, for which I have found no precedent.

It is one thing for a foreigner to claim, "I have a right to navigation for my vessels wherever natural conditions permit, and Venezuela can not restrict it." But it is quite another thing to claim, "I have a right to send my goods over the inland waters of Venezuela, reshipping them into smaller and smaller vessels as often as the lessening depth of water may require." The question seems to be one of regulating commerce, rather than restricting internal navigation. It also appears that the laws of Venezuela with reference to internal navigation over its rivers and lakes require a nationalization of the vessels engaged therein. They also define interior maritime commerce of coast or river trade to be that which is established between ports and points on the banks of the rivers or shores of Venezuela in national boats with foreign merchandise which has paid duty, or fruits or other productions of the country. Another provision of law requires captains of vessels engaged in this trade to be Venezuelan citizens.

That these provisions were within the proper exercise of Venezuela's sovereignty can not be doubted. It results, therefore, that in the lawful exercise of such sovereignty she has excluded from her internal commerce boats of other nationalities and required even the boats of Venezuelan nationality to be commanded by Venezuelans.

For a considerable period before the decree of September 11, 1900, was issued there were internal political disturbances in the territory tributary to the Catatumbo and Zulia rivers. The relations between Venezuela and Colombia were at the same time seriously strained, and the former complained that revolutionist plans and movements found moral and material support on Colombian territory, which afforded a secure base of operations for them.

In this state of affairs the various decrees complained of were promulgated. It is evident that their purpose was to control the passage of vessels, especially steamers, to and fro between Colombia and Venezuela. The language of some of the decrees intimate fears of hostile forces entering Venezuela in that way. In July, 1901, Gen. Rángel Garbiras had begun his insurrection, which at one time seemed threatening, from Colombia. A part of his forces came into Venezuela by way of the Zulia and Catatumbo rivers. It may be reasonably presumed that this was the cause of the decree of July 29, 1901, revoking the permission given in that of March 4, 1901.

The concrete question, therefore, in the case is whether, under these physical and political conditions, Venezuela had the right to suspend the traffic on these rivers by the closing of these ports. She was in full possession of them and they were actually under her sovereignty. This distinguishes the case from that of the Orinoco Asphalt Company, just decided.<sup>a</sup>

As has been shown above, there is no substantial contradiction of authorities as to the rights of a state to regulate, and, if necessary to the peace, safety, and convenience of her own citizens, to prohibit temporarily navigation on rivers which flow to the sea. What is necessary to peace, safety, and convenience of her own citizens she must judge, and it seems to the umpire quite clear that in any case calling for an exercise of that judgment her decision is final. That a case for the exercise of this discretion did exist at the dates of the various decrees complained of is obvious, and in the opinion of the umpire the decision of Venezuela in the premises can not be reviewed by this Commission or any other tribunal. Being of the opinion that the closing of the ports of the Catatumbo and Zulia rivers under the circumstances which existed at the time was a lawful exercise of sovereignty by the Republic of Venezuela, the claim is disallowed.

A complete examination of the question leads back to the differing theories of the true source of natural law. It would extend this opinion to too great a length to discuss them, but a brief statement of them is pertinent.

Some philosophers, while admitting that human ideas of right spring solely from revelation, do not agree that natural law is but the consequence of revelation of divine or moral law. (Statel. Rechts philosophie, V. I.)

Others derive their idea of natural law from the most abstract theories of reason, without taking into account the continual changes of social relations, which, being the practical basis of that law, necessarily exert an influence on the idea itself. (Grotius-Kant.)

While others, still, putting aside both the abstract and objective idea of a Supreme Being, discuss the source of natural law in the supreme and absolute faculty of the abstraction they call esprit du monde. (Hegel.) They construct the moral and material world by the dialectic process of an abstract idea, and define the state as the realization of God in the world. The consequence is the complete absorption of the citizen in the state and the individual in the "pantheistic chaos of universal reason," which, on the other hand, has no conscience of its own. Still another school recognizes natural law as the science which exhibits the first principles of right founded in the nature of man and conceived by reason. (Ahrens.)

But when the crucial question comes, from what authority natural law is derived, each publicist seeks to solve it in his own way.

The theory of Grotius was that on the establishment of separate property, which he conceived grew by agreement out of an original community of goods, there were reserved for the public benefit certain of the preexisting natural rights, and that one of these was the passage over territory, whether by land or by water, and whether in the form of navigation of rivers for commercial purposes, or of an army over neutral ground, which he held to be an innocent use, the concession of which it was not competent to a nation to refuse.

It is on this doctrine that some writers on international law uphold the principle of the freedom of river navigation.

Gronovius and Barbeyrac, in their notes to Grotius, consider the right of levying dues for permission to navigate rivers. This would seem to imply the right to prohibit navigation. It has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the lottery cases that the right to regulate commerce includes the right to prohibit.

Bluntschli (par. 314) broadly states that water courses which flow into the sea, and navigable rivers which are in communication with an independent sea, are open to the commerce of all nations, but he restricts the right to the time of peace.

Calvo holds that where a river traverses more than one territory the right of navigation and of commerce on it is common to all who inhabit its banks, but when it is wholly within the territory of a single state it is considered as within the exclusive sovereignty of that state. He limits the exercise of that sovereignty to fiscal regulations, but seems to subordinate the right of property to that of navigation.

Fiore (758-768) agrees in the main with Calvo, that in the case of a river flowing through one state only, that state may close the river if it chooses.

It is difficult to sustain the distinction of a navigable river running into the sea.

Heffter, paragraph 77, says that each of the proprietors of a river flowing through several states, the same as the sole proprietor of a river, can, stricti jure, regulate the proper use of the waters, and restrict it to the inhabitants of the country and exclude others. But, on the other hand, he agrees with Grotius, Puffendorf, and Vattel, at least in principle, that the privilege of innocent use should not be refused absolutely to any nation and its subjects in the interest of universal commerce.

Wheaton (Elements of International Law, pt. 2, ch. 4, par. 11, Lawrence's ed.) declares that the right of navigation, for commercial purposes, of a river which flows through the territories of different states, is common to all the nations inhabiting the different parts of its banks. But this right of innocent passage being what the text writers call an imperfect right, its exercise is necessarily modified by the safety and convenience of the state affected by it, and can only be effectively secured by mutual convention regulating the mode of its exercise, citing Grotius, Vattel, and Puffendorf.

Halleck says (vol. 1, p. 147, chap. 6, sec. 23) that the right of navigation for commercial purposes is common to all the nations inhabiting the banks of a navigable river, subject to such provisions as are necessary to secure the safety and convenience of the several states affected.

De Martens, Précis, paragraph 84, recognizes, as a general rule, that the exclusive right of each nation to its territory authorizes a country to close its entry to strangers, but that it is wrong to refuse them innocent passage. It is for the state to judge what passage is innocent. But he seems to think that the geographical position of another state may give it a right to demand, and in case of need to force, a passage for its commerce.

Woolsey, paragraph 62, says:

When a river rises within the bounds of one state and empties into the sea in another, international law allows to the inhabitants of the upper waters only a moral claim or imperfect right to its navigation.

Phillimore, in speaking of the refusal of England to open the St. Lawrence unconditionally to the United States, says (pt. 1, Par. CLXX):

It seems difficult to deny that Great Britain may have grounded her refusal on strict law; but it is at least equally difficult to deny that by so doing she put in force an extreme and hard law, not consistent with her conduct with respect to the Mississippi.

Klüber, paragraph 76, considers that the independence of the states is to be particularly noted in the free and exclusive usage of the right over water courses—at least in the territory of the state in which the water course flows into the sea, navigable rivers, channels, and lakes are situate. * * *

And that—a state can not be accused of injustice if it forbids all passage of foreign vessels on its water courses, flowing to the sea, rivers, channels, or lakes in its territory.

Twiss, Volume 1, section 145, page 233, second edition, declares that—a nation having physical possession of both banks of a river is held to be in juridical possession of the stream of water contained within its banks, and may rightfully exclude at its pleasure every other nation from the use of the stream whilst it is passing through its territory.

It is to be observed that distinctions are drawn by some of the above text writers, some declaring that the right of innocent use is confined to time of peace; others that only the inhabitants of those countries through which the river passes have the right of innocent use, while still others sustain the right without any limitation, save the right of the state to make necessary and proper regulations in respect to the use of the stream within its boundaries.

The theory of Grotius, mentioned above, has been said to be the "root of such legal authority as is now possessed by the principle of the freedom of river navigation." (Hall's Treatise on International Law, p. 137.) It does not appear to have been adopted by the best annotators on international law. Hall says: "It can no longer be accepted as an argumentative starting point." (Hall's Treatise on International Law, p. 139.)

Phillimore speaks of it as a "fiction which this great man believed," and says:

But as the basis of this opinion clearly was, and is now universally acknowledged to be a fiction, this reason, built upon the supposition of its being a truth, can be of no avail. (Phillimore's Com. on International Law, p. 190, Sec. CLVII.)

The other theory, also of Grotius, was because the use of rivers belonged to the class of things "utilitatis innoxie," the value of streams being in no way whatever diminished to the proprietors by this innocent use of them by others, inasmuch as the use of them is inexhaustible. (Vattel, Bk. I, chap. 23.)

This right of mere passage by one nation over the domain of another, whether it be an arm of the sea, or lake or river, or even the land, is considered by him as one of strict law, and not of comity. It is said on the other hand that it is not founded on any sound or satisfactory reason, and is at variance with that of almost all other jurists. (Phillimore, ubi sup.)

The same view was taken by Grotius, but the great weight of authority since Vattel is that the state through which a river flows is to be the sole judge of the right of foreigners to the use of such river. (Wheaton's International Law, Vol. I, p. 229, cited from Wharton, Vol. I, sec. 30, p. 97.)

Still another ground is asserted as a basis for this free use of rivers, viz, that conceding the proprietary rights of the state over that portion of the river within its boundaries, nevertheless these should be subordinated to the general interests of mankind, as the proprietary rights of individuals in organized communities are governed by the requirements of the general good. It is pertinently remarked by an eminent jurist that this—involved the broad assertion that the opening of all waterways to the general commerce of nations is an end which the human race has declared to be as important to it as those ends to which the rights of the individual are sacrificed by civil communities, are to the latter. (Hall, p. 139.)

Most of the advocates of the innocent use of rivers base their claim upon the grounds that the inhabitants of lands traversed by another portion of the stream have a special right of use of the other portions because such use is highly advantageous to them. If the proprietary right of the state to the portion of the river within its boundaries be conceded, as it must be generally, there can be no logical defense of this position. It certainly is a novel proposition that because one may be so situated that the use of the property of another will be of special advantage to him he may on that ground demand such use as a right.

The rights of an individual are not created or determined by his wants or even his necessities. The starving man who takes the bread of another without right is none the less a thief, legally, although the immorality of the act is so slight as to justify it. Wants or necessities of individuals can not create legal rights for them, or infringe the existing rights of others. (Hall, p. 149.)

It seems difficult upon principle to support the right to the free use of rivers as a right stricti juris. While this is not expressly admitted, it is tacitly conceded by nearly all the advocates. They define this right of use as an "imperfect right." The term is an anomaly. The fallacy is thus aptly stated by a learned authority on international law:

A right, it is alleged, exists; but it is an imperfect one, and therefore its enjoyment may always be subjected to such conditions as are required in the judgment of the state whose property is affected, and for sufficient cause it may be denied altogether. (Hall, p. 140.)

Woolsey terms it "only a moral or imperfect right to navigation."

However, it is no longer to be doubted that the reason of the thing and the opinion of other jurists, spoken generally, seem to agree in holding that the right can only be what is called (however improperly) by Vattel and other writers imperfect, and that the state through whose domain the passage is to be made "must be the sole judge as to whether it is innocent or injurious in its character." (Phillimore, CLVII, citing Puffendorf, Wheaton's Elements of International Law, Hesty's Law of Nations, Wolff's Institutes, Vattel.)

From this review of the authorities it seems that even in respect of rivers capable of navigation by sea-going vessels carrying oceanic commerce the weight of authority sustains the right of Venezuela to make the decrees complained of. But in the opinion of the umpire there are other considerations which control the decision in this case.

If the case before the umpire turned upon this general question of international law, the umpire is inclined to the opinion that he would be compelled to sustain the right of Venezuela to the complete control of navigation of the Catatumbo and Zulia rivers. In his opinion it is not necessary to decide the case on this ground. As has been shown above, there is no contradiction of authority as to the right of Venezuela to regulate, and, if necessary to the peace, safety, or convenience of her own citizens, to prohibit altogether navigation on these rivers. It is also equally without doubt that her judgment in the premises can not be reviewed by this Commission or any other tribunal. That a case for the exercise of discretion did exist is obvious.

The other claimants who ask damages for the closing of these ports are all residents of and doing business in Maracaibo, in Venezuela. There was suggestion in the discussion of the case that there might be different rule as between a Venezuelan resident and a resident of Colombia, but in the opinion of the umpire, given a common German nationality, there is no such difference.

PLANTAGEN GESELLSCHAFT CASE.

Evidential value of letters and unauthenticated receipts.<sup>a</sup> Valentiner case affirmed.<sup>b</sup>

DUFFIELD, Umpire:

This claim is for 387,143.39 marks, and is founded on the alleged injuries to the haciendas of the claimants during the last civil wars. It appears that these haciendas were in the neighborhood of active military operations and the scene of considerable fighting. Part I of the claim in the amount of 369,968 marks and Part II in the amount of 7,354 marks are almost entirely made up of claims for consequential damages—loss of crops already planted, prevention of planting of other crops, inability to protect the growing crops from birds which destroyed them because of the impossibility of working and the frequent drafting of the laborers.

The Commissioners disagree as to the liability of Venezuela for these damages, and the case is governed by the decision of the umpire in the case of Hugo Valentiner, No. 12 (see p. 562).

The Commissioner for Germany, however, is of the opinion that there are certain "direct injuries proven, and although their value is not fixed, he leaves it to the umpire for reasons of equity to grant to the claimant an indemnification amounting in round figures to 20,000 bolivars." In the opinion of the umpire there is proof of very considerable injuries to the property of the claimant, for which the umpire would certainly have allowed him damages if he adduced any proof as to the amount of values. In the absence, however, of such proof, notwithstanding the hardship of the case, the umpire sees no legal or legitimate way of arriving at the sum of 20,000 bolivars. There is the testimony, however, of two witnesses, Oropeza and another, as to the destruction of 231,230 4-year-old coffee plants, a fair valuation of which, in the opinion of the umpire, is 20,000 bolivars, and this sum will be allowed the claimant.

Of Part III of the claim, 9,820.45 marks, the Commissioner for Venezuela allows 1,472 marks for property taken from a driver of the claimant company on the January 4, 1903, but denies the liability of Venezuela for the remainder of the part. His reasons therefor are as follows:

That the item of 5,504 marks is only proven by the letter or statement of the manager of the hacienda, and that the prices which the claimant places on the animals which he says were lost are in general double their value. The Commissioner for Germany insists that the proof is sufficient, and fixes the value of the property taken upon the basis allowed by the Commission in the claim of Steinworth & Co., No. 55, and other claims, at 3,744 marks.

While the proofs as to these items are very meager, the umpire concurs in the opinion of the Commissioner for Germany and awards the claimant on account thereof 3,744 marks.

That the items for injuries from February 7, 1902, to January 31, 1903, 2,563.90 marks, are not proven, because the receipts purporting to be therefor are not authenticated. He also criticises them because they are stamped with the seal of the Jefatura Civil of Carayaca. In view of the fact that the evidence fully establishes the occupation of the hacienda by both Government forces and revolutionists, and the taking of property therefrom, the umpire is unable to agree with the Commissioner for Venezuela and disregard these receipts as evidence, and the claim will be allowed for the sums named in the receipts, which is the amount claimed.

The entire claim, therefore, is allowed at the sum of 30,098 bolivars, which includes interest up to December 31, 1903.

THE GREAT VENEZUELAN RAILROAD CASE.

An agreement between the Government and the railroad company to the effect that if the railroad will carry troops and munitions of war the Government will see that the railroad is indemnified for all damages resulting therefrom is absolutely void, as it is against public policy, and because the railroad company as a quasi public corporation is bound to carry all persons and freight, not in themselves obnoxious, which may be presented to it.

Kummerow case <sup>a</sup> affirmed.

Only legal rate of interest as provided by Venezuelan laws will be allowed on claims. Government of Venezuela not liable for damages caused by guerrillas.

No damages allowed for suspension of traffic over railroad during period of active operations in the field through which the railroad passed because this was justified as a military necessity.

CLAIM I.

Item 1 of this claim, 142,615 bolivars, is divided into two parts. The first part is for 6,215 bolivars, for damages for injuries caused by the derailment near Cagua of a special night train from Maracay to Cagua, on December 19, 1901. The second part is for 136,400 bolivars, for damages for the suspension of all traffic on the railroad from December 23, 1901, to January 9, 1902, by an order of the department of public works (ministerio de obras publicas) of December 23, 1901, published in the Official Gazette of the 26th of December, 1901, No. 2481.

Item 2, 47,635.86 bolivars, is for interest to July, 1903, at 12 per cent per annum on item 1.

CLAIM II.

Item 1, 37,181.50 bolivars, is composed of parts "a" and "b." Part "a," 10,181.50 bolivars, is for damages and injuries owing to the transportation by the railroad of troops and munitions of war. Part "b," 27,000 bolivars, is for damages and injuries to the steam tramway from Guigue and to the steamer Lake Valencia between December 30, 1901, and October 1, 1902.

Item 2, 3,413.27 bolivars, is for interest at 12 per cent per annum to July, 1903, on item 1.

CLAIM III.

Item 1, 213,199.65 bolivars, is composed of parts "a" and "b." Part "a" is for 169,767.40 bolivars for damages and injuries to the railroad owing to transportation of troops and munitions of war and for the enforced suspension and interruption of traffic from October 1 to December 1, 1902. Part "b" is for 43,432.25 bolivars for damages and injuries to the road owing to transportation of troops and for the enforced suspension and interruption of traffic to the end of 1902.

Item 2, 12,791.98 bolivars, is for interest at 12 per cent per annum to July, 1903, on item 1.

CLAIM IV.

Item 1, 789,500.53 bolivars, is made up of two parts. The first part, 537,632.90 bolivars, is for fares and freight in 1899 and the balance due on the order of the board of public works (ministerio de obras publicas), dated July 12, 1900, on the Bank of Venezuela. In the statement of the claim there is no division of this part showing how much of it is fares and freights and how much balance due on the order. The second part, 251,867.63 bolivars, is interest on the above part.

Item 2, 12,791.98 bolivars, is composed of two parts. The first part, 557.45 bolivars, is for fares of the government of the Federal district, charged to the National Government under the authority of its note of October 7, 1901. The second part, 288.62 bolivars, is for interest on the said first part.

The Commissioners agree upon the allowance of claim IV at the sum of 575,056 bolivars, which includes interest to the 31st of December, 1903. (Vide acts of the sixteenth session, July 27.) Upon all of the other items they disagree.

The first opinion of the Commissioner for Venezuela was completed before that of the Commissioner for Germany, and is referred to therein. It is not disputed that the official of the railroad company in charge at Maracay refused the request of General Bello, commandant at arms at that place, for a train to Cagua on the night of the 19th of December, 1901, at 9.30, and General Bello was only able to obtain it by force a little after 2 o'clock on the morning of the 20th. Even then—neither the engineer nor the company rendered any assistance to the chief of the Government, who was starting out for no less a purpose than to destroy the revolution at its root and to capture its principal military chief.

Prior to this the company, on the 16th of the same month, through its managing director, sent to the minister of public works a letter in which he stated that he had received an anonymous letter—published in full in the Official Gazette of the 26th of December, 1901, No. 8421—containing, among other things, the following:

The transportation over the railroad belonging to your company may bring many injuries upon your line and may be the cause of many misfortunes.

THE PARTIES INTERESTED.

In the correspondence between the railroad and the Government at this time, which is found in the Official Gazette of the 26th and 28th of December, 1901, and January 13, 1902, the managing director of the railroad company writes that he has received an anonymous letter threatening his company with injuries in case it transported any troops or material of war for the Government, and requests the minister of public works to forward the note to the President of the Republic in order that he might order the stoppage of transportation of war material and troops over the line, or, if that was impossible, to satisfactorily guarantee the company reparation for all the injuries and losses that might come to it because of such transportation. To this note the minister of public works replied, criticising the managing director for taking so much notice of an anonymous letter and that the time of conflict, which in his imagination had begun, or which he knew from his knowledge of affairs was about to begin, should seem to him a propitious time to collect from the Government sums which former administrations owed, administrations the company had not refused to serve with transportation without guaranties, and of which the present Government had paid up to August, 1901, nearly 400,000 bolivars and had always paid the railroad its own obligations.

On the 22d of December, 1901, the managing director of the railroad declined to fill an order for the transportation of a detachment of troops. In connection with this refusal the managing director sent to the minister of public works a letter, from one Rodriguez, calling himself "chief of greater state, of division 'Caracas,'" in which he threatened damage to the railroad if they carried troops or munitions of war for the Government.

On the 23d of December the prefect of police, and subsequently the governor of the district at Caracas, stopped a train and ordered the suspension of all trains. To the complaint of the managing director for this action the minister of public works replied, stating there was no revolution at the time of the director's first letter, and commenting upon the director's knowledge of what afterwards happened, and saying that the Government finds it necessary to order that if it can not get service from the railroad the railroad shall not give it to others, and that on account of his conduct the Government considered the managing director hostile to the interests of public peace.

After considerable acrimonious correspondence, and a request by the Government to the Berlin directors of the railroad to substitute another managing director, because the Government considered the present one to have taken a hostile attitude, even before the revolution, to which the Berlin directors did not accede, saying they did not believe the managing director was a revolutionist, and asking proof of his illegal conduct, the parties entered into an agreement on the 9th day of January, 1902. The agreement was executed by the minister of public works on the part of the Government and the managing director on the part of the railroad. In it the company "acknowledges the obligation of transporting troops and material of war for the Government," and the Government obliges itself in cases of war to indemnify the railroad for the losses which it may suffer because of such transportation, including pensions to Venezuelans, according to Venezuelan law, and to foreigners in a gross sum equal to nine years' salary, and agrees to order the opening of traffic on the railroad.

The conclusion which the Commissioner for Venezuela wishes should be deduced from these facts is not clearly stated in his opinion, but as he says, "for these reasons I disallow the entire claim I, 142,615 bolivars," it is fair to infer that he is of the opinion that this conduct on the part of the managing director absolved the Government from all liability for the derailment of the train from Maracay to Cagua and for the suspension of traffic.

The Commissioner for Germany is, however, of the opinion that there is no evidence of the charge that the railroad or its managing director were in any wise connected or in complicity with the revolutionists, and he somewhat warmly resents this imputation against the company. While he does not expressly make the claim, it is fairly inferable that he bases the right of the company to damages for the suspension of traffic upon the agreement of the Government to guarantee the company as above stated. This agreement, he says, was made through the exchange of diplomatic notes, the imperial legation reserving to the railroad the right to collect for injuries and losses owing to the suspension of traffic. The actual agreement, however, makes no reference to either diplomatic notes or to a reservation of a right to collect for injuries and losses owing to the suspension of traffic.

The umpire is unable to concur in the opinion of either of the Commissioners. In his opinion there is not sufficient proof to establish any complicity of the managing director with the revolutionists, although his peculiar if not inexplicable conduct in the transaction might naturally lead the Government to suspect it. On the other hand, the umpire is clearly of the opinion that the contract between the minister of public works and the railroad, in which the minister attempts to bind the Government for all the injuries which the railroad may suffer because of its performance of a lawful act, if not duty, in transporting troops and material of war to enable the Government to put down a rebellion, is utterly invalid—first, because it is contrary to public policy and conflicts with the highest law of any nation, the safety of its people; and, second, because it is the duty of a railroad company which exercises public functions, and is a quasi public corporation, to carry all freight and passengers not in themselves obnoxious which may be offered for transportation. Moreover, the company was bound by its express agreement to carry troops and munitions of war in the article of its concession which stipulated the rates of fares and freights to be paid. It is utterly inconsistent with the constitutional powers of a government and with the most sacred rights of its people to hold that a railroad company may, upon the mere basis of threats of persons, anonymous or not, to commit unlawful acts, decline to perform a lawful act. Revolutions are unlawful—are positively illegal; their object is to break down the de jure and de facto government and to the existing system of law; their leaders and followers are by the laws of all civilized nations guilty of the highest crime known to the law, treason, and until success, therefore, anyone who aids or abets a revolution is a violator of the law and any citizen who omits or fails to assist the government violates his duty as a citizen. And while a corporation has no political status, one created by a government with special and quasi public privileges owes the legal duty to that government to exercise its franchise in the latter's behalf and for its assistance.

For these reasons the railroad company, in the opinion of the umpire, can base no claim upon its agreement.

The liability of Venezuela, therefore, for the suspension of traffic in 1901 must depend upon general principles of law. There can be no reasonable doubt that it is the right of a government, in situations of danger or organized rebellion and revolution, to take such measures as it may deem proper to prevent the passage of persons, either for travel or business, from one point to another in the localities where there are armed and organized troops of insurrectionists, and to this end it certainly has the power and the right to suspend traffic upon any line of transportation; but this right is coupled with a corresponding duty, which is to make proper compensation to the company in cases other than those where the territory traversed by the railroad is the theater of active warlike operations between armed forces.

The Commissioner for Venezuela does not specifically claim that Venezuela had the right to suspend traffic over the railroad because the latter had lent itself to, if not associated itself with, the revolutionary movement of Matos, but he distinctly claims that the railroad had so associated itself, and that therefore, inasmuch as the railroad was carrying goods for the revolutionists, and also persons who were enabled by such facilities of travel to assist the revolutionists and do great harm to the Government, it was in the power of the latter, for which it refused to carry troops or munitions of war—to order that if no service could be given it, as the requirements of public safety and order demanded and in accordance with its contract with the company, neither could there be any service for individuals or enemies of public peace.

Reduced to a legal proposition, his position is, that because of the unauthorized refusal of the company to exercise its functions at the demand of the Government the latter could abrogate its contract with the company pro tanto and suspend the exercise of its franchise. In effect this is to claim that the company had put itself in the position in which an alien enemy is regarded in international law, and thereby had lost, at least temporarily, the right of enjoyment of its otherwise lawful privileges.

Whether this position could be successfully maintained if the facts warranted its premises is doubtful, but in the opinion of the umpire the testimony does not make out such a case. There is some evidence tending to show support of the revolutionists by individual employees of the company, but the umpire concurs in the view of the Commissioner for Germany that so far as the company and its principal management were concerned there is not sufficient evidence against them. The testimony shows that in the few cases in which such individual action is shown such individuals were immediately and definitely discharged from the service of the company, or only reemployed when the Government withdrew its objection. He can not, however, assent to the proposition of the Commissioner for Germany that because the Government then was not constitutionally organized, but only provisionally exercising the power into which it had come by force of arms, it did not have in the premises the legal rights of a constitutional government. In the opinion of the umpire, it was a de jure as well as a de facto government. In deciding this claim, therefore, the company must be acquitted from any such charge, and the question of the liability of Venezuela for the damages for the suspension of traffic must be determined without regard to such charge.

The same considerations lead to the conclusion also that the liability of Venezuela for injuries to and seizures of property of the railroad company by revolutionists must be determined in the same way. The claimant charges that the injuries to its property were in consequence of its transportation of troops and munitions of war for the Government. In the opinion of the umpire, however, this claim is not substantiated by the testimony. The mere fact that revolutionists destroyed the railroad at various points connected with active military operations raises no presumption that such injuries were in retaliation of or punishment for the lawful exercise of the company's powers in carrying Government troops and munitions of war. The irresistible presumption is that the revolutionists would destroy the railroad wherever and whenever they thought such destruction would place obstacles in the way of the successful military operations of the Government. The liability of Venezuela, therefore, must depend upon the general principles of international law, as modified by her admission in the protocol of liability for wrongful acts of revolutionists. Under them the umpire is of opinion that the case of the company differs in no respect from that of any private individual in like predicament, and under the former decisions of the umpire Venezuela is liable.

Coming to the consideration of the claim upon its merits, it will be more convenient to take up the items separately and in the order in which they are presented.

Part 1 of item 1 of claim I is for 6,215 bolivars for damages caused by the derailment of the train taken by General Bello from Maracay to Cagua on the night of the 19th of December. It appears from the proofs that the engineer, Sanchez, refused to recognize the authority of General Bello, because the regulations of the company did not authorize an assistant engineer to send out special trains, and because the instructions of the Government limited the authority to ask for special trains to the civil and military chiefs of the districts of La Victoria and Valencia. Further, because the railroad was not equipped for night service and stations are not occupied, and the signal service and track service were entirely suspended during these hours. In addition, the Cagua station on the day in question had notified the Maracay station that the railroad would probably be destroyed by revolutionists. It appears, however, that President Alcántara subsequently approved the request of General Bello, and in such an emergency as this appears to have been it is doubtful if the ordinary regulations of the company applied. The proofs tend to show that the rails and ties were taken up by revolutionists.

In view of all the circumstances, the umpire is of opinion that the claimant is entitled to recover upon the ground that General Bello, having taken control of the train under the circumstances, having knowledge of all the facts above stated as to the condition of the road for night service, and the notice from Maracay of a probable raid on the road, made the trip at his peril, and did not exercise the necessary amount of care that he should. It is true that there is a dispute as to the time of the trip and the rate of speed, but under the circumstances under which the trip was made the speed of the train should not have been greater than would allow the stoppage of the train in the distance which the headlight of the engine would show an obstruction or break in the road.

As the Commissioner for Venezuela makes no objection as to the amount of the item, it is therefore allowed at the amount claimed.

Part 2 of item 1 of claim 1 is for the suspension of all traffic on the railroad from the 23d of December, 1901, to the 8th of January, 1902, inclusive, at 8,000 bolivars per day (136,000 bolivars), and for the suspension of train 6 on January 9 from Los Teques to Caracas, 400 bolivars.

This 8,000 bolivars per day is arrived at by taking the average of the operating expenses of the road per day in the years 1897 to 1901, 4,858 bolivars, less 9 tons of coal per day, at 60 bolivars per ton, 540 bolivars, making 4,318 bolivars. Adding thereto the interest at 3 per cent per annum on the capital of the company (which is 75,000,000 bolivars, less 36,000,000 bolivars of 5 per cent bonds of the Venezuelan loan of 1896 given in exchange for the 7 per cent guaranty of the Government of Venezuela, leaving capital of 39,000,000 bolivars), 3,250 bolivars per day, plus the proportional deduction of value for wear and tear on locomotives and cars, superstructure of the line, viaducts of iron, buildings, shops, water tanks, and other constructions, 1,179 bolivars, aggregating 9,347 bolivars per day.

The claimant submits a statement of traffic receipts for the month of January, 1901, which averages 7,848 bolivars, and takes for a basis of its claim the sum of 8,000 bolivars per day instead of the above sum of 9,347 bolivars per day. It also submits a statement of operating and other expenses from 1897 to 1901, both inclusive, from which the daily operating expenses of the company appear to be 4,858 bolivars. But it does not appear that the claimant gives any credit for these expenses as against its traffic receipts.

It is evident that the basis of computation in the expediente by which the per diem loss of 9,347 bolivars is reached is not sustainable. It is arrived at by taking the total operating expenses of the road, less the consumption of coal, and adding thereto interest at 5 per cent on the amount of capital of the company, less the 36,000,000 bolivars in Venezuelan bonds, and again adding depreciation in value of physical property. For some reason, which is unexplained, while the total receipts of the month of January, 1901, are given, the operating expenses for that month are not given, but the average daily operating expenses for the years 1897 to 1901, inclusive, are given. A representative of the company, at the suggestion of the Commissioner for Germany, appeared before the Commission to explain the expediente. As a result of his examination by the umpire the Commission requested a statement of the operating expenses of January, 1901. This has been furnished and it shows a daily net profit of receipts over operating expenses of 3,463.60 bolivars. But included in the operating expenses is an item for new structures and permanent betterments of the property in the amount of 6,020.55 bolivars. Ordinarily an expenditure of this character is not considered a proper charge to operating expenses. In view, however, of the circumstances in the case, and the belief of the umpire that on account of the unsettled state of the country in January, 1902, the receipts of the road would not have equaled those of the corresponding month of 1901, the umpire accepts the figures submitted by the company as to operating expenses. Upon this basis, the correctness of which can not be questioned, the company's loss during the 17 days' suspension was 58,881.20 bolivars, to which add for the suspension of train 6, on January 9, 1901, 400 bolivars, and we have for part 2 of claim I, 59,281.20 bolivars, upon which interest is to be computed at 3 per cent per annum up to and including December 31, 1903.

Item 2 of claim I is for interest on item 1, calculated at 12 per cent per annum, compounding with half-yearly rests, amounting to 47,635.86 bolivars. The legal rate of interest in Venezuela is 3 per cent per annum. This item is disallowed.

Part a of item 1 of claim II, 10,181.50 bolivars, for damages and injuries owing to transportation of troops and munitions of war, is made up of various items of detention of traffic and injuries to the road, from July 22, 1902, to September 25, 1902, of which the Commissioner for Germany is of opinion that the items specified in his opinion for 8 bolivars, 658.50 bolivars, and 95 bolivars, aggregating 751.50 bolivars, should be disallowed. An additional item on pages 2 and 3 of the statement of claim II, 250 bolivars, is for damages by guerillas, for which the umpire is of opinion the Government of Venezuela is not liable. With these deductions part a amounts to 9,170 bolivars.

Part b of item 1 of claim II, 27,000 bolivars, is for suspension of traffic and damages and injuries to the steam tramway from Guigue and for the steamer on Lake Valencia, in October, 1901, and July, 1902. The proofs establish the facts, and as no objection to the fairness of the amounts charged is made by the Commissioner for Venezuela the item will be allowed at the sum claimed. Item 1 is therefore allowed at 36,170 bolivars, with interest to be computed as above stated.

Item 2 of claim II is for interest on item 1 calculated at 1 per cent per month with a three months' rest, and is disallowed.

The sum of 141,184.15 bolivars, being a portion of part a of item 1 of claim III, is claimed for indemnification for the interruption and enforced suspension of traffic between the 1st of October, 1902, and the 7th of November, 1902.

The Commissioner for Venezuela is of opinion that the entire amount of this claim should be disallowed, as the suspension was a necessary part of the military operations when the army of the revolution occupied the villages of Maracay and Cagua and the forces of the Government with the President in the field were in Victoria engaged in a campaign which ended with the battle fought at Victoria. The suspension of traffic was by order of the President, in command of the armies in the field, and his minister of war.

The following, summarized from the opinion of the Commissioner for Venezuela, is believed to be a correct statement of the situation:

During this period the revolutionists of General Matos occupied, with an army of from 12,000 to 15,000 men, the villages of Maracay, Cagua, etc., and President Castro occupied La Victoria. The plan of the Matos leaders was to move upon La Victoria from Maracay on the west and Cagua on the west and south, and also on the east from the neighborhood of Los Teques. The topography of the country is such, by reason of hills and mountains running from the north and south to the valley of the river Aragua, that the line of least resistance and of most rapid communication would be in that valley. The Great Venezuelan Railroad runs through this valley generally parallel with the river. In the attempted execution of the plan above mentioned the forces of the revolutionists approaching from the east engaged the forces of President Castro at Los Teques, while the forces of the revolutionists approaching from Maracay and Cagua engaged the President's forces in final battle at La Victoria, in which the President was completely successful. The control of operation of the railroad, therefore, would be of the most vital importance to the success of President Castro.

The umpire agrees with the Commissioner for Venezuela that the suspension of traffic over the railroad during the period of these active operations in the field was a military necessity, and that the Government was justified in directing it.

That portion of part a of item 1 of claim III, 28,583.25 bolivars, for damages and injuries to the railroad owing to the transportation of troops and munitions of war and the enforced suspension and interruption of traffic at various dates in the months of September, October, November, and December, 1902, is allowed by the Commissioner for Germany with the exception of 53 bolivars.

No specific objection is made by the Commissioner for Venezuela to any detail of these items, although he claims that Venezuela is not liable and generally that the amounts are greatly exaggerated. In the absence of any proof contradicting that put in on behalf of the claimant and the lack of any showing on the part of Venezuela against these amounts, the umpire is compelled to accept the claimant's proof. For these reasons he concurs in the allowance made by the Commissioner for Germany at the sum of 28,530.25 bolivars.

Part b of item 1 of claim III, 43,432.25 bolivars, is for damages and injuries similar to those in part a, in the months of April, 1900, and April, October, November, and December, 1902, and suspension of traffic of the steam tramway to Guigue and the steamboat on Lake Valencia. The Commissioner for Germany allows this part, except the charge for April, 1900, 7,800 bolivars. In this conclusion the umpire concurs, and part b of item 1 of claim III is allowed at the sum of 35,632.25 bolivars.

Item 2 of claim III for 12,791.88 bolivars, is for interest on item 1 at 12 per cent per annum from the 1st of January, 1903, to the 30th of June, 1903, and is disallowed.

Claim IV, 780,500.53 bolivars, as already stated, has been allowed by the Commissioners at the sum of 575,056 bolivars, in which the umpire concurs, and it will be so awarded.

The entire claim, therefore, is decided as follows:

Item 2 of claim I, item 2 of claim II, and item 2 of claim III, being for interest on items 1 of claims I, II, and III, respectively, are disallowed.

That part of part a, item 1 of claim III, on account of suspension of traffic from October 1 to December 1, 1902, amounting to 141,184.15 bolivars, is also disallowed.

Parts 1 and 2 of item 1 of claim I are allowed in the sum of 65,496.20 bolivars.

Item 1 of claim II is allowed in the sum of 36,170 bolivars.

That portion of part a of item 1 of claim III, on account of injuries to railroad, is allowed at 28,530.25 bolivars.

Part b of item 1 of claim III is allowed at the sum of 35,632.25 bolivars.

Making the aggregate amount of the allowances by the umpire 165,828.70 bolivars, to which is added for interest from June 15 to December 31, 1903, on the last-named sum, 2,694.71 bolivars, aggregating 168,523.41 bolivars. To this must be added the amount of claim IV, allowed by the Commissioners at the sum of 575,056 bolivars, which, however, includes interest to December 31, 1903, making the total allowance on the entire claim, including interest to December 31, 1903, of 743,579.41 bolivars.

ITALIAN-VENEZUELAN MIXED CLAIMS COMMISSION.

PROTOCOL OF FEBRUARY 13, 1903.

Whereas certain differences have arisen between Italy and the United States of Venezuela in connection with the Italian claims against the Venezuelan Government, the undersigned, Mr. Herbert W. Bowen, duly authorized thereto by the Government of Venezuela, and His Excellency Nobile Edmondo Mayor des Planches, Commander of the Orders of S. S. Maurice and Lazarus and the Crown of Italy, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of His Majesty, the King of Italy, to the United States of America, have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I.

The Venezuelan Government declare that they recognize in principle the justice of the claims which have been preferred by His Majesty's Government on behalf of Italian subjects.

ARTICLE II.

The Venezuelan Government agree to pay to the Italian Government, as a satisfaction of the point of honor, the sum of £5,500 (five thousand five hundred pounds sterling), in cash or its equivalent, which sum is to be paid within sixty days.

ARTICLE III.

The Venezuelan Government accept, recognize and will pay the amount of the Italian claims of the first rank derived from the revolutions of 1898-1900, in the sum of 2,810,255 (two million, eight hundred and ten thousand, two hundred and fifty-five) bolivars.

It is expressly agreed that the payment of the whole of the above Italian claims of the first rank will be made without being the same claims or the same sum submitted to the Mixed Commission and without any revision or objection.

ARTICLE IV.

The Italian and Venezuelan Governments agree that all the remaining Italian claims, without exception, other than those dealt with in Article VII hereof, shall, unless otherwise satisfied, be referred to a Mixed Commission, to be constituted as soon as possible in the manner defined in article VI of the Protocol and which shall examine the claims and decide upon the amount to be awarded in satisfaction of each claim.

The Venezuelan Government admit their liability in cases where the claim is for injury to persons and property and for wrongful seizure of the latter, and consequently the questions which the Mixed Commission will have to decide in such cases, will only be:

(a) Whether the injury took place or whether the seizure was wrongful; and,

(b) If so, what amount of compensation is due.

In other cases the claims will be referred to the Mixed Commission without reservation.

ARTICLE V.

The Venezuelan Government being willing to provide a sum sufficient for the payment, within a reasonable time, of the claims specified in articles III and IV and similar claims preferred by other Governments, undertake and obligate themselves to assign to the Italian Government, commencing the first day of March, 1903, for this purpose, and to alienate to no other purpose 30 per cent. of the customs revenues of La Guaira and Puerto Cabello. In the case of failure to carry out this undertaking, and obligation, Belgian officials shall be placed in charge of the customs of the two ports, and shall administer them until the liabilities of the Venezuelan Government in respect of the above mentioned claims, shall have been discharged.

Any question as to the distribution of the customs revenues so to be assigned, and as to the rights of Italy, Great Britain and Germany to a separate settlement of their claims shall be determined in default of arrangement, by the Tribunal at The Hague, to which any other power interested may appeal. Pending the decision of the Hague Tribunal the said 30 per cent of the receipt of the customs of the Ports of La Guaira and Puerto Cabello are to be paid over to the representatives of the Bank of England at Caracas.

ARTICLE VI.

The Mixed Commission shall consist of one Italian member and one Venezuelan member. In each case, where they come to an agreement their decision shall be final. In cases of disagreement, the claims shall be referred to the decision of an umpire nominated by the President of the United States of America.

ARTICLE VII.

The Venezuelan Government further undertake to enter into a fresh arrangement respecting the external debt of Venezuela with a view to the satisfaction of the claims of the bondholders. This arrangement shall include a definition of the sources from which the necessary payments are to be provided.

ARTICLE VIII.

The Treaty of Amity, Commerce and Navigation between Italy and Venezuela of June 19, 1861, is renewed and confirmed. It is however expressly agreed between the two Governments that the interpretation to be given to the articles 4 and 26 is the following:

According to the article 4, Italians in Venezuela and Venezuelans in Italy cannot in any case receive a treatment less favorable than the natives, and according to the article 26, Italians in Venezuela and Venezuelans in Italy are entitled to receive, in every matter and especially in the matter of claims, the treatment of the most favored Nation, as it is established in the same article 26.

If there is doubt or conflict between the two articles, the article 26 will be followed.

It is further specially agreed that the above treaty shall never be invoked in any case against the provisions of the present Protocol.

ARTICLE IX.

At once upon the signing of this Protocol, arrangements shall be made by His Majesty's Government, in concert with the Governments of Germany and Great Britain to raise the blockade of the Venezuelan ports.

His Majesty's Government will be prepared to restore the vessels of the Venezuelan Navy which may have been seized and further to release any other vessel captured under the Venezuelan flag during the blockade.

The Government of Venezuela hereby obligate themselves and guarantee that the Italian Government shall be wholly exempted and relieved of any reclamations or claims of any kind which may be made by citizens or corporations of any other Nation, for detention or seizure or destruction of any vessel or of goods on board of them, which may have been or which may be detained, seized or destroyed, by reason of the blockade instituted and carried on by the three Allied Powers against the Republic of Venezuela.

ARTICLE X.

The Treaty of Amity, Commerce and Navigation of June 19th, 1861, having been renewed and confirmed in accordance with the terms of article VIII of this Protocol His Majesty's Government declare that they will be happy to reestablish regular diplomatic relations with the Government of Venezuela.

HERBERT W. BOWEN.

Bowen as Plenipotentiary of the Government of Venezuela, and the Royal Italian Ambassador Nobile Edmondo Mayor des Planches as representative of the Royal Italian Government, in order to carry out the provisions contained in articles IV, V and others of the Venezuelan-Italian Protocol of February 13th 1903, have signed the following agreement with reference to the Mixed Commission which shall have to decide upon the Italian claims against the Government of Venezuela:

ARTICLE I.

The members of the Mixed Commission who are to be appointed by the Government of Venezuela and by the Royal Italian Government shall meet at Caracas on the first of June, 1903.

The umpire who is to be nominated by the President of the United States of America shall join the Commission as soon as possible.

The umpire is to be consulted in the proceedings and decisions whenever the Venezuelan and the Italian Commissioners fail to agree, or otherwise deem it appropriate to consult him.

Whenever the umpire will be present at the meeting he shall preside.

If after the convening of the Commission the umpire or either of the commissioners should be unable to fulfill his duties, his successor shall be appointed forthwith in the same manner as his predecessor.

The Venezuelan and the Italian Commissioners may each appoint, if necessary, a secretary versed in the Spanish and in the Italian languages to assist them in the transaction of the business of the Commission.

ARTICLE II.

Before assuming the functions of their office the umpire and both the commissioners shall make solemn oath or declaration carefully to examine and impartially to decide according to the principles of justice and the provisions of the Protocol of the 13th of February, 1903, and of the present agreement, all claims submitted to them; the oath or declaration so made shall be embodied in the record of their proceedings.

The decisions of the Commission shall be based upon absolute equity, without regard to objections of a technical nature or of the provisions of local legislation. They shall be given in writing both in Spanish and Italian. The awards shall be made payable in English gold or in silver at the current rate of exchange of the day at Caracas.

ARTICLE III.

The claims shall be presented to the commissioners by the Royal Italian Legation at Caracas before the first day of July, 1903. A reasonable extension of this term may eventually be granted by the commissioners. The commissioners shall be bound to decide upon every claim within six months from the day of its presentation, and in case of the disagreement of the Venezuelan and of the Italian Commissioners, the umpire shall give his decision within six months after having been called upon.

The commissioners shall be bound before reaching a decision, to receive and carefully examine all evidence presented to them by the Government of Venezuela and the Royal Italian Legation at Caracas, as well as oral or written arguments submitted by the agent of the Government or of the Legation.

The secretaries mentioned in Article I Section 4 of this agreement shall keep an accurate record of the proceedings of the Commission: the Protocols have to be drawn up in duplicate copies which have to be signed by the secretaries and the members of the Commission that have taken part in the proceedings. After the work of the Commission will have come to an end, a certified copy of each of these Protocols is to be handed over to the Government of Venezuela and to the Royal Italian Legation.

ARTICLE IV.

Except as herein stipulated, all questions of procedure shall be left to the determination of the commissioners, and, in case of their disagreement, the umpire shall decide them; in particular, they shall be authorized to receive the declaration of the claimants or their respective agents, and to collect the necessary evidence.

ARTICLE V.

The umpire shall be entitled to a reasonable remuneration for his services and expenses, which is to be paid in equal moieties by the Government of Venezuela and by the Royal Italian Government, as well as any other expenses of the said Commission.

The remunerations to be granted to the two other members of the commission and to the secretaries are to be paid by the Government by whom they have been appointed. In the same way each Government will have to pay any other expenses which it may incur.

OPINIONS ON QUESTIONS OF PROCEDURE.*TIME FOR SUBMITTING CLAIMS.

Extension of time for submitting claims should only be granted upon cause shown. Such cause being shown an extension is granted under conditions to November 1, claims to be notified to the Commission by August 9.

RALSTON, Umpire:

I have carefully considered the application, under date of June 8, made by the royal Italian legation at Caracas for a reasonable delay, for the purpose of transmitting claims of Italian subjects as well as of obtaining proofs in connection therewith, such delay being requested under the protocol of May 7, by virtue of which, together with that of February 13, 1903, this tribunal is in existence, and the application in question being referred to me as umpire because of a difference of opinion arising between the Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela.

The language of the protocol is that—

The claims shall be presented to the Commissioners by the royal Italian legation at Caracas before the 1st day of July, 1903. A reasonable extension of the term may eventually be granted by the Commissioners.

According to my interpretation of the words "may eventually" the Commission is not obliged as a matter of course to grant the delay, but it should only be allowed upon a reasonable cause shown. I feel myself sustained in this opinion by the definition of the word "eventual" given in Webster's Dictionary, which is, "in an eventual manner; final; ultimate." The word "eventually" is also defined as "coming or happening as a consequence; final; ultimate; (law) dependent on events; contingent."

The reasonable cause justifying extension is stated by the royal Italian legation at Caracas to exist in the difficulty, which has continued up to the present time (though now with diminishing force), of reaching certain portions of the Republic by mail or otherwise, and further, in the fact that owing to recent disturbances many Italian merchants have gone to distant regions to avoid danger, and apparently as a consequence it has been impossible for them to yet present their claims, and will be impracticable to present them by July 1. That the application is reasonable and justifies some delay is evidenced by the fact that the Commissioner for Venezuela offers no objection to an extension of thirty-two days, and this premise being granted, it remains for me to consider what, under all the circumstances, would be a proper period.

From such information as I have been able to gather, a letter from Caracas to the most distant point in Venezuela reached at all by the post-office authorities may be sent in twenty days, and even as to such a place as Ciudad Bolívar, now in possession of the revolutionists, my information is, that by transshipment at Trinidad a letter will reach its destination in about a week.

I further consider it is to be remembered, in reaching a conclusion, that the first protocol looking to the formation of a mixed commission was signed February 13, and that the knowledge of it was sought to be disseminated by the Italian legation as thoroughly as possible some time in the month of April.

It has, therefore, seemed to me that an extension of forty days from July 1 (sufficient to enable a letter from Caracas to reach the most distant part of Venezuela and a reply to be obtained), would, in addition to the period of four and one-half months now elapsing, from February 13 to July 1, meet all reasonable requirements.

Furthermore, however, the Commission might properly take into consideration at a later period any claim the existence of which should be made known to the Commission at any time before the termination of the additional time now proposed.

In view of the foregoing, the following order may be entered upon the minutes:

Ordered, That the period for the presentation of claims before the Italian and Venezuelan Commission be extended to and including August 9, 1903: Provided, however, That the royal Italian legation shall be at liberty after that date, and before November 1, 1903, to present any claim, official knowledge of the existence of which shall be brought to the Commission on or before August 9, but with relation to which, for lack of data, the royal Italian legation shall not then have been able to submit a formal claim: And provided further, That for cause shown, on or before said date, this order may be enlarged as of this day.

TIME EXTENDED FOR SUBMITTING CLAIMS.

Further allowing an extension of time for submitting certain claims to November 1, 1903.

RALSTON, Umpire:

The royal Italian legation has duly submitted an application for an enlargement of the time for presenting certain claims in accordance with the reservation contained in the order of the umpire of June 18, 1903, and in support shows that thirty claims are expected to arrive from Ciudad Bolívar, but that the names of the possible claimants have not yet come to hand; and further, that although registered letters have been sent to some 37 places named, neither the original letters nor the signed receipts have been returned, indicating want of proper postal communication.

The umpire believes that liberality should be shown in the application of the clause of the protocol referring to extensions, to the end that this Commission may fulfill as far as possible the object of its formation by determining all Italian claims. At the same time he recognizes that the labors of the Commission must be brought to a speedy finality.

He will therefore sign an order enlarging as of the date of June 18 the order then made, so that the 30 claims to be submitted from Ciudad Bolívar and any from the 37 places named may be entirely presented for action by November 1.

On behalf of the Venezuelan Government the umpire is asked to interpret the order of June 18, so that all claims, the names of whose owners are at this time to be submitted to the Commission, may at once be fully presented.

The umpire recognizes the difficulty of the situation in this respect, owing to the large number of papers recently received by the royal Italian legation, and at this time prefers accepting the assurance of the legation that all claims will be presented as rapidly as the papers can possibly be arranged. He does, however, in the enlarged order, change the former one by specifically requiring all claims to be presented formally and fully, with all supporting evidence, by November 1, his personal desire, however, being that they should be completely filed by October 1.

The royal Italian legation submits the question whether the claims not presented within the period limited shall on this account be excluded from future indemnity. So far as this Commission is concerned the answer must be that they will be excluded. It would be beyond the jurisdiction of this Commission or its umpire to make any more comprehensive ruling as to effect of the protocol upon claims not presented to it.

In view of the foregoing, the following order may be entered upon the minutes:

Ordered: That the order of June 18, 1903, relating to the presentation of claims be enlarged as of that date so as to read as follows:

Ordered, That the period for the presentation of claims before the Italian and Venezuelan Commission be extended to and including August 10, 1903: Provided, however, That the royal Italian legation shall be at liberty after that date and before November 1, 1903, to present formally and fully, with all supporting evidence, any claim official knowledge of the existence of which shall be brought to the Commission on or before August 10, but with relation to which, for lack of data, the royal Italian legation shall not then have been able to submit a formal claim, but with further leave to said legation to bring to the official knowledge of the Commission the names of 30 claimants at Ciudad Bolívar and whatever claimants may exist at Altigracia (de Orituco), Nutrias, Tovar (2), Betijoque, Sebruco, S. Diego, Caripe, Amparo (2), Mitón, Yaritagua, Mendoza, S. Simón, Monte Carmela, Libertad, S. José (de Sucre), Upata, Soledad, Escuque, Turmero, Rubio, Quibor, Río Caribe, Caicara, Socorro, Carajal, Jalón, Aragua (2), Paraguaipoa, Cocorote, Guasipati, Cumarebo, and Tacarigua, San Fernando de Apure, Guama, Sta. Ipire, Colonia Bolívar, and Palmira, on or before September 21, presenting their claims formally and fully, with all supporting evidence, before November 1, 1903.

RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE AND CLAIMS.

(By the Umpire:)

Additional evidence in support of reclamations may be received after the time for filing claims has expired.

Where within the time limited for the filing of claims nothing more has been presented than a statement (unsupported by proof) that a claim exists, no evidence in substantiation is thereafter receivable.

A "claim" must at least be sufficient to inform the respondent of the right claimed or the wrong inflicted.

AGNOLI, Commissioner (claim referred to umpire):

Regarding the question of admitting claims, lacking documents, to-day presented to the Commission by the royal Italian legation, the Italian Commissioner remarks as follows:

It would seem that there can be no doubt except as regards claims not accompanied by a statement of damages, because claims having only said statement have been admitted and even favorably considered in other commissions. A simple written or even verbal demand may have sufficient evidence of veracity to enable the Commission, which is a tribunal of absolute equity, to take it into consideration and pass upon it. In any case the declarations of a claimant constitute a proof which should be studied and weighed by the Commission. Such declaration may even assume the character of an absolute proof, if supported by the sworn statement of the claimant. In practice this principle has been admitted by this Commission in two instances of claims received. The Commission would judge, therefore, said claims when both Commissioners within the limits of the protocol of May 7, 1903, find it proper to pronounce thereon.

It can not be admitted in justice and equity that the Venezuelan Commissioner should have six months from the date of presentation of claims to adduce counterproofs without the legation having an equal right in favor of the claimants.

There now remain only the Ciudad Bolívar and a few other claims in which the legation has not so far been able to produce the formal demand of the claimants nor state precisely the sum claimed. Regarding the demand of the claimant, that seems to be adequately substituted by that of the legation or consular agent who legally represents the claimants. As to the statement of the sum claimed, this does not seem essential, inasmuch as the Commission has the right to determine the amount of the award on a simple statement of the facts in the case, showing that the claimant has actually suffered damages or violence, even though no definite sum be claimed.

The Commission has considered a number of claims in which, perhaps from a sense of delicacy in regard to injury to the person, or illegal incarceration, claimants abstained from fixing their own indemnity, leaving the same to be determined by the Commission.

These reasons would appear sufficient to cause the admission of the claims this day presented to the Commission by the royal legation, whatever be the condition of their documentation.

But other motions, based on special circumstances, support this view.

The legation, giving undoubted proof of respect for and confidence in the integrity of local tribunals, had advised all claimants to rely upon them for the compilation of the necessary evidence. The consequence of this has been that while in other commissions many claims were received based on proof prepared in the respective consulates, this Commission has not done so. Recourse to the consulates would have facilitated in all respects, but principally in the economy of fees, and hastened the presentation of claims; whereas local tribunals, lately closed for considerable periods or but recently reestablished in others, as in the case of Ciudad Bolívar, where the revolution lasted longer than elsewhere and operated with extreme slowness, have been the cause of delays and postponements which it would hardly be fair to saddle on the claimants.

The legation has, besides, proofs of frequent nontransmission or missending of both mail and telegraphic communications, all of which not chargeable to and by no fault of claimants would have the effect of prejudicing their interests in the exercise of their legitimate rights should the Commission rigidly and with severity interpret the clauses of the protocol and precedent decisions of the umpire in this regard.

It is proper to note that if the claims presented October 31 are not admitted, giving sufficient time for the presentation of necessary proof, the legation would be compelled to withdraw them, thus leaving open many questions which it is the common wish and interest to have settled and which the Commission, according to its high mandate of peace and justice, is morally bound to solve, leaving, as far as possible, only unencumbered ground behind it.

Now, as regards more especially the proofs and counter proofs, the reciprocal faculties of the Commissioners (of which, however, the legation and the Italian Commissioner intend to make only the most moderate use as regards the time limit) are determined by Article III of the protocol and can not well be the object of any restrictions or decisions whatsoever, as the honorable umpire is pleased to note in his elaborate decision of June 18 last.

No opinion by the Venezuelan Commissioner.

RALSTON, Umpire:

Upon disagreement between the honorable Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela, two questions are presented to the umpire, which may be summarized as follows:

1. May additional evidence be received on behalf of Italian claimants in cases where formal claims have been filed?

2. May evidence be received in cases where nothing more has been filed than a statement that a certain person, located at a given place (as Ciudad Bolívar), has a claim, but has been delayed in the presentation of his proof because of inadequate mail facilities or judicial delay in taking proof?

The provisions in the protocol of May 7, 1903, bearing upon the matter read as follows:

ARTICLE III. The claims shall be presented to the Commissioners by the royal Italian legation at Caracas before the first day of July, 1903. A reasonable extension of the term may eventually be granted by the Commission. The commissioners shall be bound to decide upon every claim within six months from the day of its presentation, and, in case of disagreement of the Italian and Venezuelan Commissioners, the umpire shall give his decision within six months after having been called upon.

The commissioners shall be bound, before reaching a decision, to receive and carefully examine all evidence presented to them by the royal Italian legation at Caracas and the Government of Venezuela, as well as oral or written arguments submitted by the agent of the legation or of the Government.

The umpire has already passed two orders touching the general subject: The first of June 18, extending the time for the presentation of claims to and including August 9, but permitting the royal Italian legation, after that date and before November 1, to present any claim official knowledge of the existence of which should be brought to the Commission on or before August 9, but with relation to which, for lack of data, the legation had not then been able to submit a formal claim, and further permitting an enlargement for cause shown, as of date of June 18.

Cause being shown on August 10, the umpire enlarged the time within which knowledge of the existence of claimants located in certain places could be brought to the Commission to September 21, the claims to be presented "formally and fully" before November 1, such extension again applying only after September 21 to such of the cases indicated as for lack of data the legation should not have been able to submit a "formal claim."

With regard to the first proposition submitted, the umpire is, on full consideration, disposed to believe that additional evidence may be received by the Commissioners, if not by the umpire, at any time before the final decision. The power so to do is found in the paragraph of Article III, prescribing that—the commissioners shall be bound before reaching a decision to receive and carefully examine all evidence presented to them by the royal Italian legation at Caracas and the Government of Venezuela, etc.

No restriction as to time of presentation of evidence (save that necessarily involved in the limitation of time for the consideration of claims by the Commission) is contained in the protocol, and the umpire does not feel that he can now make any, or can so construe his prior orders as to create such limitation. The first question will therefore be answered in the affirmative.

The second question is somewhat different. The protocol limits the time for the presentation of claims, with power in the Commission to extend the period. Within the time named by the orders of extension the legation, as above stated, has presented what is termed a "promemoria," but which in the cases under consideration contains a sublutely no information relative to the claim save the name of the claimant and his locality. The fundamental question is whether this constitutes the presentation of a claim, for if it does, then, as above indicated, statements and supporting evidence may yet be received.

Webster's Dictionary defines "claim" as follows:

Claim: 1. A demand of a right or supposed right; a calling for something due or supposed to be due; an assertion of a right or fact.

2. A right to claim or demand something; a title to any debt, privilege, or other thing in possession of another; also a title to anything which another should give or concede to or confer on the claimant. "A bar to all claims upon land." Hallam.

3. The thing claimed or demanded; that (as land) to which anyone intends to establish a right; as a settler's claim, a miner's claim.

It appears to the umpire that the "pro-memorias" referred to contain none of the elements of a claim within the natural application of the definition. They are not the demand of a right or supposed right, for they do not inform us of the amount or nature of the right claimed or the wrong inflicted. They assert nothing save that the legation is informed that a certain man claims something unknown against Venezuela; in other words, that he is a claimant. Before Venezuela can be expected to answer to a claim or demand she must be informed of its nature. This information is not furnished.

But it is said that there is sufficient basis to permit the furnishing of the information at a later time. Let us see. If this position be correct, carrying it to its ultimate, the lacking data may be furnished six months off, on the last day left for the consideration of claims, and Venezuela left without opportunity for defense. It is not for a moment to be supposed that such a course would be pursued; but an interpretation which would permit it must be erroneous.

To now admit that the "pro-memorias" in question are sufficient would be to nullify the effect of the orders of June 18 and August 10, above referred to. The "pro-memorias," when analyzed, simply contain the name and address of the claimants, with an excuse for the lack of other data. By the orders referred to this information (at least as to the important thing—the name) was to have been furnished on or before August 9 and September 21, respectively. When lack of data existed by those dates for the presentation of a "formal claim," such claim could be presented before November 1. But names and places were known before the dates mentioned and were then given, but no "formal claim" was presented for "lack of data." To say to-day that these words practically mean nothing, and that what are truly to be called claims may be presented within the next six months, would expand the time for the presentation of claims far beyond the clear intent of the orders given, and infinitely beyond the practice of other commissions working under similar protocols.

The umpire gives full attention to the suggestion that the present Commission should grant all possible opportunity to claimants to present themselves, to the end that all grievances may be adjusted. He himself has been so far influenced by this feeling that he has heretofore, in fixing November 1 as the final date, given the numerous Italian claimants one month more time than that enjoyed by claimants of other nationalities. But all things must come to an end, and if claimants in Ciudad Bolívar, for instance, having enjoyed one hundred days since the taking of that city by Government troops, have failed to furnish the royal Italian legation with more than their names when, even if it were not possible to supply all needed evidence, they could easily have given it the data required by the orders heretofore referred to, their loss must now be attributed solely to their own remissness. The umpire can not accept either irregularity of mails or vacation of tribunals as a justification for such neglect on the part of individuals. Meanwhile all power he possesses, either directly or by indirection, to extend the time for the presentation of claims has been exhausted.

The second question must therefore be answered in the negative.

BURELLI CASE.

(By the Umpire:)

Claim not having been presented within the time limited by orders of the umpire, and this delay having been occasioned by default of telegraphic officials of respondent Government, claim must be dismissed, but without prejudice to diplomatic action or judicial remedies.

AGNOLI, Commissioner (claim referred to umpire):

The royal Italian legation on December 23 last has presented to the Mixed Commission the unannounced claim of Giuseppe Antonio Burelli, residing at La Puerta, District of Valera, whereby, because of requisitions of merchandise and other supplies, an indemnity of 15,500 bolivars is demanded.

The writer, because of the reasons which he has the honor to mention in the course of this statement, was of opinion that the claim ought to be examined, but the honorable Venezuelan Commissioner at the session of the Commission on the 9th of the present month, declared that he could not accept it, because it was presented too late. In consequence of this difference of opinion the decision of the honorable umpire is asked.

From the documents contained in the record of the claim it is shown:

1. That Giuseppe Antonio Burelli, on August 3 last, caused to be delivered to the Venezuelan telegraphic agent of Escuque a telegram addressed to the royal Italian legation at Caracas, which ought to have received it at the latest on the following day, on account of which he would have announced the existence of his claim, the proofs of which were at that time being made before the competent judicial authority.

2. That said telegram did not reach the royal legation, through no fault of the claimant, either on August 4 or afterwards, wherefore the existence of the claim could not be announced to the Commission prior to the 9th of said month, the final date fixed for that purpose by the award of the honorable umpire of June 18.

3. That the complete documents supporting the claim for indemnity reached the royal legation on the 20th of October last past; that is to say, in due time, according to the above-mentioned award of the honorable umpire, for their transmission to the arbitral tribunal, to which in fact they were not presented prior to the 1st of November, because the announcement of the existence of the claim being wanting at the proper time the presentation of the documents in relation thereto for that reason alone was delayed.

The mere statement of these circumstances is sufficient, in the opinion of the Italian Commissioner, to justify the request of the royal legation that the Burelli claim be admitted.

There has been no negligence whatever on the part of the claimant, and it would be entirely contrary to equity that he should suffer the consequences of the irregularity of the telegraphic agent of Escuque; that is to say, of a governmental act of Venezuela, which is solely responsible for the nonarrival of the announcement and of the delayed presentation of the claim. It is true that this does not operate in every way as a bar, but the delay in its liquidation would prejudice the claimant; and our duty is to do him prompt justice, protecting him against the injurious consequences of the fault of another.

For these reasons, the writer asks the honorable umpire to decide that the claim for indemnity in question should be submitted to the examination and to the judgment of the Italian-Venezuelan Arbitral Commission now sitting at Caracas.

ZULOAGA, Commissioner:

The Venezuelan Commissioner refuses to admit to the examination of this Commission the claim of G. Antonio Burelli, and he takes this position for the following reasons:

1. The term, until the 9th of August, fixed for the legation to present its notice of these claims was a term which could not be extended, and in order to fix it all the possible eventualities were taken into account, such as the failure of the mail, of the telegraph, distance, etc.

2. The irregularities of the telegraph services ought to have been especially foreseen, since when the date was fixed there was not even a telegraph to distant places, such as Valera and Escuque, because the lines had been destroyed by the revolution.

3. Foreseeing all these irregularities, the claimant ought not to have allowed his notice to go until the last minute.

4. If the Commission should admit this claim of Burelli it would open anew the term for the presentation of claims of all of those who might allege motives more or less justified for not having presented them in time.

5. The Commission has no right to admit claims.

RALSTON, Umpire:

The above-entitled case comes before the umpire upon difference of opinion between the honorable Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela.

It appears that the claimant, who lives at Valera, sent to the telegraphic office at Escuque on August 3, 1903, a telegram signed by him, directed to his excellency, the Italian chargé d'affaires in Caracas, notifying him of the existence of a reclamation which he expected to prove before the tribunals of the State of Trujillo, the purpose evidently being to have his name certified by the royal Italian legation to the Commission on or before August 9, 1903.

The reception of this telegram is admitted by the chief of the telegraph office at Escuque.

It so happened that the telegram was not sent, or at least never reached the legation, whose first knowledge of the existence of the claim appears to have been gained October 20, 1903, by the reception of an expediente designed to sustain it.

This expediente was not presented before the Commission prior to November 1, 1903, the legation apparently not knowing the facts with relation to the attempted telegraphing on the part of the claimant, and considering that as the claim had not been called to the attention of the Commission within the time originally specified it was too late to present the claim.

By the order of the umpire, made June 18, 1903, official knowledge of the existence of the claim should have been brought to the Commission on or before August 9 and the claim itself presented before November 1. In this case neither step was taken, through no fault, however, either of the legation or of the claimant, who did all that it was incumbent upon him to do, and if his claim is not now regularly before the Commission it is because of the failure of the officials of the Venezuelan Government to fully perform their duty.

The suggestion is made that the umpire, in the extension given for the presentation of claims, took into account the condition of the country and the necessary delays in transmission of letters and telegrams, and that he should not now be asked to virtually reopen the time limit already set.

To the umpire this argument seems in part correct and in part erroneous. He feels that the time having absolutely passed within which claims should have been presented he has no power of setting aside this limitation. On the other hand he would regard it as highly inequitable if the claimant were to absolutely lose his rights because of the failure of Venezuelan officials to perform their official duty, and in this connection he may remark that when the chief of the telegraphic station at Escuque accepted the dispatch tendered him he impliedly promised that it should be forwarded with all due promptness, and, accepting such dispatch without reservation, Venezuela (his principal) is not at liberty thereafter to say that communication was broken or the wires down, as is suggested by the honorable Commissioner for Venezuela may have been the case. Had the station agent informed the claimant promptly on August 3 that it was impossible to transmit the telegram the claimant could readily have procured transmission by other means of the desired knowledge within the time fixed by the order of the umpire.

In view of the foregoing considerations it seems to the umpire that, pending the objection raised by the honorable Commissioner for Venezuela, he can not consider the claim. Nevertheless, any order of dismissal which he might feel obliged to sign should leave the case open for such other remedies, either diplomatic or judicial, as the claimant may select. In other words, finding himself unable to grant the relief asked by the claimant in this Commission, while the jurisdictional question is raised by the honorable Commissioner for Venezuela, he is unwilling that the claimant should lose his rights because of clear negligence of other Venezuelan officials.

There are other views of the case which might be discussed, but as their consideration would bring us to substantially the same conclusions their development is omitted.

OPINIONS OF A GENERAL NATURE.

CERVETTI CASE.

(By the Umpire:)

Interest on claims can only be allowed from date of presentation to the Government or to the Commission in the absence of direct contractual relations with the Government.

Unless otherwise agreed by contract, interest will be allowed at 3 per cent per annum from such presentation to December 31, 1903.<sup>a</sup>

Under the protocols no interest can be allowed on awards.

AGNOLI, Commissioner (claim referred to umpire):

The above-mentioned claim having been submitted to the umpire in consequence of a divergence of views and appraisement between the Commissioners in regard to the proofs of the acts which gave rise to the claim proper and the amount of the damages as well as to the question of the interest which may be awarded the claimant, the undersigned reserves the right to indicate the amount to be paid in principal to Cervetti as an equitable compensation for actual damage done him, after the demonstration of the proof by the interrogatories deemed opportune on this occasion put to the claimant by the Commission.

Regarding the question of interest the undersigned contends:

1. That the adjudication of interest is in conformity with justice and equity, and impliedly comprised in the protocol.

2. That the interest in the case should run from the day on which Cervetti suffered damages to the day on which his case will be settled by the Commission, without in any wise forfeiting the interest which may eventually be conceded to claimants of any nationality, either by decision of the Mixed Commissions or by the grant of the Venezuelan Government, from the day of its award by arbitration to the day of payment.

3. That the rate of interest shall be at 5 per cent per annum.

Regarding the first point, it is held that the indemnity would not be complete and therefore not in accord with the requirements of strict equity, which alone should guide the decisions of the Commission, if interest were not allowed, excepting in cases of indirect damages and personal injuries.

The refunding to a merchant after a long time of the price only of the goods taken from him or the reimbursement to him of forced loans, also after a long time, does not constitute an equitable or integral compensation. Like the tool in the hands of the workman, merchandise and money in the hands of the merchant constitute capital in a productive form, and may perhaps be his only resource, his only means of earning his livelihood.

The merchant must have paid interest to the hands furnishing the goods, and he from whom money has been forcibly taken or he to whom money has not been paid when due must have been compelled to procure capital on credit, and in either case the injured party must have been compelled to submit to the payment of interest, which, according to the local commercial conditions, must have exceeded 5 per cent.

What motive is there for denying in principle compensation for precise and certain damages? It is indisputable that the measure of redress should be fixed in a spirit of moderation.

In any event the protocols signed at Washington in no wise exclude the adjudication of interest, but rather determine that indemnity shall be accorded on the basis of absolute equity, and leave to the commissions a full and absolute liberty to deliberate on the sum to be by them accorded as an indemnity in each case.

The fact that the adjudication of interest must aggravate the financial situation of Venezuela is worthy to be taken into consideration, and it is with this in view that the undersigned has fixed the rate at 5 per cent, which, given the usages of the country, is very light indeed. It is further worthy of note that interest has been accorded in the majority of cases by arbiters and arbitral commissions, above all, in cases where decisions have been given in claims of long standing and those in which the payment could not be immediately made.

It should be sufficient to cite the very recent precedent of the "Commissions des Indemnités" in China. Various members of the diplomatic corps accredited to Peking, among which was the plenipotentiary of the United States, appointed to adopt rules for the government of claims in trust for their colleagues, established the principle adopted by all the interested powers, that the injured parties would be given interest at 5 per cent in civil and 7 per cent in commercial matters.<sup>a</sup>

The President of the Swiss Republic, sitting as arbiter in the large claim of Fabiani against the Venezuelan Government, awarded 5 per cent. (Moore, p. 4915.)

The United States asked and obtained from Mexico (Com., 1838-1841, Moore, History and Digest, etc., p. 1254) interest at the rate of 5 per cent and from Peru at 6 per cent. (Moore, p. 1629.)

Interest at 5 and 6 per cent were likewise conceded by the Spanish Spoliation Commission and in the Panama riot and others. (Moore, p. 1004, 1381.)

The equity of the principle which the undersigned desires to see adopted seems from the foregoing precedents to be sufficiently established, though admitting that in some cases the request for interest had not been advanced at the time when the agreement as to the government of claims had not been formulated, or for other reasons.

The mere fact that the royal Italian legation in presenting claims did not request interest does not imply a renunciation of them. The legation believed it its duty to limit itself to the presentation of claims, leaving to the Commission the full liberty of deciding as to the amount and as to the form of the compensation.

If its silence in this regard is to be interpreted as a renunciation of interest, the legation will demand interest on all claims to be hereafter presented, as well as on those now in the hands of the Commission.

Even the silence of a claimant in this respect can not be considered as a renunciation, which latter should be explicitly stated, as otherwise it would be strongly contrary to the principles of equity and justice that interest should be accorded to a claimant asking it, while refusing it to another claimant who, through neglect or ignorance of the law, had failed to apply for it.

The question should be decided, after due examination, according to general and uniform criteria, as well in the case of Cervetti as in all the others.

If the silence of claimants with regard to interest is to be taken as a renunciation, similarly should it be considered a renunciation of indemnity when, by reason of illiteracy, or because not deemed by them necessary, a formal claim for indemnity does not accompany the testimony of witnesses as to the loss of receipts attesting forced loans or similar documents.

The Commission would most certainly depart from the principles of justice and equity, which should alone inspire it, if it were to reject all claims so presented, and the same principles and the same rules apply with equal force to the question of interest.

Regarding the second point, by the same reasons of equity, interest should run from the date on which the damage occurred to the date of the decision of the Commission or of the umpire, excepting the reserve in regard to the interest from the date of future decisions referred to above. This is the rule adopted recently in China by the "Commission des Indemnités."

The date of the presentation of the claim to the Venezuelan Government or to the Commission does not appear to the undersigned worthy of consideration, and not only because the forwarding of said claims to the legation was much delayed by the interruption in or temporary suspension of mail facilities of the Republic, but also because the legation did not deem it wise to call attention to these claims in times of political and financial crises, knowing well that there could not result practical utility or immediate solution.

It is known that for the claims of the period 1898-1900, none had as yet been obtained from the Venezuelan Government at the beginning of the current year and previous to the action of the allied powers.

What would it have profited the claimants and the legation to have hastened the presentation of the claims? It belongs to the Commission to provide therefor, and if the assembling of this latter could not be effected before the 1st of June, 1903, this fact should not influence the selection of a date from which interest should run in favor of the claimants.

This is not a case in which to invoke the rules governing ordinary courts and permanent tribunals, whose decisions, more or less solicited, depend solely on the diligence of the interested parties. We are in a question of claims and not in a jurisdiction absolutely exceptional, in which not only we may but we should depart from the usual forms of procedure.

Regarding the third point, assuming that local law may not according to the terms of the protocol of May 7 in all that concerns the settlement of Italian claims, it is clear that the Commission in order to determine the rate of interest to be awarded to Cervetti and other Italian claimants must base itself on equity and on precedents in similar cases, as well as on the usage of the country and of local commerce.

Though the Civil Code of Venezuela fixes the legal rate of interest at 3 per cent, it is notorious that is not the usual rate throughout the Republic. Instead, the conventional rate is 12 per cent, and the same is true of the rate of interest on deferred payment in commercial affairs, and in this regard it is noteworthy that the Government exacts 12 per cent from importers that are backward in the payment of import duties.

The new law of the banks of Venezuela provides that on the falling due of hypothecated credits the banks may in case of delay exact 12 per cent per annum. According to articles 5 and 27 of the above-mentioned law, 7 per cent per annum is lawfully borne by hypothecated credits and 9 per cent for credits on 'change and mutuals.

The same local Government pays, as I am informed, to the Bank of Venezuela, as per contract, 9 per cent on its operations in current accounts.

The legal rate in Italy is 5 per cent in civil matters and 6 per cent in commercial affairs.

It has been seen above how in cases of arbitration interest has run from 5 per cent to 7 per cent per annum.

In asking, therefore, that in the case of Cervetti and the other claimants interest be fixed at 5 per cent, the Italian Commissioner does not doubt having adopted an equitable and moderate average and one fairly convenient to the Venezuelan Government.

ZULOAGA, Commissioner:

Respecting the principle, I have admitted that it appears proven that a damage caused by Venezuelan forces exists, but I do not find elements of conviction by which it may be estimated, the proof submitted being altogether deficient. The case has been submitted to the umpire, who is to render his decision freely thereon, based on proofs and such other evidence as he may deem proper to obtain and consider.

Respecting the second point raised by the Italian Commissioner, whether or not interest shall be allowed Cervetti, it is my opinion that interest should not be allowed, either for the past or for the future. Respecting the latter, it would appear that the Commissioner for Italy and myself are in accord that none should be granted, though it seems that he wishes to make certain reservations as to the decisions, in case, as he says, the nations interested should desire to fix the rate of interest.

This reservation is foreign to our attributes as judges and to the faculties invested in us by the treaties in virtue of which we were appointed. Judges decide, grant, or adjudicate that which they believe to be just, but they have not the power to make bargains.

Article V of the protocol of February 13, 1903, determines the manner in which Venezuela is to make the payment of claims within a reasonable time, and, as Italy accepted this mode of payment, Venezuela is within her rights, since payment is to be made to the Italian Government within the delay and in the manner agreed upon without concerning herself as to whether any particular claim is to be paid immediately or not.

It is to be observed that many delicate and laborious negotiations were had before the establishment of the 30 per cent agreed upon, in which, without doubt, the economic and political conditions of Venezuela were duly considered and appreciated by the powers agreeing upon a fixed mode of payment.

In regard to the payment of interest for time past, I am also of the opinion that it should not be granted. These claims, as appears in the case of Cervetti, do not come to the notice of the Government before the moment in which they are presented to the Commission, and now is the time to fix the amount of the damages. It does not, therefore, appear just or equitable that interest should be awarded on amounts which Venezuela did not in reality know she owed.

Many nations, among them Italy and Venezuela, have decreed that legal interest (in Venezuela, 3 per cent) does not accrue on debts for liquidated sums without a request on the debtor for same. This request is necessary, and is based on equity, as without it the debtor can not be supposed to know that interest is demanded. When it is a question of unliquidated sums it is impossible to establish the fact that interest has accrued, since the amount actually owed was not known.

This case of Cervetti appears singularly appropriate for the bringing out of this class of argumentation—for the development of its applicability. He has come before this tribunal, and the Commission has been unable to agree on an award for damages, for the want of satisfactory and convincing evidence. The case has passed to the umpire, who is equally unable to determine it, and is seeking further proof. Can it be said to be equitable, under such circumstances, to award the payment of interest by Venezuela for time past? Is it not puerile to award interest on sums which can only be approximated?

As these claims were not before brought to the knowledge of the Government of Venezuela, it seems strange to assume that interest is due on them. It is objected, however, that the royal Italian legation was prevented from presenting these claims to the Venezuelan Government by reasons of its being inconvenient, and therefore these very reasons would undoubtedly seem to prohibit the allowance of interest upon these claims.

I do not agree with the Italian Commissioner that the matter should be decided in general terms, though in fact this may be the result.

We are judges, and our proceedings should declare a judgment in each case. Naturally the decisions of the umpire will be accepted as determining the course of settlement by the Commission of future cases, but I believe, nevertheless, that we, as well as the umpire, should give special and full consideration in each case. That each case may or not be consequent on previous criteria is a question of a different nature.

Without any doubt, only well-founded reasons would determine a different procedure in any one case from that followed in others.

RALSTON, Umpire:

A difference of opinion arising between the Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela, this case was duly referred to the umpire.

Upon examining the record, it was the opinion of the umpire that, although the claim was probably well founded, the proof would not justify any recovery, the claimant's witnesses merely stating that the facts alleged by them were public and notorious, but stating nothing of their own knowledge. The foregoing view being submitted by the umpire to his associates, it was determined that the claimant himself should be summoned before the Commission and examined by its members under oath. This course was taken and the claimant appeared and was examined at length on June 25.

The claim is for the enforced loan of three horses (one being returned injured, and all, as appeared on examination, dying shortly after their return because of bad treatment), and for the taking on July 29, 1902, of some fowls, household effects, gold and silver articles, and 250 pesos in coin, the acts complained of being committed by Venezuelan troops at Macuto under the command of a colonel, and by virtue of his express direction, the damage claimed being said to amount to 3,200 bolivars.

The fact of the taking, under the circumstances as stated by the claimant, has been demonstrated, and the only questions are as to the amount of damages and the interest thereon.

(After discussing the facts, the umpire continues:)

The taking having been without right, should interest be included in the award? If so, when should it begin and terminate, and what rate should be allowed? In the opinion of the umpire, some interest is justly due, the claimant having been deprived of the possession and use of his property and interest constituting some measure of return for such deprivation.

According to the general rule of the civil law, interest does not commence to run, except by virtue of an express contract, until by suitable action (notice) brought home to the defendant he has been "mis en demeure." Approximately the same practice exists in appropriate cases in some jurisdictions controlled by the laws of England and the United States. If such be the rule in the case of individuals, for stronger reasons a like rule should obtain with relation to the claims against governments. For, in the absence of conventional relations suitably evidenced, governments may not be presumed to know, until a proper demand be made upon them, of the existence of claims which may have been created without the authorization of the central power, and even against its express instruction. So far is this principle carried that in the United States no interest whatever is allowed upon any claim against the Government except pursuant to express contract.

In view, however, of the conduct of past mixed commissions, the umpire believes such an extreme view should not be adopted. It has seemed fairer to make a certain allowance for interest, beginning its running, usually, at any rate, from the time of the presentation of the claim by the royal Italian legation to the Venezuelan Government or to this Commission, whichever may be first, not excluding, however, the idea that circumstances may exist in particular cases justifying the granting of interest from the time of presentation by the claimant to the Venezuelan Government. This method of procedure will, in the opinion of the umpire, offer in international affairs the degree of justice presented by the "mis en demeure" as to disputes between individuals.

In opposition to the foregoing it is suggested in the opinion of the honorable Commissioner for Italy that the above rule would be unjust for the reason that the forwarding of claims was much delayed by the interruption in or temporary suspension of mail facilities, and because the legation did not deem it wise to call attention to these claims in times of political and financial crises, knowing well that no practical benefit or immediate arrangement would result therefrom.

As to the first of these suggestions, it is to be said that the present claimant has been able at all times to reach Caracas personally or by letter without any delay, and the situation of so many other claimants has been the same that no general rule should be adopted based upon the condition of postal communications.

As to the further suggestion relating to the hesitancy of the royal Italian legation to submit claims, it can not be assumed that a nation which joins in creating a mixed commission to settle claims against it would have failed to recognize its just obligations when presented.

The umpire recognizes fully the fact that it may be a hardship to individual claimants not to receive interest from the date of taking; but, believing that this hardship could have been avoided in the manner before indicated, he does not now consider that it would be just to charge Venezuela with the payment of interest for perhaps long periods of time during which that Republic was not notified that a claim was made against it.

Next considering the question of the time when interest should terminate, the umpire is clearly of the opinion that no interest should be allowed upon the award finally to be made. In this conclusion he is influenced largely by the action of the Geneva tribunal, which granted no interest upon the award, and he is controlled by the fact that the protocols by virtue of which he acts do not provide for interest upon the awards. He believes, however, that under the powers contained in the protocols interest may in every case be calculated to a fixed period within the life of the Commission, this course placing all claimants upon a like footing. In the present claim, therefore, and in others like in general character where judgments are given for the claimants, interest may be calculated as a part of the award up to and including December 31, 1903, that being the date upon which the labors of the Commission might be presumed to terminate.

We now come to the final question as to the rate of interest to be allowed.

The umpire has been referred to the fact that commissions have allowed rates varying from 3 to 7 per cent and even more in some cases, while the commercial rate at Caracas often equals 12 per cent per annum, the latter rate being exacted by the Government on certain overdue taxes or imposts. Attention has further been called to the fact that the American Commissioners allowed against the recent Chinese indemnity 5 and 7 per cent.

The practice among prior mixed commissions has been so far from uniform and so often dependent upon the language of particular treaties as not to afford any very useful guide. Commercial rates are so uncertain that, while their consideration may be useful, the umpire would not be justified in being controlled by them. Of course, high percentages demanded by a Government from a defaulting taxpayer do not afford a safe precedent. Again, as to the Chinese indemnity, the rates were intended to operate simply between the United States and the claimant, and did not operate between nations.

The umpire believes it fair to take into special consideration the rate of interest paid in Venezuela by law in the absence of contract and also the rate accepted by foreign governments upon bonds given by Venezuela to pay obligations created by former arbitral tribunals.

It appears by article 1720 of the Civil Code of Venezuela that the legal rate is 3 per cent in the absence of contract, and the umpire is further informed, that although 5 per cent has been given in some cases, the rate upon bonds given by Venezuela in payment of awards in favor of French citizens and English and Spanish subjects is the same. He thinks, therefore, that this rate should be followed in the absence of contract of the parties fixing another.

Pursuant to the foregoing opinion, judgment will be entered for 1,724 bolivars, plus interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum from the date of the presentation of the claim to the Commission up to and including December 31, 1903.

POSTAL TREATY CASE.

The Commission, under the protocols, has no power to allow interest after the probable termination of its labors.

Claimants appearing before the Commission accept its limitations.

RALSTON, Umpire:

The Commissioners of Italy and Venezuela disagreeing on the question of the time for which interest should run on the above-mentioned claim, that question was duly referred to the umpire.

According to article 2, paragraph 33, of the Postal Treaty,<sup>a</sup> a government failing to pay charges, etc., for transportation due by it is, after six months' notice, chargeable with interest at the rate of 5 per cent per year. Interest at this rate is now asked till payment shall be made. The Venezuelan Commissioner admits interest should commence to run from July 1, 1900.

The rate and the time of commencement of interest are both fixed by the treaty, which is a contract determining absolutely the rights of the parties. However, as indicated in the Cervetti case, No. 9,<sup>b</sup> the Commission is without power to give interest to run beyond the time of the probable termination of its labors, and this principle extends, in the umpire's opinion, not alone to damage cases, but to cases arising under contracts.

It is to be borne in mind that claimants presenting themselves before this Commission appear before a body of limited powers, and are to be regarded as accepting its drawbacks in consideration of anticipated benefits. One possible drawback is the loss of interest after the termination of the Commission.

It is not the duty of the umpire to pass upon the justice of the claim for interest beyond the life of the Commission, and he does not do so, but solely upon the question of jurisdiction, and this decision, as well as the decision in the Cervetti case, is to be regarded as so limited.

SAMBIAGGIO CASE.<sup>a</sup>

(By the Umpire:)

Revolutionists are not the agents of government and a natural responsibility does not exist.

Their acts are committed to destroy government and no one should be held responsible for the acts of an enemy attempting his life.

The revolutionists (in this case) were beyond governmental control and the government can not be held responsible for injuries committed by those who have escaped its restraint.

The word "injury" occurring in the protocol imports legal injury; that is, wrong inflicted on the sufferer and wrongdoing by the party to be charged.

As rules of interpretation the umpire accepts that: (a) If two meanings are admissible, that is to be preferred which is least for the advantage of the party for whose benefit a clause is inserted; (b) the sense which the acceptor of conditions attaches to them ought rather to be followed than that of the offerer; (c) two meanings being admissible, preference is given to that which the party proposing the clause knew at the time was held by the party accepting it; (d) doubtful stipulations should be interpreted in the least onerous sense for the party obligated; (e) conditions not expressed can not be invoked by the party who should have clearly expressed them.

Treaties are to be interpreted generally mutatis mutandis as statutes and, in the absence of express language, are not given a retroactive effect.

The "most-favored-nation" clause contained in the Italian treaty does not oblige this Commission to follow, in favor of Italian subjects, the interpretation made by other Commissions of their protocols.

Venezuela being recognized as a regular member of the family of nations, the universally accepted rules of international law must be applied to her and no intendment can be indulged in against her.

Under a treaty which (as in this case) authorizes the decision of questions before the Commission according to "justice" and "absolute equity," it is its duty to apply equitably to the various cases submitted the well-established principles of international law.

AGNOLI, Commissioner (claim referred to umpire):

That in favor of the Italian citizen, Salvatore Sambaggio, resident of the parish of San Joaquín, who claims 5,135.50 bolivars on account of requisitions and forced loans exacted of him by revolutionary troops, an award be made of 4,591.50 bolivars (the claimant having adduced no proof whatever of a further loss of 544 bolivars, which he claims to have suffered), plus the interest thereon from the date of the loss to the date of the award, the following considerations are submitted in support of said request.

Baron Blanc, of Italy, wrote August 17, 1894, to the minister of Italy in Brazil:

"L'ingérence diplomatique ne doit pas être excessive. Le cas de dommages provenant d'actes qui, en violation du droit des gens, ont été commis par les autorités ou les agents dépendant du gouvernement contre lequel on réclame, est bien différent du cas des dommages qui ont d'autres origines, comme seraient ceux occasionnés par des opérations de guerre ordinaires, ou par des actes provenant de révolutionnaires, ou de malfaiteurs de droit commun.

"Quant aux premiers il n'y a pas doute que l'État ne doive en être tenu pour responsable; mais quant aux seconds, il manque toute base rationnelle d'une responsabilité gouvernementelle, à moins que le gouvernement ou ses agents n'aient, d'une manière évidente, omis de remplir leurs propres devoirs en ce qui concerne la possibilité de prévenir le dommage dont on se plaint." So says Rev. Gen. de Droit International Public, 1897, p. 406.

The Commission has before it the question as to whether the Venezuelan Government is materially responsible to the claimant, Sambiaggio, and other Italians established in Venezuela, on account of damages inflicted upon them by revolutionary authorities or troops. The Italian Commissioner holds that such responsibility exists when, as in the case under consideration, the said authorities exercise a de facto power or when the said troops have a recognized military organization for the purpose of overthrowing the legal government, though the damage alleged may have been inflicted by detached bodies of troops (guerrillas), and that, on the contrary, such responsibility may be excluded when it is shown that such acts are committed by marauders who style themselves revolutionists solely that they may with impunity prosecute their nefarious calling.

This opinion is based upon the following heads:

1. The rights common to all Italians in Venezuela, and to claimants and Sambiaggio in particular, under the terms of the treaty between Italy and Venezuela and of the Washington protocols.

2. The general principles of international law, special legislation, and precedent arbitral decisions in cases analogous to the one under discussion; and

3. Considerations of fact and principles of equity.

As to the first head: In the protocol of February 13, 1903 (Art. I), Venezuela recognizes in principle the justice of the claims presented by His Majesty's Government in the name of Italian subjects, and has besides admitted (Art. IV) that all claims, excepting only those of the first rank (Art. III), may be examined by a mixed commission which, with regard to damages to person or property or to unjustifiable taking, simply establish the truth of the facts and decide the amount of the award.

What is the meaning, the true reason, of these two dispositions, and more particularly of the first?

The meaning, the true reason, is that the Venezuelan Government recognized at Washington its responsibility for acts of revolutionists resulting in damages to Italian subjects; otherwise it would have formulated a special reservation.

Was it, indeed, at all necessary that the Venezuelan Government recognize damages inflicted by its authorities or agents?

Certainly not. The Government has never thought to deny such responsibility, and to specially insist thereon in the first clause of the Washington protocol, one which animates the whole, in order to reassert a principle which has never been questioned, would have been puerile. The justice of Italian claims for indemnity on account of acts of the revolutionists is what was sought to be established—a justice which Italy has always in principle upheld and which the Venezuelan Government has always in principle denied.

The consequences of this divergence in ideas are what were sought to be eliminated. There has never been any question as to the other point.

The first article of the protocol of February 13 and the above-quoted portion of the third not having, therefore, been created with a view to claims for damages inflicted by the Government or its agents, and it being unreasonable to suppose that they were called into being for no specific and well-defined purpose, it follows that they must undoubtedly refer to claims styled "revolutionary."

The Commissioner for Venezuela urges, however, that had these claims been in view, explicit mention of them would have been made; to which the Commissioner for Italy observes, as before, that even though special reference to them has not been made, it is equally true that no reservation or exclusion was stipulated in regard thereto, and insists that his interpretation of the articles mentioned is the only logical one that may be given.

In this connection it is worthy of note that the German-Venezuelan protocol drawn up for similar causes, under identical conditions and having the same scope as ours, contemplates claims originating in the existing "civil war" in Venezuela, and the French-Venezuelan treaty of the 19th of February, 1902, relative to claims of French citizens against the Venezuelan Republic, considers "damages suffered from the fact of insurrectional events."

The "civil war" in Venezuela, in which the revolutionary troops have never been recognized as belligerents, and "the insurrectional events" are nothing more nor less than the revolution, and the damages inflicted by it on German and French subjects will be passed upon by the respective Commissions; indeed, the French-Venezuelan Commission has already decided that such losses must be indemnified.

Under the international treaty of July 19, 1861, Italy is guaranteed the treatment accorded the most favored nation. A broad interpretation has been given by Article VIII of the protocol of February last to articles 4 and 26 of the said treaty, according to which Italians in Venezuela and Venezuelans in Italy shall in all matters, and particularly in the matter of claims, enjoy the rights accorded by the above-mentioned clause. Now, as has been stated, the French-Venezuelan Mixed Commission has recognized the principle of the responsibility of the local government for damages caused French subjects by the revolutionists, according to the provisions of the treaty of Paris of 1902. The Italians have therefore right to similar consideration.

The Washington protocol contains (Art. VIII), however, another important clause, that which provides that the Italian-Venezuelan treaty may not in any case be invoked as against the provisions of the protocol. It may, however, be invoked in favor of the treaty, since it contains no provision contrary thereto, and the Commissioner for Italy accordingly so invokes in favor of the claimant Sambiaggio, as he will for other claimants whose cases are analogous to the one under consideration, the clause relative to the most favored nation.

But why was it agreed at Washington that the Italian-Venezuelan treaty could not be invoked against the provisions of the protocol?

A careful study of these two diplomatic documents will clearly show an intention that article 4 of the treaty should not be invoked as against the protocol, according to which treaty only damages inflicted by the constituted authorities of the country could have given rise to claims for indemnity. What other motive could there have been (and we must assume there was a motive) for the stipulation of Article VIII of the protocol?

It was evidently the intention that all, absolutely all, the claims arising from civil war in Venezuela should be examined and adjudicated ex bono et æquo by the Commission; and if such was the intention, it could not have been contemplated that those arising from revolutionary acts should be thrown out on the raising of a technical objection such as was advanced by the Commissioner for Venezuela in the present case of Sambiaggio, an exception which, even if founded in equity, should not, under the terms of the protocol, be admitted.

The protection and security of person and property which the Venezuelan Government explicitly guarantees by article 4 of the treaty of 1861 to Italians residing in Venezuela would be a mockery did it not include indemnity for injuries inflicted on Italian subjects by the frequent revolutions, against the abuses of which so far no adequate steps have been taken, either preventive or repressive. From the sole fact that Venezuela does not sufficiently and for long periods protect the persons and property of Italians resident in her territory, and has failed of fulfilling the obligations imposed on her by article 4 of the treaty of 1861, there arises the right to claim compensation for damages. (Bluntschli, art. 462.)

This is no new and exceptional theory. The very recent decision of the French-Venezuelan Commission has already been referred to, but there are many others. Mr. Robert Bunch, the English minister at Bogotá and umpire in the claims of the United States v. Colombia in the case of the steamer Montijo,<sup>a</sup> stated in his decision that:

It was, in the opinion of the undersigned, the clear duty of the President of Panama, acting as the constitutional agent of the Government of the union, to recover the Montijo from the revolutionists and return her to her owner. It is true that he had not the means of doing so, there being at hand no naval or military force of Colombia sufficient for such a purpose; but this absence of power does not remove the obligation. The first duty of every government is to make itself respected both at home and abroad.

Protection is promised to those whom the Government has consented to admit to its territory, and means must be found to render said protection effective. If the Government fails therein, even though it be through no fault of its own, it must make the only reparation in its power—i. e., it must indemnify the injured party.<sup>b</sup>

The United States demanded and obtained by arbitral decision of March, 1895, an indemnity for the seizure of the North American vessels Hero, San Fernando, and Nutrias, for the unlawful arrest of United States citizens, and for other damages inflicted by the legal Government and by revolutionists. (Moore, Hist. and Dig. of International Arbitrations, etc., pp. 1723, 1724.) The same theory was sustained by the United States v. Peru, which on that occasion obtained an indemnity of $19,000 in favor of an American citizen, Dr. Charles Easton, for material damages and maltreatment inflicted on him by a body of partisans of a rebel chieftain seeking to overthrow the constitutional Government of Peru. (Moore, pp. 1629, 1630.)

In the case of the "Panama riot and other claims" was recognized the "liability, arising out of its privilege and obligation, to preserve peace and good order along the transit route," of the Government of New Granada, now the State of Colombia, which, in that decision, was obliged to pay an indemnity for the damages inflicted by revolutionists. (Moore, pp. 1361 et seq.)

If it promises protection to those whom it consents to admit into its territory, it must find the means of making it effective. If it does not do so, even if by no fault of its own, it must make the only amends in its power, viz, compensate the sufferer.

Fiore, a noted authority on international law and a writer of most liberal views (chap. 4, sec. 660), says:

A state may be declared responsible for acts committed on its territory, even by private individuals, if injury to a state or to strangers results therefrom.

and in section 666, same chapter, he says:

Let us assume that a government has failed to take proper steps to obviate certain disturbances. * * * In these and similar cases justice and equity require that the state be held to an account and compelled to pay the damages.

In a treatise by the same author (chap. 4, sec. 672) is found this maxim, which deserves the special attention of the Commission, as it synthesizes all the present argumentation:

The question of the responsibility of a state is, therefore, a complex one, and requires for its solution not only the principles of law but an investigation of the facts and an appreciation of the circumstances.

If, therefore, in this matter international law does not establish fixed maxims, but follows different and at times contradictory decisions, it is because such questions, when submitted, were solved according to equity.

Now, the Commissioner for Italy believes he is justified in asserting in all confidence that in the case of the Venezuelan revolutions equity demands that the interests of the claimants injured by revolutions be not neglected.

Grave indeed would be the responsibility assumed by the Commission if it decided to the contrary, especially from the point of view of the discouragement of immigration to Venezuela.

Was it not from considerations of equity that France, on the occasion of the massacre at Aigues-Mortes of a number of Italian operatives by French citizens, indemnified the families of the murdered, and that Italy, under similar conditions, indemnified resident French merchants who had suffered damages from an outburst of popular indignation aroused by the above-mentioned massacre?

And was it not perhaps the same decisions in equity that inspired existing laws in Germany and other European states, according to which municipalities are held to the indemnification of peaceful citizens in cases of mob violence and revolutions?

But, setting aside all reference to the foregoing precedents, it surely would not be just to establish an absolute parallel between the treatment that may be demanded in favor of foreigners in cases of mob violence and revolutions in countries where the administrative and military organization is complete and where acts of rebellion against constituted authority are an exception and may be considered as unfortunate accidents, and that which may be invoked in others where revolution is a frequent and persistent political phenomenon.

From a condition of fact essentially different arises a situation which has peculiar and distinctive characteristics, and upon this is based the question of responsibility, and thence the obligation to grant indemnity.

Requisitions and forced loans exacted from foreigners by the military or administrative authority à main armée, and often with threat, are not merely abuses, but constitute crimes which the Government of Venezuela is of its own motion and by the requirements of its internal laws bound to visit upon the offenders without awaiting report or denunciation from the injured parties. This it has not as yet done.

except in rare instances, and then more from a policy of political order than from any desire to punish the perpetrators of illegal acts.

It is true there have been frequent confiscations of property from revolutionary leaders, but it is not shown that the product of such confiscation has ever been applied to the indemnification of the injured citizens or foreigners.

If this is always the attitude of the Government of Venezuela, it is because such requisitions and forced loans are by it considered as political acts incident to general condition of the country, and being morally responsible for the consequences, it should be held to a material responsibility therefor.

That such is the light in which such acts are viewed by the Government is shown by the amnesty granted to those revolutionists who lay down their arms and become reconciled, without any provisions whatever for the restitution of property unlawfully taken by them. It is true that restitution is not made to natives more than to foreigners, but this does not invalidate the principle of right, and it is logical that these latter should invoke diplomatic intervention, which, as well as the protection of local laws, they have an undoubted right to claim. The one in no wise excludes the other, and in this they are on a parity with Venezuelans residing in Italy or other foreign country.

It is not sought to place in doubt the sincere desire of the Venezuelan Government to maintain political order; but judging from the results it must be admitted that the means employed by it for so doing are, to say the least, inefficient, and from this its responsibility is deduced as a logical sequence, and this is the better established in cases where revolutionists have taken property from and maltreated foreigners within the observation of Government authorities or troops who encouraged them thereto.

The Commissioner for Italy can not possibly distinguish in any manner between damages caused by the acts of successful revolutionists and of those who failed in their attempt.

Success is an accident, and in no respect argues the worth of the cause fought for, the only moral element which could possibly justify a difference in the treatment of those who had been injured by a successful party and those who had been despoiled by an unsuccessful one.

It would be necessary to prove that the revolution broke out in defense of a high humanitarian principle or in vindication of a great political or social idea in order to prove the presence of this moral element.

The struggle between those in power and those seeking to overthrow it has no monopoly of this characteristic, and triumph depends generally upon the force of arms, the skill and foresight of commanders, as well as on other accidental circumstances.

It would, besides, furnish to foreigners a strong incentive for violating the laws of neutrality to make the distinction above mentioned, as in such a case it would be to their interest to side with one or the other faction, and to render more apparent the absurdity of the distinction they would be inclined to side with their despoilers, since with the success of these latter would lie their own chance for securing future compensation for their losses.

And even admitting the principle of such distinction, would we not thereby enter into a very labyrinth of difficulties in cases of sufficient frequency where this or that group of contestants passes from the side of the revolutionists to that of the Government, and vice versa? For example, in which category should be classed the damages caused by General Hernandez, who initiated the last successful revolution, then withdrew therefrom, and now is again reconciled with it?

The Government should be stimulated in the adoption of energetic means whereby to establish order in all the provinces of the Republic now in the hands of the revolutionists, and to maintain peace in the future by holding to the principle of its responsibility in case of claims for damages caused by this same revolution.

It should likewise be considered that on each success of the revolutionists there is established a government de facto, which collects taxes and imposes duties and in various other ways harasses both natives and foreigners.

During the last political crisis there have been several provincial governments which have exercised several, if not all, of the functions of a legal government, and as the sums collected by them can not be demanded from them it is to the Government we must look for redress, as it is the only body with which diplomatic relations may be held with regard thereto. It would be unjust that the property of foreigners should be converted without adequate compensation, to the profit of the country, and there would be danger in conceding that future revolutions might with impunity exist at the expense of foreigners.

These latter may not take part in local politics, and if the principle that they are entitled to compensation for damages inflicted by revolutionists be rejected they will be in a worse position than the natives, as they will have no means of or right to armed defense, and at the same time no one will be held responsible for damages suffered by them from revolutionists.

It has already been remarked that several localities of the Republic are in the hands of the revolutionists. Let it once be known in those localities that it has been decided that the damages inflicted on foreigners there can not be made subject to indemnity and in what a critical position will not those foreigners be placed? What possible guaranty will there be for them against further aggressions?

The political situation in Venezuela has certain special characteristics which the Commission should duly consider in judging of the consequences from the point of view of the claimants and of the compensation. The Commission is not specially called to decide questions of international law, except as it may do so incidentally. Its principal duty is the consideration of facts from the standpoint of moderation and absolute equity, and to compensate in a reasonable degree the Italians who have been injured from the abnormal political situation of the country, planting itself on the provisions of the Washington protocol, which do not distinguish between damages caused by revolutionists, whether triumphant or not, and those caused by the Government, and holding in view the fact that the Venezuelan plenipotentiary has recognized in principle and without reservation or discrimination the justice of claims which the Commission is called upon to decide.

Resting upon these considerations of law, and especially of fact, the Italian Commissioner insists that the claim of Salvatore Sambiaggio be admitted and the Venezuelan Government be held responsible in the sum of 4,591.50 bolivars, with the interest accruing thereon.

P. S.—The Italian Commissioner asks in addition that there be taken in consideration and decided the later claim for damages in the sum of 171.63 bolivars, this day presented by the royal Italian legation, to whom the claimant Sambaggio transmitted it after having forwarded the claim already submitted to the Commission.

ZULOAGA, Commissioner:

It is a generally accepted principle of international law that strangers can not expect, in any country, better treatment than is accorded the nationals. Were this otherwise foreign immigration, instead of being a source of prosperity and grandeur, might become, to quote from Nesselrode's celebrated note, a true lash for the natives.

A foreigner who takes up his domicile in a country can not expect more than the justice of that country, more than the laws of that country, more security than it offers, or more than its civilization and well-being will afford him; in a word, more than the political organization of the place in which he lives will give him. This order of ideas is so founded on the condition of society and on absolute equity that to insist thereon seems superfluous.

The foreigner who comes to this part of America knows and implicitly accepts the fact that here at times society is politically perturbed, just as he knows that its soil is subject to upheavals which may engulf its inhabitants; just as he knows that fever lurks in every bush and pool of its exuberant nature. But if these are its drawbacks, there are also its compensations and advantages. Here life is easier than it is in the great European aggregations, and here fortune is more readily achieved. It would be absurd to pretend that all societies offer equal security and benefits, and hence to expect from each the same grade of civilization.

If this is true, it must be equally true that each government, as such, should be responsible for its acts, in that it constitutes a juridical entity, endowed with rights and duties.

The principle of the responsibility of governments is not otherwise founded, in the opinion of law writers, than on the rule of civil law that each individual is responsible for the acts of himself and his subordinates. (Authorities, articles 1116 of the Venezuelan and 1151 of the Italian code.) In private life the matter of responsibility is easily determined; but not so with the state. The motives which impel the action of the latter are many and various; and when, from whatsoever cause, political society is deeply stirred, it may be necessary for the state to adopt extraordinary, though entirely rational, measures for the reestablishment of order and safety. Numerous are the reasons for a state's action in such case, and the canons of civil law can not apply to it save in a restricted sense.

These premises once established, it seems to me quite possible to appreciate the true meaning of Article III of the Washington protocol. Venezuela holds (art. 9 of the law of 1873, Seijas, Vol. I, p. 57), that the nation can not be considered responsible for damages, injuries, or expropriations not committed by the constituted authorities operating in a public capacity. The responsibility of the Government is therefore limited by and dependent on proof that the acts for which indemnity is claimed have been committed by the authorities while in the discharge of their public functions.

The protocol seems to have desired to avoid these discussions, and the Government admits, in principle, its responsibility; but only in so far as its agents are concerned; not for the acts of individuals—i. e., revolutionists—as that would be an extension of responsibility not contemplated by law, which is not supposable in a public treaty, or juridically deducible, as, according to the fundamental rule of interpretation, every exceptional clause is to be taken restrictively.

Governments, according to the authorities, are not responsible for the acts of individuals in rebellion, precisely because they are in rebellion. (Seijas, Vol. I, p. 50.) A government would be responsible, in the concrete, where it had been negligent in the protection of individuals; but in such case the responsibility would arise from the fact that the government, by its conduct, had laid itself open to the charge of complicity in the injury. The acts of revolutionists are outside of the government.

It is not sufficient for a state to prove that it has been injured by individuals residing in another state to entitle it to hold this latter responsible and exact indemnity from it. It is necessary to prove that the prejudicial act is morally chargeable to the state, which ought to or could have prevented it, and has voluntarily neglected to do so. (Fiore, Vol. I, p. 582, sec. 673, Rule g.)

These are the principles which I find applicable to revolutionists when their political character is clearly demonstrable, as in the case of regular forces who follow a definite political purpose. In regard to guerrillas, the question appears to me even more simple. These are, generally speaking, men who take advantage of the disturbed state of the country to commit depredations. They are often individuals who seek to satisfy passion or to wreak a personal or local vengeance. Others, again, are simply robbers who operate as such under the guise of revolutionists. We have had in this Commission the case of a band of robbers operating on the road to La Guaira, and calling themselves revolutionists. To hold the state responsible for the acts of such individuals would be impossible, as they would naturally come under the jurisdiction of criminal courts, in common with bandits of any country.

Regarding violations of private property, there exists in the law of 1873 (see Seijas, Vol. I, p. 57) the following provisions:

ART. XI. All persons who unofficially order contributions or forced loans or any act of plunder whatsoever, shall equally with the perpetrators, be held personally and directly responsible to the injured parties.

For cases occurring in war coming before the Commission there has been no amnesty, so that the question is not presented. But in my opinion, even supposing a case in which amnesty has covered everything (which has not been the case), the Government would not be responsible if in its judgment such action had been dictated by motives of high public policy.

It is erroneous to assert that Venezuela covers with the shield of amnesty the acts of violence committed by revolutionists against individuals. Only political amnesty has been granted, following the policy usual in such cases, and it is generally so stated in the decrees issued.

The honorable Commissioner for Italy invokes in support of his argument Article I of the Washington treaty. I do not believe that this article has any such meaning, and even less before a tribunal of jurists called upon to decide questions of absolute equity. This article refers only to claims already presented by Italy, and this article of the treaty, given the condition under which it was signed by Venezuela, was simply a means of ending the blockade. Venezuela was compelled to subscribe to the payment of claims the justice of which she denied, and even to admit that they were just. Quod scripsi, scripsi. True, but even Italy, by the mouth of one of her greatest geniuses, has taught the world how much value may attach to a confession wrung by force, and his "E pur si muove" is to-day in the mouths of Venezuelans. Article I of the Washington treaty has, I repeat it, no meaning which may strengthen the claims last presented, as it can not be conceived that that which is unknown may be declared just.

The interpretation given by the honorable Commissioner for Italy to the third article of the Washington protocol would give a marked preference in favor of Italian subjects over the claims of the subjects of other countries who are equally entitled to a share in the 30 per cent set apart for the settlement of all claims. If such radical difference had in fact existed the other nations would not have failed to note it.

Article 462 of Bluntschli's Codification of International Law, invoked by the honorable Commissioner for Italy in support of his contention that as Venezuela had not fulfilled her obligation toward Italy the latter nation could claim indemnity for damages, is in my opinion, wrongfully appealed to. It is not true that Venezuela has violated its treaty obligations with the former country. Article 4 of said treaty does not and could not offer to Italians more protection than is afforded Venezuelans, and as in case of revolution or internecine war the Italians only have a right to be indemnified for injuries inflicted upon them by the constituted authorities on the same terms as those granted by existing law to Nationals, Italy can not say that Venezuela has treated Italians less favorably than her own citizens. Article 4 claims no more than this, and it can not be pretended that more protection is due Italians than is accorded Venezuelans. This article anticipates the case of Italians injured in internecine war, and provides that they shall be treated the same as Venezuelans. As the Washington treaty confers an advantage on Italians over Venezuelans in that it creates this Commission, before which they may appear without the necessity of previously having recourse to the tribunals of the country, and provides for the payment of their claims in gold out of the 30 per cent, the protocol takes care to state that the treaty of 1861 may not be invoked. This is the only object of the article referred to, and nowhere in it does it appear that there was any wish to consider the question of the responsibility for the acts of revolutionists. Neither does it appear, so far as I can see, that the "most-favored-nation" clause of the treaty of 1861 gives Italy the right to claim damages for such acts. It does not appear that any such agreement was made with any power, and if any reference is made therein to claims for damages arising in insurrectionary events, it is without doubt to such as are caused by the acts of the Government or governmental authorities.

To take as precedents the decisions of a mixed commission as though they were the clauses of a treaty is an error. A mixed commission gives its decision in each case and with especial reference to all its circumstances. If, therefore, such decisions were regarded as having the force and effect of a treaty, giving to Italy the right to an advantage equal to the decision in any one identical case, it would be necessary to accord to the decisions in favor of Venezuela corresponding advantages. That is to say, decisions in favor of Venezuela in other commissions would be invoked by her in her favor and against Italy in this Commission. This would lead to the absurdity of submitting this tribunal to the decisions of all the mixed commissions.

The "most-favored-nation" clause referred to by the honorable Commissioner for Italy is absolutely inapplicable in this Commission and has no relevancy.

The decisions of this Commission are not governed by any rule other than that established by Article II of the Washington protocol; that is to say, they will be based on absolute equity, without regard to objections of a technical nature or the provisions of local legislation. This absolute equity is what is understood by the Commissioners to be such, and in the event of their disagreeing the decision of the umpire will be final.

Equity seems to me to be nothing more than the natural application of those rules of reason and justice which nations recognize as surest and which international law recommends in cases submitted for consideration. This is a tribunal of full and absolute jurisdiction and one which has no need to occupy itself with the decisions of other mixed commissions, which may or may not rest on equity, according to the principles governing and applicable only in each case. Furthermore, this tribunal may not be held subject to the precedent of an anterior decision, but is obliged to apply the principles of equity in each case, and if, for an unforeseen cause, a decision has been, in our judgment, incorrect, it is our duty not to perpetuate the error so committed. This is the rule of action of every tribunal.

The cases which the honorable Commissioner for Italy cites in support of his contention (the vessels Montijo v. Colombia, Hero and San Fernando v. Venezuela, and Easton v. Peru) do not seem to me to serve as precedents. In the two first, which refer to the seizure of vessels, there is a mingling of juridical questions which complicate and obscure the cases and render them quite distinct in principle from a simple case of injury to the property of a foreigner domiciled in this country. In the case of Easton v. Peru that country agreed with the United States to pay the sum awarded, but Moore assigns no ground for such agreement.

Fiore, the authority quoted by the honorable Commissioner for Italy, holds in his writings opinions which, when taken in sequence, support the position taken by me in this case. As quoted, the extracts cited do not correctly render the opinions of that learned writer, who maintains that a state may be held responsible if its system of laws is so grossly imperfect as to be evidently unfit for proper administration. The laws of Venezuela—penal, civil, and of procedure—have been inspired by those of Italy, and in so far as concerns the general order of their principles there is but little disparity between them. It would be difficult for Italy, according to equity and the principles laid down by Fiore, to cast imputations of inefficiency on Venezuela in this respect. The responsibility of a government is in proportion to its ability to avoid an evil. A government sufficiently powerful in all its attributes to prevent the occurrence of evil, but by negligence permitting it, is doubtless more accountable for the preservation of order than one not so endowed. It is on this basis that Fiore determines the responsibility of a government to be in direct ratio to its ability to foresee and avoid danger.

A few final considerations and I have done.

This Commission has not, in my opinion, the right to enter into a general discussion as to the merits of the policy of the Venezuelan Government. That would be an act of intervention into its national life not warranted by the principles of international law. Venezuela is a sovereign state, recognized as such by all civilized nations, and is not accountable to any foreign power concerning the motives of its political action.

We here are simply acting as judges in the settlement of claims for damages, according to the merits and circumstances of each individual case—nothing more—and I repel the observations of the honorable Commissioner respecting the general policy and administration of the affairs of this country. Venezuela is a member of the family of nations according to the principles of international law, and admitted as such without question. I can not therefore see that there is any necessity for the discussion of this matter. Venezuela, though occupying a very modest position among the civilized powers, may say, in spite of her recent political misfortunes, that her people have a right to consideration as a cultured people for whom there is a brilliant and promising future. Her history is inferior to that of none of the South American states. To four of them her armies have given independence and furnished statesmen. From her soil have sprung Americans who may well be called eminent. Her institutions, though not as yet fully developed, as they surely will be in time, are most generous and liberal and progressive. She enjoys to the fullest degree liberty of conscience, of religion, of thought, and of education. On her shores the stranger enjoys the same measure of civil rights as does the native. Surely a country in which such conditions exist is entitled to consideration and esteem, and should not be judged by the standard of accidental occasions of political perturbations in which damage to property is suffered. Were so ignoble a criterion to be adopted in our estimate of nations, more than one now held in high regard in Europe would appear far otherwise.

Force of circumstances has drawn us into a general discussion of national responsibility for revolutionary acts, but the truth is that such principles are not needed except as the circumstances of each particular case may require.

This should be the procedure of judges, more especially of judges sitting in equity.

In accordance with the ideas expressed by me in the foregoing, I feel constrained to reject and deny the claim of Salvatore Sambaggio.

ZULOAGA, Commissioner (supplementary opinion):

The government is not responsible to individuals for damages caused by factions, revolutions, or mobs in any manner against the constituted authority. It is true that the government should confer protection and security, but only in so far as is permitted by the means at its disposal and according as the circumstances may be verified. So many and so various are the causes which may render a government more or less culpable that it would be impossible to formulate a general idea on the subject. Moreover, so complicated are the circumstances that the solution of this problem in a perturbed state of society is a question of political tact which few statesmen are capable of settling.

There are times when the use of extreme energy and implacable repression may be a great error, serving only to feed the fires of the insurrection.

Revolutions are not here, more than elsewhere, always occasioned by the faults or errors of the government or by a simple spirit of uprising among the revolted. They obey multiple causes, and not infrequently there is in the political horizon of a people a condensation of revolutionary clouds that the patriotism of the best citizens of the government or of the opposition is unable to prevent, so deeply is the reason hidden in political or economical causes.

Europe itself, so proud of the internal peace which its states have succeeded in preserving during the latter half of the past century, sees with alarm, in spite of the strength of the organization of its governments, the swelling of the socialistic forces and the affiliation therewith of the working masses.

Governments are constituted to afford protection, not to guarantee it, and it is out of the question that this tribunal should assume to investigate the causes of injury from the general standpoint of interior policy, without running the risk of undertaking to judge not merely the cases of claims for damages submitted to it, but also the very government and country itself, which would be an act of interference wholly unwarranted by the principles recognized by all countries.

It has, however, been maintained by various governments and authorities that in certain particular cases and under certain circumstances thereof a state might properly be charged with responsibility for damages to an individual, in the event of its being demonstrated that the state had been wholly negligent in furnishing the protection which could be reasonably expected from it. In accordance with this theory the government is not responsible for lack of protection not resulting from a culpable neglect so great as to equal an act of its own against private property.

Whosoever, therefore, makes claim against the state in such case must establish two things—

1. That he has actually suffered the damage alleged.
2. That the state is in a certain manner responsible, through its negligence, for the damage committed.

This is the doctrine laid down by Fiore:<sup>a</sup>

It is not sufficient for a state to prove that it has suffered a damage from the acts of individuals residing in another state to charge the latter with responsibility and exact a reparation. It must be proved that the prejudicial act is morally imputable to the said state, or that it could or should have prevented the injury and was voluntarily negligent of its duty in not having done so.

This is nothing more than the application of common law that the burden of proof rests on the plaintiff.

In the application of these principles of indirect responsibility it is necessary to take into account that the government of a country in a state of war meets with graver difficulties and problems than it does in a state of peace; that the means at its command and its especial attention are preferably directed to the reestablishment of order, and that its responsibility is in direct ratio to its ability for so doing.

Speaking of neutrality, Fiore says:<sup>a</sup>

The inability of a neutral state to prevent the violation of the laws of neutrality always excludes the liability of the government, and consequently the right of the belligerent to consider the neutral state responsible for said violation.

Now, if this rule is so clearly expressed in regard to neutrality, in which the obligations of neutral governments are in a certain way direct, what shall we say when it is a case coming within the internal life of a state?

This principle of the responsibility of a state by reason of its negligence is moderated, however, by that which holds that foreigners can not in any territory expect to receive more than is accorded the nationals, and according to the law of Venezuela the state is not responsible for the acts of revolutionists.

Setting aside all discussion as to principles of international law, to which we were brought by the necessity of understanding the meaning of certain statements in the Washington protocol, and keeping strictly within the principle of absolute equity, I would ask, Is it equitable that foreigners domiciled in Venezuela should expect to escape the political condition of the country, and obtain, as an advantage over the natives, not only payment for damages inflicted on them by the Government, but for those caused by the rebels the Government was combatting, and against whom it was expending all its energies, blood, and treasure? Is it equitable that, as between a Venezuelan and a foreigner, the former should say, "My home is in mourning for cherished members of my family who have perished in defense of the state; I myself am ruined from the enforced neglect of my business; I have been the victim of the enemy;" while the foreigner may say, "I have lost nothing by the war; I am as safe as in times of peace; not only does the government (which I do not defend) pay me for the losses which it has inflicted on me but for those occasioned by its enemies as well."

I believe that in equity such claims should be rejected.

RALSTON, Umpire:

The Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela differing as to the right of recovery in the above-mentioned case, the same was duly referred to the umpire for decision under the protocol.

The claimant, Salvatore Sambaggio, a resident of San Joaquín Parish, State of Carabobo, demands the sum of 5,133.52 bolivars for forced advances made to, property taken by, and damages suffered from revolutionary forces under command of Colonel Guevara on or about July 27, 1902, with the additional amount of 171.63 bolivars for costs and interests.

The immediate and most important question presented is as to the liability of the existing government for losses and damages suffered at the hands of revolutionists who failed of success.

Let us treat the matter first from the standpoint of abstract right, reserving examination of precedents, the treaties between the two countries; and the question whether there be anything to exempt Venezuela from the operation of such general rule as may be found to exist.

We may premise that the case now under consideration is not one where a state has fallen into anarchy, or the administration of law has been nerveless or inefficient, or the government has failed to grant to a foreigner the protection afforded citizens, or measures within the power of the government have not been taken to protect those under its jurisdiction from the acts of revolutionists; but simply where there exists open, flagrant, bloody, and determined war.

The ordinary rule is that a government, like an individual, is only to be held responsible for the acts of its agents or for acts the responsibility for which is expressly assumed by it. To apply another doctrine, save under certain exceptional circumstances incident to the peculiar position occupied by a government toward those subject to its power, would be unnatural and illogical.

But, speaking broadly, are revolutionists and government so related that as between them a general exception should exist to the foregoing apparently axiomatic principle?

The interest of a government, like that of an individual, lies in its preservation. The presumed interests of revolutionists lie in the destruction of the existing government and the substitution of another of different personnel or controlled by different principles.

To say that a government is (as it naturally must be) responsible for the acts it commits in an attempt (for instance) to maintain its own existence, and to require it at the same moment to pay for the powder and ball expended and the soldiers engaged, in an attempt to destroy its life, is a proposition difficult to maintain, and yet it is to this point we arrive in the last analysis if governments are to compensate wrongs done by their would-be slayers when engaged in attempts to destroy them.

A further consideration may be added. Governments are responsible, as a general principle, for the acts of those they control. But the very existence of a flagrant revolution presupposes that a certain set of men have gone temporarily or permanently beyond the power of the authorities; and unless it clearly appear that the government has failed to use promptly and with appropriate force its constituted authority, it can not reasonably be said that it should be responsible for a condition of affairs created without its volition. When we bear in mind that for six months previous to the taking complained of in the present case a bloody and determined revolution demanding the entire resources of the Government to quell it had been raging throughout the larger part of Venezuela, it can not be determined generally that there was such neglect on the part of the Government as to charge it with the offenses of the revolutionists whose acts are now in question.

We find ourselves therefore obliged to conclude, from the standpoint of general principle, that, save under the exceptional circumstances indicated, the Government should not be held responsible for the acts of revolutionists because—

1. Revolutionists are not the agents of government, and a natural responsibility does not exist.

2. Their acts are committed to destroy the government, and no one should be held responsible for the acts of an enemy attempting his life.

3. The revolutionists were beyond governmental control, and the Government can not be held responsible for injuries committed by those who have escaped its restraint.

Let us now discuss the decisions of courts and commissions relative to the question at issue.

The case of Prats v. The United States was presented before the American and Mexican Mixed Commission of 1868, and was for the destruction of a brig by the Confederate forces during the American civil war.

Nonresponsibility on the part of the United States, [said Mr. Wadsworth, speaking for the Commission], for injuries by the Confederate enemy within the territories of that Government to aliens did not result from the recognition of the belligerency of the rebel enemy by the stranger's sovereign. It resulted from the fact of belligerency itself and whether recognized or not by other governments. * * * The naked question therefore remains: Is the United States responsible for injuries committed during the late civil war within the arena of the struggle by the armed forces of the so-called Confederate States to the property of aliens, transient or dwelling? We have no difficulty in answering that question in the negative.

* * * * *

The principle of nonresponsibility for acts of rebel enemies in time of civil war rests upon the ground that the latter have withdrawn themselves by force of arms from the control and jurisdiction of the sovereign, putting it out of his power, so long as they make their resistance effectual, to extend his protection within the hostile territory to either strangers or his own subjects, between whom, in this respect, no inequality of rights can justly be asserted. (Moore's Digest, Vol. 3, pp. 2886-2892.)

As will appear by reference to Moore, Volume 3, page 2900, the same Commission followed this rule in various cases like in principle.

The United States was not held liable to foreigners for contracts entered into between them and the Confederate States during the civil war. (Moore, Vol. 3, pp. 2900-2901.)

A somewhat like principle was invoked when the American and Mexican Claims Commission of 1868 refused to hold Mexico responsible for the acts of the Maximilian government which was striving to accomplish its overthrow. (Moore, Vol. 3, p. 2902.)

The case of Daniel N. Pope was presented before the American and Mexican Claims Commission of 1859 for damages inflicted by a sudden insurrectionary movement which was soon quelled by the authorities. Mexico was not held responsible. (Moore, Vol. 3, p. 2972.)

So losses inflicted upon a foreigner by a government not recognized as de facto were not recompensed. (Schultz v. Mexico, American and Mexican Claims Commission of 1868, Moore, Vol. 3, p. 2973.)

In the Cummings case, before the same Commission, the umpire, Sir Edward Thornton, held that if the parties inflicting the damage were rebels, the Government was not responsible for the loss. (Moore, Vol. 3, p. 2977.)

In the case of Walsh, for imprisonment by rebels, the same umpire held that the Mexican Government could not be held liable. (Moore, Vol. 3, p. 2978.)

Like principles to these laid down in the foregoing cases were followed in the cases of Wyman and Silva. (Moore, Vol. 3, pp. 2978, 2979.)

The case of Divine (Moore, Vol. 3, p. 2980) is notable in that the American agent contended that Mexico should be held responsible as she had pardoned the revolutionist and had conferred high office upon him; but the umpire held that other governments, including that of the United States, have pardoned rebels, but they have not on this account engaged to reimburse to private individuals the losses caused by those rebels, and dismissed the claim.

Still other commissions have followed the same rule. In the case of McGrady et al. v. Spain (Spanish and American Commission of 1871), a claim merely setting up wrongs and injuries committed by insurgents was dismissed. (Moore, Vol. 3, p. 2981. See to like effect Zaldivar v. Spain, Moore, Vol. 3, p. 2982.)

Before the American and British Claims Commission of 1871 was heard the oft-cited case of Hanna, for destruction of cotton by the Confederate forces during the American civil war. After thorough discussion, the Commission unanimously held—that the United States can not be held liable for injuries caused by the acts of rebels over whom they could exercise no control and which acts they had no power to prevent. (Moore, Vol. 3, p. 2982.)

The same principle was followed in the cases of Laurie and others (Moore, Vol. 3, p. 2987) and Stewart (p. 2989).

The last Commission to consider the point under discussion and decide thereon was the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission, formed by act of the American Congress dated March 2, 1901.<sup>a</sup>

The treaty of December 10, 1898, between the United States and Spain<sup>b</sup> provided that "The United States will adjudicate and settle the claims of its citizens against Spain and relinquished in this article," and to render effective this provision the Commission was constituted.

The article referred to released all claims that had arisen in favor of the nationals of either country against the other "since the beginning of the late insurrection in Cuba."<sup>c</sup>

After the most thorough discussion of the question now before the umpire and the most ample consideration by the Commission it was decided by a majority—the minority apparently not dissenting from the statement of principle, but regarding it as abstract or qualified by certain treaty stipulations or other matters not in point here—that—

2. Although the late insurrection in Cuba assumed great magnitude and lasted for more than three years, yet belligerent rights were never granted to the insurgents by Spain or the United States so as to create a state of war in the international sense, which exempted the parent government from liability to foreigners for the acts of the insurgents.

3. But where an armed insurrection has gone beyond the control of the parent government the general rule is that such government is not responsible for damages done to foreigners by the insurgents.

4. This Commission will take judicial notice that the insurrection in Cuba, which resulted in intervention by the United States, and in war between Spain and the United States, passed from the first beyond the control of Spain, and so continued until such intervention and war took place.

If, however, it be alleged and proved in any particular case before this Commission that the Spanish authorities, by the exercise of due diligence, might have prevented the damages done, Spain will be held liable in that case.

We may now consider the opinion of public men and international law writers.

Without discussing in detail the expressions of American Secretaries of State, in the opinion of the umpire they are correctly summarized in the head notes of section 223 of Wharton's Digest of International Law, as follows:

A sovereign is not ordinarily responsible to alien residents for injuries they receive on his territory from belligerent action, or from insurgents whom he could not control or whom the claimant government had recognized as belligerents.

When a government is temporarily unable to control the acts of private persons within its dominions, owing to insurrection or civil commotion, it is not responsible for injury which may be received by foreign subjects in their person or property in the course of the struggle, either through the measures which it may be obliged to take for the recovery of its authority or through acts done by the part of the population which has broken loose from control. When strangers enter a state they must be prepared for the risks of intestine war, because the occurrence is one over which, from the nature of the case, the government can have no control, and they can not demand compensation for losses or injuries received, both because, unless it can be shown that a state is not reasonably well ordered, it is not bound to do more for foreigners than for its own subjects, and no government compensates its subjects for losses or injuries suffered in the course of civil commotions, and because the highest interests of the state itself are too deeply involved in the avoidance of such commotions to allow the supposition to be entertained that they have been caused by carelessness on its part which would affect it with responsibility towards a foreign state.

In a note to the foregoing he remarks that during the American civil war the British Government refused to procure compensation for injuries inflicted by the United States forces on British subjects, remitting them to American courts for such remedies as were open to American citizens.

While the exact point at issue is not discussed by Bluntschli, he approaches it when he says (see sec. 380, bis):

Par contre, les États ne sont tenus d'accorder d'indemnités pour les pertes ou les dommages subis par les étrangers aussi bien que par les nationaux à la suite de troubles intérieurs ou de guerre civile.

The British minister at Bogotá, on August 23, 1887, wrote, with relation to claims for destruction of property at Panama in 1887, as follows:

From the information obtained by Her Majesty's Government it is clear that the destruction of Colon was entirely due to the action of the insurgents who had declared themselves against the Government, and who, having succeeded in obtaining for a short period complete possession of and mastery over that town, proceeded to set fire to it in several places; nor does it appear to be open to question that at the time when these events occurred the Colombian Government was entirely powerless to prevent, although they eventually succeeded in quelling, the rebellion.

In these circumstances there is not, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, sufficient ground for contending that the destruction of Colon was so directly due to any default on the part of the Colombian Government as to justify a demand for compensation on behalf of those British subjects who, like yourself, have unfortunately incurred losses through the fire. (U. S. Senate Doc. 264, 57th Cong., 1st sess., p. 163.)

Whether the assumptions of fact contained in the foregoing are correct or not the statements of law may be accepted as a summary of the British position.

We may appropriately quote Escriche, who describes a fortuitous case for which no responsibility exists, as follows:

Caso fortuito es el suceso inopinado, ó la fuerza mayor, que no se puede preveer ni resistir. Tales son las inundaciones, torrentes, naufragios, incendios, rayos, violencias, sediciones populares, ruinas de edificios causadas por alguna desgracia imprevista, y otros acontecimientos semejantes.

According to Seijas, Volume III, page 538:

El gobierno inglés, como el ruso, el francés, el italiano y el español, han proclamado y sostenido la irresponsabilidad del estado por perjuicios ocasionados á extranjeros por tropas revolucionarias, y aún por las constitucionales, quando el daño no ha sido voluntario y deliberadamente causado.

While M. Despagne does not more than touch the subject in his "Droit International Public," he says (p. 353):

Mais les étrangers peuvent souffrir un préjudice à la suite d'une guerre, d'une révolution, ou d'une émeute éclatant dans le pays où ils se trouvent; il est universellement admis aujourd'hui que la protection diplomatique ou consulaire ne peut être invoquée en pareil cas, parcequ'il s'agit d'un accident de force majeure, dont les étrangers courent le risque absolument comme les nationaux du pays. Ce serait, d'ailleurs, trop restreindre la liberté d'action des belligérants ou du gouvernement qui combat les insurgés que de les obliger à respecter les biens et les personnes des étrangers, alors surtout qu'il est souvent impossible de les distinguer dans une lutte violente.

Calvo remarks (sec. 86) that:

Les étrangers établis dans un pays en proie à la guerre civile et auxquels cet état de choses a occasionné des préjudices n'ont eux-mêmes aucun droit à des indemnités, à moins qu'il ne soit positivement établi que le gouvernement territorial avait le moyen de les protéger et qu'il a négligé d'en user pour les mettre à l'abri de tout dommage. Ces principes ont dans plus d'une circonstance été reconnus explicitement par les gouvernements d'Europe et d'Amérique.

To support the above statement he cites Grotius, book 2, chapter 25, section 8; Vattel, book 2, chapter 4, section 56; Wheaton, Part I, chapter 2, section 7; Kent, Volume I, sections 23 et seq.; Twiss, section 21; Rutherford, Institutes, book 2, chapter 9; Puffendorf, book 8, chapter 6, section 14; Bynkerschoek, book 2, chapter 3; Wildman, Volume I, pages 51, 57, 58; Halleck, chapter 3, section 20; Martens, sections 79-82; Lawrence, Part I, chapter 2, section 7; Pinheiro Ferreira, Volume II, pages 5 et seq.; Lawrence's Wheaton, note 16; Dana's Wheaton, note 15; Hall, pages 27-30.

In the work of J. Tchernoff, entitled "Protection des Nationaux Résidant à l'Etranger," page 337, the question is touched upon as follows:

On se trouve en présence d'insurgés qui ne sont pas reconnus. Ils commettent des acts qui d'une part sont accomplis en violation des lois de la guerre, et d'autre part sont de nature à causer des dommages aux sujets neutres. On ne peut parler de la responsabilité internationale des insurgés puisqu'ils n'existent pas pour le droit international public. Nous savons, nous venons de dire pourquoi, on ne peut rendre responsable de leurs actes le gouvernement légal.

Certain cases have been or might be cited contrary, or presumed to be contrary, to the enunciations of principle already indulged in by the umpire. They should be enumerated.

The first mentioned by the honorable Commissioner for Italy is the Montijo case, cited in 2 Moore, pages 1421 et seq. In this case the steamer Montijo was taken possession of by State revolutionists. After a short career they surrendered to the regularly constituted authorities of the State, which, according to the opinion of Umpire Sir Robert Bunce, granted them amnesty and stipulated as one of the conditions of peace that the State would pay for the use of the vessel. This contract, the umpire held, bound the Colombian Government. He went further, and in addition held that the Government had failed to perform its duty in that it had not recovered the Montijo and returned her to her owners, following with some general observations as to the duties of governments, which, however well meant, were not necessary to the decision of the case and not discussed by the parties. That the final result was correct is not doubted.

The next citation made by the honorable arbitrator for Italy is of the Venezuela Steam Transportation Company against Venezuela. Unfortunately, the grounds of the decision are not stated in the award.

We learn from the agent's report (p. 11) that among the contentions of the United States were the following:

1. That the seizure, detention and employment of the three steamers of complainant and the imprisonment of its officers * * * was—

(a) An invasion of the rights of the complainant in derogation of principles of international law; (b) was contrary to equity and justice; (c) and was in violation of the special privileges conferred by Venezuela upon the complainant under provisions of the act of Congress of May 14, 1869.

2. That by reason of the invasion of these rights and privileges Venezuela was internationally liable and is bound to indemnify complainant pecuniarily to the extent of the damage proven.

Considering the multiplicity of contentions advanced on behalf of the United States and the absence of reasoning in the decision, it is impossible to say on what principle the case was decided, although it is fair to remark that it might be inferred from the dissenting opinion of Commissioner Andrade that the case affords support for the theory of the honorable Commissioner for Italy.

Reference is next made to the case of Easton and others, supported by the United States, against Peru. As appears by the report in Moore, page 1629, the injuries complained of were inflicted by revolutionists, and a claim therefor presented before the United States and Peruvian Claims Commission. The question of Peru's liability for acts of revolutionists seems not to have been discussed, the Commissioners simply disagreeing as to the amount of the award, and the case going to the umpire, whose opinion is not given. Whether there were or not circumstances withdrawing the case from the usual rule does not appear.

The honorable arbitrator for Italy next cites the Panama riot claims (2 Moore, pp. 1361 et seq.); but it seems clear that the citation is not in point, these claims having grown out of an assault in which the police themselves took part, and the Government being held liable for failure of its officers to do their duty, nothing approaching the present revolutionary question appearing.

The opinion of the honorable Commissioner for Italy invites attention to Bluntschli, article 462, and Fiore, sections 645, 651, and 657.

Bluntschli, in the article indicated, lays down conditions which would justify forcible interference by one state in the affairs of another; but the present situation does not seem to be such as to make his words applicable.

The positions taken by Fiore may be regarded as being in direct accord with the theory of the present decision. Furthermore, we may accept, as, in fact, has already been accepted, in principle, the words of Fiore (sec. 656), when he says:

Non é facile stabilire regole astratte per determinare quando la mancanza di diligenza per parte di un governo nel calcolare le conseguenze possibili e prevedibili del proprio sistema di leggi e di procedure, posse costituire una omissione volontaria, o tale da rendere lo Stato responsabile. Tutto dipende dal rapporto tra il dovere astratto dello Stato e le circostanze di fatto, e tra il pericolo del danno e la prevedibilità.

La diligenza colla quale un governo deve provvedere a che siano rispettati i doveri internazionali dovrà certamente essere maggiore quando per la forza degli avvenimenti siano posti in giuoco molti interessi, quando la società internazionale sia agitata, quando il pericolo che accadano fatti a danno di un Stato amico, sia maggiore. Di maniera che la solerzia colla quale dev' essere tenuto un governo é in ragione diretta delle circostanze che rendono più o meno imminente ed il danno che si può provvedere ché i terzi possono soffrire; la sua responsabilità effettiva poi in ragione diretta del dovere di essere solerte dei mezzi dei quali poteva disporre, e dei quali si è servito per allontanare il pericolo. (See Fiore, Droit Int. Privé, Antoine's ed.

There is, however, the broad difference hereinafter pointed out between indulgence in a settled presumption, on the one hand, and an investigation of the facts and appreciation of the circumstances in each case.

It is suggested, in the opinion of the honorable Commissioner for Italy, among other things, first, that the Italian protocols impliedly recognize the obligation of Venezuela to pay for injuries committed by revolutionary troops; and, second, that under a proper reading of Article VIII of the protocol of February 13, bearing in mind that France and Venezuela, by the protocol of February 19, 1902, had expressly recognized damages arising from "insurrectionary events," and that the German protocol refers to claims resulting from the present Venezuelan civil war, Italy, under the "most favored nation" clause appearing in such article of her protocol, is entitled to be paid for injuries inflicted upon her subjects, and of the nature above indicated.

To fully understand these contentions a recital of the facts with relation to the diplomatic situation between Italy and Venezuela seems essential.

By article 4 of the treaty between the two nations, dated June 19, 1861, it was provided, among other things, as follows:

ART. 4. The citizens and subjects of one state shall enjoy in the territory of the other the fullest measure of protection and security of person and property, and shall have in this respect the same rights and privileges accorded to the nationals, and shall be subject to the conditions imposed on the latter. * * *

In cases of revolution or internecine war the citizens and subjects of the contracting parties shall have the right, in the territory of the other, to be indemnified for loss or damage to person or property inflicted by the constituted authority in the same measure as would, under similar circumstances, be granted nationals according to the laws which are or may be in vigor.

Article 26 provides:

It is agreed between the high contracting parties that in addition to the foregoing stipulations the diplomatic and consular agents, all citizens, vessels, and merchandise of each state, respectively, shall enjoy the full right in the other to the franchises, privileges, or immunities accorded the most favored nations, gratuitously if the concession has been gratuitous, and on similar terms if the concession was a conditional one.

Discussions, the nature of which will be alluded to hereafter, arising between the two countries, by Article VIII of the protocol of February 12, 1903, it was provided as follows:

ART. VIII. The treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation between Italy and Venezuela of June 19, 1861, is renewed and confirmed. It is, however, expressly agreed between the two governments that the interpretation to be given to articles 4 and 26 is the following:

"According to article 4, Italians in Venezuela and Venezuelans in Italy can not in any case receive a treatment less favorable than the natives, and according to article 26, Italians in Venezuela and Venezuelans in Italy are entitled to receive in every matter, and especially in the matter of claims, the treatment of the most favored nation, as is established in the same article 26."

If there is any doubt or conflict between the two articles, the article 26 will be followed.

It is further specially agreed that the above treaty shall never be invoked in any case against the provisions of the present protocol.

Article IV of the present protocol reads as follows:

ART. IV. The Italian and Venezuelan Governments agree that all the remaining Italian claims, without exception, other than those dealt with in Article VII hereof, shall, unless otherwise satisfied, be referred to a Mixed Commission, to be constituted as soon as possible in the manner defined in Article VI of the protocol, and which shall examine the claims and decide upon the amount to be awarded in satisfaction of each claim.

The Venezuelan Government admit their liability in cases where the claim is for injury to persons and property, and for wrongful seizure of the latter, and consequently the questions which the Mixed Commission will have to decide in such cases will only be:

- (a) Whether the injury took place or whether the seizure was wrongful; and,
- (b) If so, what amount of compensation is due.

In other cases the claims will be referred to the Mixed Commission without reservation.

It is evident that the protocol last mentioned does not directly recognize any obligation on the part of Venezuela to pay for injuries inflicted by revolutionary troops, and the first question is whether it does so by implication. It seems clear that under the treaty of 1861 revolutionary claims could not have been entertained, for the obligation recognized by Italy and Venezuela reciprocally was to indemnify for the loss or damage inflicted by the constituted authority of the country, and then only in the same measure as nationals would be.

Consequent upon the revolutionary events of 1896 to 1900, injuries inflicted upon Italian citizens were the subject of the diplomatic discussion between the countries. A careful examination of the correspondence shows that it did not relate to the questions of liability or nonliability for the acts of revolutionists, but rather to the power of Venezuela under its decree of February 14, 1873, republished January 24, 1901, to remit Italians and other foreigners to the local authorities for relief. Bearing in mind the fact that the only treaty obligations then existing was to indemnify against injury by the constituted authorities of the country we can readily understand why it was that in the diplomatic correspondence, as stated, no reference whatever exists to the question of liability for damages from acts of unsuccessful revolutionists, and none of the Italian claims submitted to the Venezuelan foreign office were for such injuries.

The article does not in itself refer to any specific classes of acts, and a natural and logical interpretation would be that it charged Venezuela with the fullest responsibility for the acts of her authorities of whatever nature, legal or otherwise, or other acts for which she might be responsible from the standpoint of international law, not for the acts of those over whom she had no control. This interpretation would not necessarily render the words meaningless or superfluous when we remember that at the time they were written there existed in full force the law of February 14, 1873, which provided only a limited responsibility, as follows:

ART. 9. En ningún caso podrá pretender que la Nación ni los Estados indemnicen daños, perjuicios, ó expropiaciones, que no se hubieron ejecutado per autoridades legítimas, obrando en su carácter público.

Article 14 of the constitution of Venezuela of April, 1901, contains the foregoing provision, but with the words applying it "tanto los nacionales como los extranjeros," while article 13 provides:

ART. 13. Los extranjeros gozan de todos los derechos civiles que gozan los nacionales. Por tanto, la Nación no tiene ni reconoce á favor de los extranjeros ningunas otras obligaciones ni responsabilidad que las que á favor de los nacionales se hayan establecido en igual caso en la constitución y en las leyes.

Venezuela, in addition, denied in principle the right of a foreigner to present any claims save before her own forums, and permitted that only for a limited time. About these points alone the discussion between the two Governments turned. It is therefore inconceivable that Venezuela by the protocol should have admitted liability for a large class of claims never contended for by Italy, her admission so naturally relating to a liability denied by both laws and constitution.

An interpretation which would extend the liability of Venezuela under her admission to acts of revolutionists would enlarge its limits to include any liability, no matter how generally denied by internationalists, and whether the damages were the result of private wrongs or unexpected brigandage, were committed by a power invading Venezuela or were the effect of an accident in the international sense as applied to war; in every case must Venezuela pay—a conclusion manifestly impossible. In the umpire's opinion, there must properly be the premise always understood that the claim is of a nature to create liability under international law—in other words, it must be for a legal injury. (See Webster's Dictionary, title Injury.)

Let us accept for a moment the interpretation insisted upon by Italy and see the result. Venezuela would be bound not alone for her own acts, but generally for all acts—bound for the acts of those seeking to destroy constituted government as well as to defend it; bound for every claim of damage the royal Italian legation might see fit to present. She would be held to have abandoned the usual position of a contracting party and to have consented to place herself within the judgment of those claiming against her, leaving only the amount of the claim to be determined. The Commission would no longer determine whether the (legal) injury took place, for all claimed offenses, no matter by whom committed, would constitute injuries in the eyes of the Commission. To indulge in such supposition is to imagine that the representative of Venezuela had abandoned reason when the protocol was signed, and an interpretation according common sense to both parties signing a contract should always be sought.

Let us for a moment analyze the language of the protocol in view of the facts. Venezuela had for a long time by her constitution and laws denied her liability for certain classes of acts, and denied that she was responsible anywhere save in her own courts.

By the protocol she admitted liability for injury to persons and property and wrongful seizure of the latter, and remitted to a mixed commission the questions (a) whether the injury took place, and (b), if so, what amount of compensation is due. In aid of the sense we may presume that the word "injury," when last used, includes injury to person and property and wrongful seizures.

It has already been pointed out that "injury" imports a damage inflicted against law. It involves a wrong inflicted on the sufferer and of necessity wrongdoing by the party to be charged, as otherwise it could not be called "wrongful" as against him. Applying this doctrine, which the umpire believes to be unassailable, by what process of ratiocination can he imply to Venezuela the wrongful intent lodged in the bosoms of those who were at enmity with her and seeking to destroy her established Government? And if he may not do so, how can he charge Venezuela with the commission of acts of which she is innocent? And how, under such circumstances, can he find that an injury has been committed with which, by the law of nations, she should be so charged?

If it be argued that she has admitted liability for the acts of another, and therefore she should pay, is it not to be remarked that a promise to pay for the acts of one's enemy engaged in an attempt upon one's own life is so far contrary to the usual practice of mankind that it is only to be believed upon the most direct and express evidence, and beyond all dispute this evidence is lacking.

But even if the case were not clear, as it seems to be, applying the usual rules of law, and bearing in mind the tendencies of human nature, what are we taught as the canons of interpretation in such cases?

Woolsey's International Law, section 113, gives as one of the most important rules of interpretation:

2. If two meanings are admissible, that is to be preferred which is least for the advantage of the party for whose benefit a clause is inserted. For in securing a benefit he ought to express himself clearly. The sense which the acceptor of conditions attaches to them ought rather to be followed than that of the offerer.

Wharton's Digest, section 133, expresses a like idea in these terms:

If two meanings are admissible, that is to be preferred which the party proposing the clause knew at the time to be that which was held by party accepting it.

In the same sense says Pradier-Fodéré (section 1188):

Les auteurs modernes reconnaissent que * * * les stipulations douteuses doivent être interprétées dans le sens le moins onéreux pour la partie obligée.

Vattel expresses himself (sec. 264, Tome II) as follows:

Si celui qui pouvait et devait s'expliquer nettement et pleinement ne l'a pas fait, tant pis pour lui; il ne peut être reçu à apporter subéquemment des restrictions qu'il n'a pas exprimées.

Summing up the foregoing, the umpire thinks that if it had been the contract between Italy and Venezuela, understood and consented to by both, that the latter should be held for the acts of revolutionists—something in derogation of the general principles of international law—this agreement would naturally have found direct expression in the protocol itself and would not have been left to doubtful interpretation.

As above indicated, it is strongly urged, in connection with Article VIII of the protocol, that because of the presence of the "most-favored nation" clause the umpire should give to Italy all the advantages which might be claimed by Germany and France by virtue of the protocols made with those powers.

At first glance the suggestion would appear to be well founded; but a careful study of the article will, in the umpire's opinion, prove the argument erroneous.

At the time the protocol was signed relations between Italy and Venezuela were so far broken that, as shown by the language of the article, it was necessary to "renew and confirm" the old treaty.<sup>a</sup>

Italy then asked and obtained a special interpretation of the treaty of 1861 with her. If this interpretation is to be given a retroactive effect, and if it is to be considered as applying in favor of Italy, all the provisions of other protocols recently signed, then a resort to such instruments is necessary in every case to learn the furthest bounds of the powers of this Commission. Unless both elements concur we need not refer to them.

Has, therefore, this new interpretation of articles 4 and 26 of the old treaty any retroactive effect? If it has not, the rights of Italian subjects and the duties of the Venezuelan Government are fixed by treaty or international law as of the date of the occurrence complained of, but modified by such provisions of the protocol as do not form part of the treaty of 1861 as now interpreted.

Treaties are to be interpreted, generally, mutatis mutandis, as are statutes (Wharton's Digest, sec. 133), and on many occasions the Supreme Court of the United States has held that in the absence of express language statutes will not be held to be retroactive. In one of the most recent cases brought before that tribunal it was held that—a statute should not be construed to act retroactively, or to affect contracts entered into prior to its passage, unless its language be so clear as to admit of no other construction. (City R. Co. v. Citizens' Street R. Co., 166 U. S., 557.)

The case now before us, as above indicated, is substantially that of a treaty "renewed and confirmed," with a new interpretation as to claims, but not in terms relating back to past conditions or justifying the umpire in believing that new obligations as to past events had been called into existence by its signing.

This belief is borne out by the fact that the signers of the protocol did not think that this renewed treaty related back, for if they had done so they would not have concluded the article with the words:

It is further specially agreed that the above treaty shall never be invoked in any case against the provisions of the present protocol.

If the treaty, as newly interpreted, had, in the signers' opinion, related back, these words would have been unnecessary, for, giving full force to the interpretation as relating to an earlier date, there would have been nothing for Italy to fear. If the treaty uninterpreted could have been invoked, save for the presence of the words in the protocol, there was reason to believe that its Article IV, above cited, would have defeated many Italian claims.

Article VIII, though found within a temporary protocol, is in fact part of a renewed treaty and relates necessarily to the treatment to be accorded citizens and subjects by general and permanent rules between nations, and not to momentary rules of decision controlling the disposition of claims arising out of past events. Rules for the settlement of prior disputes, which die with the Commission acting under them, accord nothing partaking of "favored-nation" treatment; for, to illustrate, suppose Venezuela had said in a protocol with Switzerland ten years ago that to settle by arbitration a dispute affecting a single individual she had admitted her liability for the acts of robbers, could that admission now be invoked by Italy as against Venezuela? Is the case stronger or the rule different because France, for instance, has now a hundred or more claimants? Must the umpire examine the records of every past commission to be sure that Italy is receiving "favored-nation" treatment before him?

If the idea presented by the honorable Commissioner for Italy were to prevail, would not inextricable confusion result? Must the umpire of the Italian-Venezuelan Commission withhold his decision on a particular case until another commission decide it, and follow the views then expressed? If he decide a certain proposition against Italy, and any other commission thereafter give a more favorable decision, must he, in subsequent cases, abandon his opinions despite his solemn declaration at the formation of this Commission, or must he insist upon them, notwithstanding that the Commission primarily charged with the interpretation of the other protocol be of a different opinion?

The umpire concludes that the interpretation of the old treaty in Article VIII of the protocol has no retroactive effect and no reference to the pending arbitrations.

The umpire has discussed the foregoing as if the French and German protocols might give superior rights to those granted to Italy, but expresses no opinion on this point.

It is strongly insisted on behalf of the claimant that whatever may be the general rule of international law with respect to the nonliability of governments for the acts of revolutionists, this rule does not find a proper field of operation in Venezuela, the country being subject to frequent revolutions.

It is true that an exception such as is indicated has on various occasions been maintained by the United States and several European nations in their dealings with certain Central and South American states. But the exception can not be said to have become a settled feature of international law, not having been accepted by the nations against which it was enforced, and being repudiated by some international writers (Calvo, sec. 1278) and perhaps squarely accepted by none.

Attorney-General Cushing, a lawyer of deserved eminence in international affairs, remarked nearly fifty years ago (2 Moore, p. 1631):

Great Britain, France, and the United States had each occasionally assumed in behalf of their subjects or citizens in those countries (South American) rights of interference which neither of them would tolerate at home—in some cases from necessity, in others with questionable discretion or justification. In some cases such interference had greatly aggravated the evils of misgovernment. Considerations of expediency concurred with all sound ideas of public law to indicate the propriety of a return to more reserve in this matter as between the Spanish-American republics and the United States, and of abstaining from applying to them any rule of public law which the United States would not admit in respect of itself.

To take the position, as is asked, that Venezuela is in the regard under discussion an exception to the general rule we must have the right to decide, and must actually decide, that Venezuela does not occupy the same position among nations as is occupied by nations contracting with her. Is this justifiable?

For about seventy years Venezuela has been a regular member of the family of nations. Treaties have been signed with her on a basis of absolute equality. Her envoys have been received by all the nations of the earth with the respect due their rank.

The umpire entered upon the exercise of his functions with the equal consent of Italy and Venezuela and by virtue of protocols signed by them in the same sovereign capacity. To one as to the other he owes respect and consideration.

Can he therefore find as a judicial fact, even inferentially (the protocol not authorizing it in express terms), that one is civilized, orderly, and subject only to the rules of international law, while the other is revolutionary, nerveless, and of ill report among nations, and moving on a lower international plane?

It is his deliberate opinion that as between two nations through whose joint action he exercises his functions he can indulge in no presumption which could be regarded as lowering to either. He is bound to assume equality of position and equality of right.

The umpire is the more confirmed in this opinion because of the fact that at the time of the happening of many of the offenses committed by revolutionists upon which claims against Mexico before the several commissions were founded, Mexico was experiencing internal disorders and revolutions certainly not less marked than those from which Venezuela had suffered within the past five years. Nevertheless Mexico was not charged with responsibility.

While the umpire considers the rule of action above indicated as that which must control him, he does not ignore the fact that the existence of the protocol implies that Venezuela may have failed in her duties in the light of international law in certain instances, and that as to such cases his powers as an umpire may be called into play. But in his mind there is a broad difference between indulgence in a general presumption of inferior status and the acceptance of proof of wrongdoing in particular instances.

The umpire therefore accepts the rule that if in any case of reclamation submitted to him it is alleged and proved that Venezuelan authorities failed to exercise due diligence to prevent damages from being inflicted by revolutionists, that country should be held responsible. In the present instance no such want of diligence is alleged and proved.

It is suggested that a decision holding Venezuela not responsible for the acts of revolutionists would tend to encourage them to seize the property of foreigners. This appeal is of a political character and does not address itself to the umpire.

It is further urged that absolute equity should control the decisions of the Commission and that equitably sufferers from the acts of revolutionists should be recompensed. But this subject may be viewed from two standpoints. It is as inequitable to charge a government for wrongs it never committed as it would be to deny rights to a claimant for a technical reason.

In the view of the umpire, the true interpretation of the protocol requires the present tribunal, disregarding technicalities, to apply equitably to the various cases submitted the well-established principles of justice, not permitting sympathy for suffering to bring about a disregard for law.

The umpire will close the discussion by quoting upon this point from Mérignhac's Traité d'Arbitrage, section 305:

Cet usage est assez fréquent entre particuliers (permitting to the arbitrator absolute liberty of decision). Grotius en parlait déjà et ne voyait aucune bonne raison de le prohiber au regard des parties ayant une confiance absolue en l'arbitre (conf. art. 1019 du code de procédure civile français). Dans ce cas aucune règle ne s'impose, en principe, à l'arbitre international, et il est libre de statuer "suivant sa conscience personnelle." Nous estimons, cependant, qu'on ne saurait trop lui recommander de se conformer, toutes les fois qu'il le pourra, aux solutions du droit international, mitigé, le cas échéant, par l'équité, comme nous l'avons dit. En agissant autrement il risquerait souvent de faire fausse route, car, si grandes que soient son autorité et son expérience personnelles, elles ne peuvent évidemment aboutir à des déductions aussi sûres que celles qui ont été approuvées par une longue pratique internationale et l'usage constant des peuples civilisés. Il faut ranger dans la classe des compromis, laissant toute liberté à l'arbitre, ceux qui lui permettent de juger suivant la justice et l'équité; cette formule vague aboutit en effet à lui laisser une liberté absolue.

Governed by what he regards as the clear teachings of international law, the umpire will sign a judgment dismissing the case.

In conclusion, the umpire desires to express his appreciation of the industry and learning displayed on behalf of Italy and Venezuela in preparation of the case.

MAZZEI CASE.

Venezuela ultimately receiving property originally taken by revolutionists, equitably should pay therefor.

RALSTON, Umpire:

The honorable Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela disagreeing as to the above-entitled claim, it was referred to the umpire.

The facts of the claim are somewhat obscure in certain particulars, because the appropriate dates are not always given, but the following is believed to be a correct statement:

On November 16, 1899, Generals Leopoldo and Victor Bautista, of the Government forces, took from the claimant a horse and some other animals, which the claimant valued at 16,000 bolivars, but which are not valued in the testimony, or their number given, save that the claimant refers to "two superior jacks" and the witnesses to "burros" or "animals." The horse taken was returned.

On January 18, 1900, revolutionary forces took merchandise and animals. We may dismiss further mention of this taking, as it comes within the rule laid down in the Sambiaggio case.<sup>a</sup>

On October 12, 1901, factional forces under command of General Briceño and Col. Nicolás Geres took 30 mules valued at 624 bolivars each, or a total of 18,720 bolivars. These forces being shortly thereafter defeated, the mules were taken possession of by the Government and not returned to the claimant.

With regard to the taking of November 16, 1899, the number of animals taken does not clearly appear. The umpire is limited to the smallest number given, the "two superior jacks." The valuation of 250 bolivars, in the absence of specific evidence, may be placed upon them.

As to the taking of October 12, 1901, while the claimant was in the first place a sufferer at the hands of the revolutionists, nevertheless, the property taken finally fell into the hands of the Government and was retained by it. Having, therefore, received the benefit of the claimant's animals, the umpire believes it entirely equitable that the Government should pay therefor.

A judgment will therefore be entered for the sum of 18,970 bolivars plus interest from the date of the presentation of the claim to December 31, 1903.

DE ZEO CASE.

A claim founded upon supposed wrongful acts attributed to minor public officers should be clear and definite in its statements and proof and show unavailing appeal to superior authority to justify recovery against a State.<sup>b</sup>

RALSTON, Umpire:

The honorable Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela differing in opinion, the above cause was duly referred to the umpire for decision.

The claimant, in person or through his witnesses, states that in the middle of the year 1885 he was a merchant residing in Mucuchies,

Province of the Andes, and had built up a flourishing business, with large investment of capital; that there were due him credits payable generally at the end of the then present year or the beginning of the following; that his prosperity excited the envy of the local authorities, and on the return of Gen. Rosendo Medina to resume the position of president of the State, he, the claimant, became the object of furious and persistent persecutions by the authorities of Mucuchies, being finally compelled to flee, abandoning everything; that he was never able to return home, but after an absence of a year and a half he returned as near as Medina; that thereafter he brought suit in the local courts to recover debts due him, but the "expedientes" were "extracted" and his debtors were warned, under threats, not to pay him; that he did not finally bring suit because of these facts (although a superior court in 1886 adjudged that his testimonial proof was sufficient), since suit had to be brought in the locality where the acts complained of had been committed, and the same authorities were still in power and inspired with animosity against him and he could not procure an attorney.

The testimony of a number of witnesses was taken and it sustained, in a general way, the above allegations, fixing his damages from every cause, including indirect damage resulting from loss of business down to 1896, at 140,000 bolivars.

If we may presume that the complaint of the claimant embodies a just ground of recovery, it is to be noted that neither he nor his witnesses state the nature of the persecutions to which he was subjected (except the "extraction" of "expedientes," by whom taken not being stated), by whom these persecutions were inflicted (save as they are said to have been by unnamed local authorities), the threats leveled against him, causing flight, the value of the stock he lost, the value of his yearly business, the amount of outstanding credits he was compelled to sacrifice, the value of his lands and improvements, the damage experienced from their forced sale, the place where he spent his absence of a year and a half from the neighborhood, the nature of the threats against his debtors, and the amount of his injury by reason of the threats against them. The witnesses who swear to the amount of his loss (four in number) show no personal knowledge as to any details and make no statement as to them, but simply give their belief that 140,000 bolivars would be "equitable" or "just." The claimant does not state, furthermore, that he ever made any complaint to the superior officers of the Government. In the utter absence of detail it becomes impossible for the umpire to say that he was subjected to any such persecutions, the legal conditions otherwise permitting recovery, as would justify a Mixed Commission in considering the claim, or, if it did so, would enable it to determine even approximately the damage inflicted.<sup>a</sup>

Again, the belief of a witness that a certain estimate of loss would be "equitable" or "just" can rarely be of value to the Commission, which needs definite statements of facts to act upon, and will then judge as to the proper conclusion, which may or may not be that of the witness. Judgments must be founded upon facts furnished by the witnesses.

The claimant excuses himself, as appears above, for not having brought suit for the damages inflicted upon him by the alleged fact that the authorities committing the wrong were still in office and inspired with animosity against him, and, as may be inferred, it would have been impossible for him to obtain justice. Again, we are not informed as to what control they had over the judiciary. The umpire is therefore unable to judge of the validity of this excuse, which, according to authorities hereinafter cited, should have been proven in the clearest possible manner.

The umpire will close by referring briefly to some authorities bearing upon the question at issue, and the tendency of which would be, from a legal standpoint, to deny in part or altogether, the responsibility of Venezuela before this tribunal, even if otherwise the case had been made out.

In the case of Johnson v. Mexico (3 Moore, p. 3032), before the Mexican Claims Commission of 1857, referring to a charge that the Government of Mexico had tolerated and even set on foot disorders affecting the claimant's business, it is said:

So grave a charge against the government of any country should be maintained by the most unquestionable proof. It should be alleged as a distinct fact and ground of reclamation, and proved by evidence of the clearest character.

In case of Bensley before the same Commission (3 Moore, p. 3018), a boy having been seized by the governor of a State, it was said:

For the damages resulting from this unauthorized act he was individually responsible to the claimant, and it does not appear that ample redress might not have been obtained by a resort to the judicial tribunals of the country. Had the courts of Mexico been closed to the claimant and justice denied him, that might have constituted a ground for a claim of indemnity against the Government of Mexico. No such case, however, is presented. No appeal was made by the claimant to the courts, and no denial of justice had been proved. Under these circumstances the board can not regard the Government of Mexico as liable to a claim for indemnity on account of the wanton or malicious trespass of the person holding the office of governor of one of the States constituting the confederacy. "

The Cahill case (3 Moore, 3066), before the United States and Spanish Commission, may also be referred to. The claimant asked payment for damages suffered by him while conducting a drug store at Cardenas, Cuba, and the breaking up of his business. He attributed his misfortunes to the machinations of a rival druggist, who was also an official, a "subdelegate of pharmacy." Among other things he complained of various acts of the authorities touching matters such as the hanging out of a flag, threats, disrespectful remarks, etc. The arbitrators held that claimant had no title to recover and dismissed the claim.

From the foregoing it appears that the claim must be dismissed, but without prejudice to any right the claimant may have to present his claim in Venezuela courts or elsewhere against persons guilty of any legal wrong so far as he is concerned.

BOFFOLO CASE.

(By the Umpire:)

- A state possesses the general right of expulsion; but—
 Expulsion should only be resorted to in extreme instances and must be accomplished in the manner least injurious to the person affected.<sup>a</sup>
 The state exercising the power must, when occasion demands, state the reason of such expulsion before an international tribunal, and an insufficient reason or none being advanced accepts the consequences.
 The only reasons advanced in the present case being contrary to the Venezuelan constitution, and Venezuela being a country not of despotic power, but of fixed laws, the umpire can not accept them as sufficient.

ZULOAGA, Commissioner:

The right to expel foreigners is fully held by every State and is deduced from its very sovereignty. All international law writers agree upon this, and the European nations use it amply. In the case of expulsion submitted by England and Belgium to the arbitration of the French jurisconsult, Desjardins, he affirms the right fully. Even Italy has not refused to recognize it in regard to Venezuela, having practiced it extensively.

Venezuela, by the constitution of 1893, established as subject to expulsion foreigners having no domicile and notoriously prejudicial to the public order.

The question as to domicile of foreigners is determined in Venezuela by the provisions of the decree of February 14, 1873, and applying these provisions to the case of Boffolo it appears that he had no domicile in Venezuela. He had not been in the country two years; neither did he have a business properly so called. It appears that he had ostensibly, as a manner of living at the time of the expulsion, a connection with Roversi, according to contract of 1899, whose character demonstrated its precariousness, and in addition a small sheet published Sundays, which seemed little more than an advertisement for Roversi.

Boffolo had no domicile in the country, and the fact of his having been notoriously prejudicial to public order is a question that the Government is fully competent to determine, since to it is confided the power to expel without appeal or revision.

From the very statements made by the claimant the evil life and character of the subject may be easily recognized. In the first place, his affirmations to the minister of foreign affairs contain many things notoriously false; in the second place, the only copy of his little periodical we have had in it an attack on the authorities of the country; and in an article he recommends to the workmen to read and patronize El Obrero, a periodical of strong socialistic and dangerous tendencies, and which was circulating at about this time, and which really caused considerable prejudice to capital and machinery by its propaganda. No other number of the sheet is known to us.

The right to expel exercised against Boffolo seems to me to have been clearly within the constitution. But there arises another question: Was the constitution in vigor at the time? It was, but with certain restrictions rendered necessary by the reestablishment of public order. And the expulsion of a foreigner who was disturbing this work seems to me to be within these restrictions.

It is to be noted that if it be true that foreigners enjoy the same civil rights as the natives, this refers solely to those foreigners who are domiciled. (See art. 12 of the constitution of 1893.)

The proceedings employed in the expulsion appear to me fully justified, though the claimant has presented us with his version of the case. But supposing that what he says is true, it is in no wise different from that followed by European nations generally.

With regard to the amount claimed, this seems to me to be ridiculous; and as is seen in the record, and as has been fully established by the Commission, this man had nothing, and his mode of living was not of a good character.

AGNOLI, Commissioner:

The Commissioner for Italy deems it neither necessary nor useful to dwell upon the arguments used by his learned colleague of Venezuela to prove that the Republic has the right to expel from Venezuelan territory foreigners not domiciled in the country and who are prejudicial to public order. It is not desired to contest this right nor that of Venezuela to arrest and condemn an Italian, if only the arrest and condemnation be justified, and with the reservation of the right to claim and exact reparation in each case of an abuse of these rights. An equal right is accorded to Venezuela by Italy.

The question turns upon another point. Let us consider whether the act of expulsion (which is at times legal) was justified in the case of Boffolo. Doctor Zuloaga has quoted from the constitution of 1893 and the decree of February 14, 1873 (which he should not have done in view of the provisions of article II of the protocol of May 7, 1903, which imposes in a precise and peremptory manner upon the Commission the duty of deciding claims according to the principles of equity and without regard to the provisions of local legislation), and after having recalled that said constitution authorizes the expulsion of foreigners not domiciled, and informed us that a domicile is only to be acquired by a two years' residence and establishment in business, now asserts that neither of these conditions had been complied with in the case of the claimant—an assertion believed by the writer to be purely gratuitous.

As a matter of fact, the legation has produced the testimony of three well-known persons, from which it appears that Boffolo established himself in Caracas in 1898. On the other hand, it is of record that he was expelled in April, 1900. Now, unless Doctor Zuloaga prove that Boffolo arrived here subsequent to April, 1898, his statement that the claimant had not had two years' residence in the country at the time of his expulsion must be held to be unfounded, and in all cases of doubt the decision should be in favor of the claimant.

The assertion that the claimant was not actually in business appears likewise unfounded. It is shown by documents submitted to the Commission that he was the depositary of a stock of goods belonging to merchants established here, the Messrs. J. Roversi and V. Alberti, and that said goods were opened to the public under the name of Commercial Sample House, the claimant thus acting as middleman between producers or importers and consumers for the goods thus intrusted to him. If for the lack of means he was not able to do business on his own account (and it is known he was in very modest circumstances), he can not therefore be excluded from consideration as a merchant.

He was, in addition, proprietor and director of a periodical appropriately called "Il Commercio." He had taken a house under a three years' lease, and was occupying part of it as a dwelling and storeroom, besides subrenting the remainder. It is stated, and from a letter of the brother of the claimant included in the record of the case it appears, that some rooms had been occupied by improper characters, and from this unsupported circumstance the Venezuelan Commissioner has forged a weapon against the absent claimant and paints him to the Commission as a man of evil life and fame. These unfavorable aspects are not established by the evidence, but, assuming that they were, the mere fact of his having rented rooms to fast women can hardly be urged as reason for expulsion.

The claimant was not and never had been a go-between; and even if he had been, which the testimony clearly disproves, he would not have thereby become "prejudicial to public order," the condition required by the constitution to justify expulsion.

Further, the declaration of the brother of the claimant, by a principle of fundamental law, may not be taken in part, and, taken as a whole, it shows the animus of the expulsion, for by it we learn that the claimant had demanded payment of rent legitimately due him from a woman who was known to everyone as the favorite of ——. Now, if the Commissioner for Venezuela desires to avail himself of the above statement, he must take it in its entirety.

The Commissioner for Italy can not, however, admit that the claimant was expelled because of his alleged immoral conduct. It is clear that the expulsion was decreed because of the denunciation of an official whose name has not and will not come to light, or, by a still more probable hypothesis, considering the dates of the 1st and 4th of April, 1900; was caused by the publication of an article in No. 49 of the periodical above mentioned, in which was a somewhat severe criticism of the action of a Caracas magistrate, with an entirely incidental allusion to the President of the Republic, and wholly free from a political or disturbing character. In either case the measure adopted was unjustifiable.

Free expression of thought, either in print or in speech, is guaranteed in Venezuela to both natives and foreigners; to Italians in particular, on account of the treaty in force. In case of calumny or abuse the guilty person may be proceeded against and condemned, but in no case imprisoned without sentence of the proper tribunal, much less expelled.

The article published by Boffolo does not certainly constitute an infringement of public or private right, and he was not placed on trial therefor. Even less could it be considered as subversive of or prejudicial to public order, justifying expulsion. The claimant had neither social prestige nor political following sufficient to give him a character dangerous to the peace of the Government. He was but an humble citizen, who concerned himself in no wise with local politics.

The writer has already called the attention of the Commissioner for Venezuela to the fact that, according to the opinion prevalent among writers of international law, governments are held to furnish to legations representing the nations to whom the expelled belong the reasons for such expulsion, which was not done by Venezuela in the case of Boffolo, though requested to do so. Had these been satisfactory and of a character to establish that the claimant had engaged in political controversy against constituted authority, the representative of the royal Government would have been satisfied, and there would to-day be one claim the less. The Government had therefore not only the legal obligation but also the duty imposed by international courtesy to declare the reasons for the sudden and violent expulsion of the claimant. If it did not do so, we are justified in believing that such reasons did not exist.

In view of all the foregoing, there seems to be ample reason for the umpire to award with entire conscientiousness to the claimant the modest indemnity of 5,000 bolivars, as requested by the Commissioner for Italy, but before concluding this statement he desires to call the attention of the umpire to another circumstance, which is that though the claim of Boffolo has been pending before the Commission two weeks, during which time the subject has been more than once called up, the Venezuelan Government has not so far produced anything justifying the damaging and arbitrary course it pursued in regard to the claimant.

The voluntary and prompt exhibition of such proofs as the Commission would consider indisputable would seem to be due from the Republic, on the hardly acceptable supposition that such existed. Should they hereafter be produced, the writer reserves the right to examine and estimate them, as, coming so late, he can hardly anticipate them.

In any case he must hold that neither the umpire nor the Commissioner for Venezuela could attach much importance to them in the event of their not resulting from documents bearing a date anterior to that of the expulsion, and that Doctor Zuloaga would regard proof collected within the last few days with the same measure of distrust with which he has received evidence submitted by Italians in support of their contentions, and with the intention of combating claims against Venezuela which the Venezuelan Government, through its plenipotentiary at Washington, Mr. Bowen, had, for some unknown reason, considered just.

RALSTON, Umpire:

The above case has been referred to the umpire on disagreement between the honorable Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela.

It appears that Gennaro Boffolo, an Italian subject, reached Venezuela in June, 1898, and in the spring of 1900 was a householder in Caracas and the publisher of an Italian weekly newspaper entitled "Il Commercio Italo-Venezuelano." In the issue of April 1, 1900, appeared an article somewhat critical of the local minor judiciary, and also referring, but in an unimportant manner, to the President. Another article recommended the reading of El Obrero, a socialistic paper. Three days later (April 4) the Gaceta Oficial contained a decree directing Boffolo's expulsion, in the following terms:

Considerando: Que de las averiguaciones practicadas por las autoridades respectivas del Distrito Federal, aparece formalmente que el súbdito italiano Gennaro Boffolo, es á todas luces, perjudicial á los intereses nacionales, decreta:

ART. 1º. El súbdito italiano de nombre Gennaro Boffolo será expulsado del territorio venezolano, embarcándose en el puerto de La Guaira en el término de la distancia.

ART. 2º. El ministro de relaciones interiores queda encargado de la ejecución del presente decreto.

Immediately thereafter, or perhaps simultaneously, Boffolo was, as it is said, "summarily" arrested, transported by third-class ticket to Curaçoa, but, through the intervention of the royal Italian legation, allowed to return about a month later.

It is further said, but no proof is offered, that during his absence his house was invaded and plundered, and articles taken belonging to others, the value of which he was compelled to reimburse, and that the claimant was subjected to police persecution, threatened with another arrest, and finally left Venezuela.

That a general power to expel foreigners, at least for cause, exists in governments can not be doubted.<sup>a</sup> (See Hollander case in U. S. Foreign Relations for 1895, p. 775, and also see p. 801, same volume, citations to be found in sec. 206, vol. 2, Wharton's International Law Digest, and other citations hereinafter given.)

But it will be borne in mind that there may be a broad difference between the right to exercise a power and the rightful exercise of that power. Let us illustrate. In the Hollander case (cited above) the Government of Guatemala contended:

The Government was not under obligation to allow him more or less time to get out of the country, nor to accommodate him in any way. All the practices of jurisprudence, supposing them to be certain and indisputable, fall down before a law clear that comes immediately from the sovereignty of a nation.

To this Secretary Olney very forcibly replied:

The logical result of that proposition is, that whatever a state by legal formula wills to do, it may do; and that international obligations are annulled, not infringed, by legalized administrative action in contravention of those obligations. * * * I construe the language used to mean that, as a rule of international law, the right of expulsion is absolute and inherent in the sovereignty of a State, and that no other State can question the exercise of this right nor the manner of exercising it. * * * The modern theory and the practice of Christian nations is believed to be founded on the principle that the expulsion of a foreigner is justifiable only when his presence is detrimental to the welfare of the State, and that when expulsion is resorted to as an extreme police measure, it is to be accomplished with due regard to the convenience and the personal and property interests of the person expelled.

We may cite Rolin-Jaequemyns, who reported on the subject to the Institute of International Law in 1888 (Revue de Droit International, Vol. XX, p. 498), and after admitting the right of expulsion said:

* * * En sa qualité d'être humain il a le droit de ne pas être l'objet de rigueurs inutiles et de ne pas être injustement lésé dans ses intérêts. En sa qualité de citoyen d'un autre État il peut réclamer contre ces rigueurs ou ces spoliations la protection de son souverain. * * *

* * * Il est dès lors légitime que l'État auquel appartient l'expulsé soit recevable à demander communication du motif spécial de l'expulsion, et cette communication ne peut lui être refusée.

L'acte même de l'expulsion doit d'ailleurs être restreint à son objet direct, essentiel, qui est de débarrasser le sol national d'un hôte nuisible. Le droit de souveraineté nationale n'exige ni ne permet davantage. * * * Mais cette contrainte ne devra pas prendre un caractère gratuitement vexatoire.

He continues:

5° Même en l'absence de traités, l'État auquel appartient l'expulsé a le droit de demander à connaître les motifs de l'expulsion, et la communication de ces motifs ne peut lui être refusée.

In one of the latest works discussing the subject, "Protection des Nationaux Résidant à l'Étranger" (p. 450), M. Tchernoff shows himself so little friendly to the right of expulsion that he remarks:

Peu de personnes de nos jours soutiennent que le droit d'expulser les étrangers soit une attribution normale de l'État exerçant sa fonction civilisatrice.

Calvo (Dictionnaire du Droit International), title, "Expulsion," says:

But when a government expels a foreigner without cause and in a harsh, inconsiderate manner (avec des formes blessantes), the State of which the foreigner is a citizen has a right to base a claim upon this violation of international law and to demand adequate satisfaction.

See also Bluntschli, Droit International Codifié:

ART. 383. Chaque État est autorisé à expulser pour motifs d'ordre public les étrangers qui résident temporairement sur son territoire. S'ils y ont établi un domicile fixe, ils ont le droit à la protection des lois au même titre que les nationaux.

1. Le droit d'expulser les étrangers n'est pas un droit absolu de l'État; l'admettre serait de nouveau porter atteinte au principe de la liberté des relations internationales. L'État n'est le maître absolu ni du territoire ni des habitants du pays. L'ancienne théorie se fondait sur le principe du moyen âge que l'État est propriétaire du territoire, en avait abusivement déduit l'idée de la souveraineté illimitée de l'État. On reconnaît cependant presque partout à l'État la faculté d'expulser les étrangers par simple mesure administrative et sans que les personnes atteintes par cette mesure puissent recourir aux tribunaux.

ART. 384. Lorsqu'un gouvernement interdit sans motif l'entrée du territoire à un étranger dûment légitimé, ou l'expulse sans cause et avec des formes blessantes, l'État dont cet étranger est citoyen a le droit de réclamer contre cette violation du droit international, et de demander au besoin satisfaction.

1. L'État peut aussi être atteint dans la personne des ressortissants qu'il a mission de protéger. L'expulsion arbitraire peut amener des représentations diplomatiques; la partie lésée a toujours le droit de demander aide et protection à son consul ou de provoquer l'intervention de l'envoyé de son pays.

In the recent Ben Tillet affair between England and Belgium, the arbitrator, M. Arthur Desjardins, of France, in his sentence examined thoroughly the reasons for the expulsion of Tillet (as we shall do hereafter in this case), and also as to the treatment accorded him in connection therewith, and maintained the right of Belgium to expel under the circumstances, and, as well, justified the manner in which Tillet was treated by Belgium. (Journal du Droit International Privé, Vol. 26 (1899), p. 203.)

Hall says (International Law, p. 224):

In such cases (expulsion of individual foreigners residing in a state) the propriety of the conduct of the expelling government must be judged with reference to the circumstances of the moment.

Says Professor von Bar (Journ. Droit Intern. Privé, Vol. XIII, p. 6):

La conscience juridique universelle proteste contre l'usage arbitraire du droit d'expulsion. * * *

Il nous paraît que l'État qui ouvre libéralement aux étrangers l'accès de son territoire ne doit pas pouvoir leur retirer à son gré le droit de séjour. (1) En ce sens Heffter, Voelkerrecht, sec. 62: "Aucun État ne peut écarter de son sol les ressortissants d'un autre État, dont la nationalité est dûment constatée, ni les expulser après leur avoir fait accueil, sans avoir pour le faire de bonnes raisons, qu'il est tenu de communiquer au gouvernement dont ils relèvent." * * *

Dans tous les cas il est d'une nécessité indispensable d'apporter aux mesures de rigueurs qui peuvent être prises contre les étrangers un double tempérament. L'un est de pure forme: L'État qui recourt à l'expulsion doit invoquer des motifs de nature à la justifier. L'autre touche au fond: L'expulsion doit être conforme aux traditions et aux principes du droit des gens. * * *

Une peine insignifiante prononcée contre l'étranger à raison d'une injure, d'une contravention de police, ne suffirait pas à justifier une mesure d'exclusion. Pour que l'infraction qu'il a commise puisse entraîner son expulsion, il faut qu'elle soit telle que, dans l'hypothèse où elle aurait été consommée sur le territoire, elle eût exposé le coupable à une perte assez longue de sa liberté, et à la privation au moins temporaire de certains droits. * * *

Encore faudrait-il, de toute façon, pour que ce fait puisse donner lieu à une expulsion, qu'il soit prouvé, ou tout au moins rendu vraisemblable au plus haut degré, qu'il contient les éléments d'une violation grave et réelle de la loi, ou bien d'une tentative pour la commettre, ou encore d'un acte condamnable, appliqué à sa préparation. * * *

Bluntschli pose en principe, dans son § 384, que l'expulsion arbitraire et non-motivée d'un étranger peut être le point de départ de réclamations diplomatiques de la part de l'Etat dont il est le national. Ce point est au-dessus de toute controverse. * * *

Woolsey says (International Law, sec. 63, p. 85):

6. No state in peace can exclude the properly documented subjects of another friendly state, or send them away after they have been once admitted, without definite reasons, which must be submitted to the foreign government concerned.

In the opinion of the umpire it may be fairly deduced from the foregoing that—

1. A state possesses the general right of expulsion; but

2. Expulsion should only be resorted to in extreme instances and must be accomplished in the manner least injurious to the person affected.

Must explanation of reasons and justification of conduct be made to an arbitral tribunal when the occasion arises? The question is answered in Moore's Digest.

Orazio de Attellis, a naturalized American citizen, entered Mexico in 1833, and on June 24, 1835, the President issued an order for his expulsion on the ground that he had—occupied himself again (he had been expelled before becoming an American citizen) in the publication of a periodical in which some productions appear which tend to ridicule the nation and to plunge it into anarchy.

What the productions were and what was their offensive feature was not disclosed. The claimant was so expelled under circumstances of especial hardship. The American Commissioners contended that the expulsion was causeless, inspired by enmity, in violation of rights secured to inhabitants of the Republic by the constitution and contrary to treaty relations.

The umpire (p. 3334) gave judgment in favor of the claimant.

In the case of Zerman v. Mexico, before the American and Mexican Commission of 1868, Sir Edward Thornton (p. 3348) said:

The umpire is of opinion that, strictly speaking, the President of the Republic of Mexico had the right to expel a foreigner from its territory who might be considered dangerous, and that during war or disturbances it may be necessary to exercise this right even upon bare suspicion; but in the present instance there was no war, and reasons of safety could not be put forward as a ground for the expulsion of the claimant without charges preferred against him or trial; but if the Mexican Government had grounds for such expulsion it was at least under the obligation of proving charges before this Commission. Its mere assertion, however, or that of the United States consul, in a dispatch to his Government, that the claimant was employed by the imperialist authorities, does not appear to the umpire to be sufficient proof that he was so employed or sufficient ground for his expulsion.

The umpire awarded the claimant $1,000.

It appears, therefore, that the Commission may inquire into the reasons and circumstances of the expulsion.

Let us apply the principles above laid down to the case before us.

Boffolo was expelled, as the claimant Government contends (and nothing else is before the Commission), because he published a certain article supposed to reflect upon the local judiciary and referring in some purely incidental way to the President, and, as stated, recommended a socialistic paper. It is not the province of the umpire to pass upon Boffolo's taste or justice in so doing. He is, however, obliged to examine somewhat, first, as to whether in so doing he offended the laws of Venezuela, and second, whether under the laws the expulsion was permissible.

Sometime previous to the expulsion, and on the 31st day of October, 1899, the present President assumed the executive power, issuing the following proclamation:

Considerando: Que por virtud de los acontecimientos que han determinado el triunfo de la Revolución Liberal Restauradora, la situación política que ha surgido en la República es extraordinaria y de un carácter provisional;

Que mientras se llega á la reconstitución normal del país es indispensable establecer un régimen que, aunque transitorio, asegure y proteja los derechos y intereses políticos y sociales de la ciudadanía, Decreto:

ARTÍCULO 1°. Se declaran vigentes en todo el territorio de la República todos derechos, garantías, y prerrogativas que la Constitución Nacional de 1893 reconoce y otorga á los venezolanos.

ART. 2°. Se declaran igualmente en vigencia á las demás disposiciones de la expresada Constitución en cuanto no se opongan á los fines de la Revolución Liberal Restauradora y sean compatibles con la naturaleza del Gobierno que de ella ha surgido.

ART. 3°. Regirán en los Estados de la Unión y en el Distrito Federal todos los códigos y demás leyes nacionales de carácter general ó especial, y todas las leyes orgánicas que venían observándose en los diversos y distintos ramos y esferas de la administración pública.

ART. 4°. Los Presidentes Provisionales de los Estados y todos las demás autoridades de la República cumplirán y harán cumplir este Decreto en la parte que les concierna y en el radio de sus atribuciones.

ART. 5°. El Ministro de Relaciones Interiores queda encargado de la ejecución del presente decreto.

Let us see, now, what were the rights, guarantees, and prerogatives recognized and guaranteed by the constitution of 1893.

TÍTULO IV.—Derechos de los Venezolanos.

ART. 14. La Nación garantiza á los venezolanos la efectividad de los siguientes derechos:

5°. La libertad personal, y por ella: * * *

* * * 4°. Todos con el derecho de hacer ó ejecutar lo que no perjudique á otro.
6°. La libre expresión del pensamiento de palabra ó por medio de la prensa. En los casos de calumnía ó injuria, quedan al agraviado expeditas sus acciones para deducirlas ante los tribunales de justicia competentes, conforme á las leyes comunes; pero el inculpado no podrá ser detenido ó preso, en ningún caso, sino después de dictada por el Tribunal competente la sentencia ejecutoria que lo condene.

7°. La libertad de transitar sin pasaporte en tiempo de paz, mudar de domicilio, observando para ello las formalidades legales, y ausentarse de la República, y volver á ella llevando y trayendo sus bienes.

14°. La seguridad individual, y por ella: * * *

* * * 4°. Ni ser preso ó arrestado sin que preceda información sumaria de haber cometido delito que merezca pena corporal, y orden escrita del funcionario que decreta la prisión, con expresión del motivo que la cause, á menos que sea cogido infraganti; no pudiendo fuera de este caso ordenarse la prisión sino por autoridad judicial, ni los arrestos por la policía pasar de tres días, después de los cuales el arrestado debe ser puesto en libertad ó entregado al juez competente. * * *

* * * 10°. Ni ser privado de su libertad, por causas políticas, sin previa información sumaria, de la cual resulte comprometido en perturbaciones del orden público y sirviendo de obstáculo á su restablecimiento.

Furthermore the constitution provided (Art. 13):

Los extranjeros gozan de todos los derechos civiles de que gozan los nacionales.

In addition to the extracts above given, the excellent and enlightened constitution of 1893 provided:

ART. 23. La definición de atribuciones y facultades señala los límites del Poder Público; todo lo que extralimite esta definición constituye una usurpación de atribuciones.

One is pleased to note from the foregoing that even in time of storm and stress Venezuela recognized that those subject to her jurisdiction were entitled to enjoy freedom of speech and of the press (subject only to trial for abuse thereof before competent tribunals, pursuant to the common laws, with personal freedom until after the sentence), freedom of transit and change of domicile, freedom from arrest (unless pursuant to written warrant, save when taken in flagranti, and except in such case not to be imprisoned unless by judicial authority), not to be deprived of liberty for political reasons, save for disturbing acts, etc.

As appears from a citation already made, the powers of the officers of Government were not autocratic, but Venezuela was a country of laws, governed even in April, 1900, by officials of limited powers; for if their powers were not limited the personal guarantees of the constitution would have been inefficacious—an impossible conclusion, as they were expressly recognized by the proclamation of General Castro.

Let us therefore see what law governed the matter of expulsion, for if none existed the power to expel was wanting. Another conclusion would make Venezuela's Government despotic—not republican or democratic.

The only provisions of law covering the right of expulsion either of natives or of foreigners were in articles 77 and 78 of the constitution of 1893, and read as follows:

ART. 77. Además de las atribuciones anteriores, que son privativas del Presidente de los Estados Unidos de Venezuela, éste, con el voto consultivo del Consejo del Gobierno, ejercerá también las siguientes:

9a. * * *

3°. Arrestar ó expulsar á los individuos de la nación con la cual se está en guerra y que sean contrarios á la defensa del país.

ART. 78. * * *

4a. Prohibir la entrada en territorio nacional, ó expulsar de él, á los extranjeros que no tengan su domicilio en el país y que sean notoriamente perjudiciales al orden público.

According, therefore, to the constitution of Venezuela, only as the nondomiciled foreigner might be shown to be prejudicial to public order would he be expelled. Let us pass over the fact that the Boffolo decree of expulsion declared that his presence was prejudicial to "national interests" and not to the "public order," as limited by the constitution, and see if such cause has been presented to this Commission as would justify the expulsion.

It is suggested that the expulsion may have taken place because of any one of three reasons:

1. That he spoke disrespectfully of the President.
2. That he criticized a subordinate member of the judiciary.
3. That he recommended the reading of "El Obrero," a socialistic paper.

The effective answer to all of these propositions is that freedom of speech and of the press are guaranteed by the constitution of Venezuela, and an expulsion for either one would have been an infringement of the constitution of Venezuela, and this is not to be presumed the President would have done. The umpire is more disposed to believe that for public reasons satisfactory to itself the Government has chosen not to offer the basis of its action, rather preferring to submit to such judgment as to this Commission might seem meet in the case.

The further suggestion is made that Boffolo, being a foreigner, did not possess the right to criticize the Government to the same extent as Venezuelans, while the Government possessed a larger power over him. To this may be replied that the constitution of Venezuela conferred upon foreigners the same rights as were assured to natives, and for the supposed offenses not the slightest punishment could have been inflicted upon Venezuelans.

Summing up the foregoing, we may (in part repeating) say:

1. A State possesses the general right of expulsion; but,
2. Expulsion should only be resorted to in extreme instances, and must be accomplished in the manner least injurious to the person affected.
3. The country exercising the power must, when occasion demands, state the reason of such expulsion before an international tribunal, and an inefficient reason or none being advanced, accepts the consequences.
4. In the present case the only reasons suggested to the Commission would be contrary to the Venezuelan constitution, and as this is a country not of despotic power, but of fixed laws, restraining, among other things, the acts of its officials, these reasons (whatever good ones may in point of fact have existed) can not be accepted by the umpire as sufficient.

In view of the foregoing it only remains to consider the amount of damages to be awarded. The honorable representative of Italy has indicated that he would be content to accept 5,000 bolivars, and considering the harshness of expulsion as a remedy, the fact that only great provocation will, in the eyes of international law, justify its exercise, and the further fact that expulsion of foreigners so readily leads the way to the gravest international difficulties, as it may be regarded as a national affront, the amount asked seems not intrinsically unreasonable. But bearing in mind the low character of the man in question (as developed before the Commission), and that his speedy return was permitted, the umpire believes his full duty will be discharged in allowing him 2,000 bolivars, and an award of this amount will be entered.

For convenience the umpire subjoins a careful translation of the articles in Il Commercio herein referred to.

FOR JUSTICE.

[Translation—Article taken from Il Commercio of April 1, 1900.]

To His Excellency the ITALIAN MINISTER.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: I do not understand the Venezuelan code of procedure, much less its application; but the fact to which this article relates is so abnormal, so outside the severest penal code, that as a journalist speaking for the bulk of his readers, I am driven to the onerous necessity of praying your excellency to interpose your authority to the end that what is now obscure may be made plain.

I refer, your excellency, to the prolonged imprisonment of my countryman, Mr. Malenchini.

It is now nearly three months that the above-named has been immured in a foul prison for having struck Mr. Pecchio with a walking stick. Mr. Pecchio was not in the least injured by the blow, no physician was called to his aid, and he suffered no interruption whatever in the transaction of his business.

It is said there was a quarrel between the two men on account of an alleged attempt at homicide, Malenchini having been armed with a revolver. According to the logic of the accusation, whoever carries a revolver for self-defense is held to be guilty of attempted homicide. If such were to be the rule, not a few, commencing with the President himself, would be in quod.

It may be said that Malenchini was ready to use the weapon and would have done so had he not been arrested. Such is not the case. He carried it solely as a means of defense and had he intended using it he would not have availed himself of his cane, least of all in a place so crowded as the Plaza Bolivar, where the slightest disturbance would surely be followed by an arrest.

That an assault with a cane deserves punishment is conceded without question, but it should be of a proper kind, and not that imposed by the humor of an overzealous advocate who had exaggerated the facts in the case.

Malenchini was interrogated by the judge, and three weeks ago he was tried, and a sentence should have been given in three days. A sentence was finally pronounced, but what a sentence! Based on a nullity! Malenchini was condemned for injury to the person, but that there really was such the sentence alone declares, for there is not the vestige of proof. And as if this were not sufficient, the ten days of his sentence expired on Saturday, the 24th, but he still lingers in jail.

As your excellency may see, there is something strange and mysterious in the case of Malenchini. Your excellency alone has the power and authority to have this mystery unveiled. You alone can see to it that justice be not a vain word for Malenchini, who is lying in a dungeon because he is powerless and without defense.

I and my countrymen trust that this unfortunate incident, as truly dangerous to our nationality as to humanity, will soon be cleared up.

Believe me, sir, with profound respect, your most devoted,

G. BOFFOLO.

P. S.—On the afternoon of Thursday, after the above was already in type, Mr. Malenchini was provisionally released on the payment of a certain sum by his father, who had arrived in aid of his son. But why provisionally? Another mystery.

EL OBRERO.

We have before us the first number of the periodical El Obrero. The title clearly indicates the purpose for which our new confrère has entered the lists. Every workman should read it, and support its publication, as it is the first sheet devoted to the workingman's cause. Il Commercio wishes a long and prosperous life to the new venture.

CASE OF MASSARDO, CARBONE & Co.

(By the Umpire:)

The Italian protocol providing only for payment of a definite sum for "claims of the first rank derived from the revolutions 1898-1900," and the sums so paid being for certain named claims, jurisdiction will be taken over others of the same period. Case retained for proof of Italian citizenship of those claiming interest in a succession.

AGNOLI, Commissioner (claim referred to umpire):

The Commissioner for Venezuela contends that the above-mentioned claim should be denied, he interpreting Article III of the Washington protocol of February 13, 1903, in the sense that the Italian Government accepted the sum of 2,810,255 bolivars in complete satisfaction of all indemnities due for acts of the revolution and all other acts from 1898 to 1900, and in support of his opinion invokes, besides the provisions of the article above mentioned, the contents of a note directed by the Royal Italian legation at Caracas to the Venezuelan minister of foreign affairs of December 11, 1902, No. 532.

As regards the protocol, it is to be observed that various arguments may be drawn therefrom to refute the interpretation of the Venezuelan Commissioner. As a matter of fact, Article III speaks of claims of the first rank, arising from the revolution 1898–1900. Now, one rank of claims can not logically be qualified as of the first rank if it is not in correlation with another rank or with other ranks of claims. If it had not been intended to implicitly recognize the existence of other demands for indemnity relative to the period 1898–1900, as coming under the Mixed Commission, it would not be possible to read in Article III the words “of the first rank,” which establish a clear distinction between claims already examined and settled in the Royal Italian legation in the sum of 2,810,255 bolivars, and another class of claims not submitted, not adjudicated, and not presented to the Venezuelan Government by the legation itself. If the interpretation of Doctor Zuloaga were correct, the article in question would speak in general terms of Italian claims arising from the revolutions of 1898–1900, and would not make any discrimination whatever.

The same distinction appears in Article III in the establishment of the principle that the claims already adjudicated by the legation shall not be reviewed by the Mixed Commission. This exception is, in fact, not formulated for all the claims of the period 1898–1900, but only for those of the first rank.

Article IV, in clear and explicit language, offers another argument in support of this said claimant. It states that “all other Italian claims without exception,” outside of those considered by Article VIII of the protocol “shall be decided by the Commission.”

Why, on the occasion in which the plenipotentiaries made an exception relative to the bearers of titles of the foreign debt of Venezuela, did they not also make an exception relative to the claims of the period of 1898–1900 not comprised in the sum of 2,810,255 bolivars, but stated instead that all the others outside of those already settled would be examined and settled? The reason is clear. It is because it was never thought to make the exception now presented by the Venezuelan Commissioner.

But is it admissible that the Italian Government should have wished to bar the way in support of a claim as just as the one in question against which, neither in equity nor from any technical point of view whatsoever, is it possible to raise an objection?

Besides, the Venezuelan Government has never yet pretended that there shall not be settled other claims of the period of 1898–1900 than those of the first rank.

In support of this my assertion I cite the case of Oliva Bisagno, to whom the Government itself has but lately offered the sum of 250,000 bolivars as an indemnity for damages suffered by her in the period 1898–1900.

It would seem to me that the Venezuelan Commissioner should insist on placing a more restrictive construction on the protocol than has been given by the Venezuelan Government.

But let us come to note 532 of the legation, the scope of which was a peremptory demand for the payment of 2,810,255 bolivars, amount of Italian claims of the period 1898–1900, examined and found valid by the legation. Nothing whatever is said of the claims of that period not yet examined by the legation and judged valid, for which diplomatic action remained open and undecided.

Further, the Italian minister says in said note that the Italian Government makes an express reservation of all claims which were or might be presented by Italian subjects subsequently to the period mentioned, as well for damages arising from the civil war commenced in 1901 as for any others against the Venezuelan Government, and requests that the Government of Venezuela be pleased to declare itself disposed to apply to the settlement of such claims such provisions as shall eliminate ulterior discussions, accepting the decisions of a mixed commission.

Aside from the fact that every exception contained in said note should be held as having been incidental and not direct, and that the protocol of February 13, 1903, has established principles which, even if they were (as they are not) contrary to those enunciated in the note mentioned, should serve as the only and absolute rule of the Mixed Commission, it is well to observe that the Italian minister declared in the above-mentioned document that the Italian Government made express exception not alone of the claims arising from acts posterior to the period of 1898-1900, but of all claims presented subsequent to said period, making special mention of those occasioned by the war initiated in 1901, and of those based on whatsoever other title of credit or action against the Government of the Republic.

There is no indication of a restriction as to time relative to this second rank of claims, which includes all those not already settled, and this is the reason why the Italian minister did not deem it necessary to make a specific exception for the claims of 1898-1900 not already liquidated by the legation, and not therefore comprised in those of the first rank. Let it be thoroughly understood that between want of an express exception of any given category of claims and the abandonment of the right to support them there is an absolute and fundamental difference. A relinquishment can never be presumed, but must be tacitly enunciated.

Taking these principles in concordance with the clauses of the protocol, the Commissioner for Italy is of opinion that the claim presented by Mrs. Ernesta Raffo, widow Massardo, through the receiver of the firm of Massardo, Carbone & Co., should be accepted, and an award made to the claimants of the full sum of 18,212 bolivars, plus the interest.

ZULOAGA, Commissioner:

This claim is of March, 1898, and, by virtue of article III of the Washington protocol, claims arising during the period from 1898 to 1900 from acts of the revolution of said period were paid the Italian Government out of the sum of 2,810,255 bolivars. No claims for damages within said period can therefore, in my opinion, be presented. The Italian Government decided for itself as to the class of claims coming within this period and paid those accepted by it in the manner stated.

This interpretation of the protocol seems to be amply confirmed by the note of the Italian minister of October 11, 1902, published in the volume of Asuntos Internacionales, page 102,<sup>a</sup> in which it is stated that the Royal Government has expressly excepted the claims which were or might be submitted by Italian subjects subsequent to said period, as well for damages arising from the civil war of 1901 as for whatever other title of credit or action against the Government of the Republic.

This latter class doubtless has no reference to damages.

Articles II and III of the German protocol likewise exclude claims for this period. Resting on the above reasons, I reject the claim of Massardo, Carbone & Co.

RALSTON, Umpire:

The foregoing case has been presented to the umpire, the honorable Commissioner for Italy in his opinion favoring an award for the full amount, and the honorable Commissioner for Venezuela opposing on the ground that the claim originated in the month of March, 1898, and grew out of the revolution commencing in that year, while all claims for the wars of 1898–1900 were settled by the acceptance, by Italy, of the sum of 2,810,255 bolivars. He further insists that the note of the minister for Italy of December 11, 1902 (Asuntos Internacionales, p. 102<sup>a</sup>), made no express reserve covering a case for damages occurring during the period mentioned.

Returning to the protocol, we find that the amount above named was given for "Italian claims of the first rank derived from the revolutions 1898–1900." By reference to the above-mentioned book, page 96, it will be found that this sum was allowed for 123 individual claims which had been appraised by the Italian legation.

The question presented, therefore, is whether, assuming that no express reserve of other claims arising out of the wars of 1898–1900 was made by the Italian legation, such claims should now be recognized.

The protocol does not in terms exclude any class of Italian claims from consideration. The amount paid by Venezuela to Italy for claims was not to extinguish, generally, claims arising from the wars in question, but only to settle certain claims which had been previously enumerated.

The umpire can not imagine that when the protocol was signed there was any intention on the part of Italy to abandon without consideration and without apparent reason other claims of equal equity not theretofore presented. Had the sum paid been designed to extinguish all claims, the situation would have been different.

It is true that the reserves made by the Italian minister may have been vague; but the protocol subsequently passing on the whole matter, and no claims except those of the first rank being reserved from the consideration of this Commission, the umpire believes it to be the duty of the Commission to take jurisdiction over and grant judgment in all other cases originating at least before the date of the protocol where the evidence and the rules of international law justify such action. The umpire reserves consideration of the possible effect upon claims of an earlier date of any prior settlements and treaties not brought to his notice and therefore not now discussed.

The foregoing, however, does not completely dispose of the case. The claim is made in the name of Ernesta Raffo, widow of Massardo. The property taken appears to have belonged to the firm of Massardo, Carbone & Co., whose liquidator is Luigi Carbone, a member of the firm. It does not appear how many members of the firm there were, or what were the interests of each. Neither does it appear that the widow is the sole heir of Massardo, the former apparent member of the firm. If it is designed to claim the interest of the widow alone, her inheritance from the husband should appear and also the proportionate size of his interest in the firm. If it is designed to claim for the entire partnership, the names of all should be given, together with the appropriate proofs of citizenship, for only Italian subjects may have any interest in any claim passed on by this Commission.<sup>a</sup>

The umpire will not now, therefore, finally pass upon this claim, but will retain it until September 1, 1903, that the lacking elements of proof may be supplied or addition of parties may be made.

(The lacking proof being furnished, award for claimants was subsequently given.)

BRIGNONE CASE.

(By the Umpire:)

In the event of conflict of laws creating double citizenship, that of respondent nation must control.

In case of conflict of laws as to distribution of estate, the law of domicile of decedent, especially because of certain laws of Venezuela, must control the more, as otherwise laws of Italy would be given extraterritorial effect.<sup>b</sup>

AGNOLI, Commissioner (claim referred to umpire):

In the case of claim No. 60, presented in the name of the estate of Sebastiano Brignone, and after hearing the exceptions in the case taken by his honorable colleague of Venezuela, the Commissioner for Italy sustains the three following points:

1. Primarily, that the claim should be accepted in its integrity, without regard to the nationality of the heirs of the deceased.

2. Secondly, that the widow and children of Brignone being Italians, the amount of the claim should be awarded to them.

3. By a parity of reasoning, that the estate should certainly be liquidated according to the law of de cujus, and that therefore there should be awarded to the Italian relatives of the deceased residing in the Kingdom and claiming, with the widow, a share of the estate, two-thirds of the sum claimed, in conformity with the provisions of the Italian civil code in such case.

With regard to the first point, the claim is sustained by the royal Italian legation in its entirety, because the claim under consideration is essentially Italian.

To determine the nationality of a claim and the competency of the Commission there should be taken into account only the nationality of the claimant at the time of his suffering the damages, and not of the nationality of the persons in whose favor may redound the sum awarded.

By these principles were guided:

First. The French-American Mixed Commission under the convention of 1880. (See Moore, Int. Arb., pp. 2398-2400.)

Second. The court of arbitration of Geneva in the case of the Alabama, and the Alabama Claims Commission, organized under the act of June 23, 1874, for the adjudication of the Geneva award. (See Moore, Int. Arb., pp. 2360-2379.)

<sup>b</sup> The differences between the doctrines of France, Italy, and Belgium on the one hand and England, the United States, and Germany on the other relative to determination of status, family relations, and successions are extensively discussed by M. Henri Jacques, in 18 Revue de Droit International (1886), p. 563, entitled "La Loi du Domicile et la Loi de la Nationalité en Droit International Privé."

The judge who delivered the opinion based on the argument said, among other things:

It was a great principle for which our Government had contended from its origin—a principle identified with the freedom of the seas, viz, that the flag protected the ship and every person and thing thereon not contraband. * * *

Therefore * * * we decide that foreigners entitled to the protection of our flag in the premises, whether naturalized or not, have a right to share in the distribution of this fund. (Moore's Arbitrations, p. 2351.)

A fortiori, it should be admitted that claims originally owned at the time of the damage by Italians, ought to be entitled to indemnity. Moore, in the case of the Texan Star,<sup>a</sup> gives an even more conclusive example.

Third. We have, besides, among other more notable precedents, the arbitration of the Delagoa Bay Railway (Moore, 1865, et seq.), in which was sustained the right of an American citizen to be indemnified, even though his name did not directly appear in the company, which was English or Portuguese at the time of the presentation of the claim, and who was at the time merely a shareholder in a stock company. The acceptance of contrary principles would lead to most unjust consequences. In fact, let us suppose that Brignone had at his death left creditors in lieu of heirs, would it be equitable to reject the claim because some or all the creditors were not Italians? What, in fact, are heirs, if not creditors of the universitas juris formed of the sum of the property of the estate?

But if the equity of the principle advanced by my learned colleague be admitted, no Italian claim may be admitted without conclusive evidence that the Italian claimant is not indebted to Venezuelans, and has not ceded the sum which may be awarded him to creditors of a different nationality, and particularly Venezuelans. It has not yet occurred to anyone to demand such proof.

Let it be noted that such a cession may have been obtained forcibly by anyone, but more particularly by a merchant, as, for example, in the case of failure. But granting a voluntary cession, our principle—that of the original nationality of the claimant—should prevail, because we should not impede the freedom of anyone to dispose of his patrimony. How, then, can we sustain a contrary rule when cession occurs through the least voluntary of all acts—death?

The Mixed Commission is a tribunal sui generis, before which the Venezuelan Government is summoned. Before an ordinary tribunal might it perhaps be admitted that the local government, except against a foreign creditor, is not compelled to pay a portion of its proven indebtedness, because the sum claimed belongs, in part, to a Venezuelan? Surely not. Why, then, should such an exception be admitted by the Mixed Commission? Why endeavor, by a legal quibble, to evade the fulfillment of a moral and juridical obligation, and why resort to such an expedient before a tribunal of equity which not only can but must, according to the terms of the protocol by which it is governed, reject all technical objections?

It seems to me that the objection raised by my Venezuelan colleague does not agree with any concept of equity. As a matter of fact, he has taken no exception to the morality or foundation of the Brignone credit, and it is inconceivable that he should attempt to exonerate the Venezuelan Government from the payment of an amount which he impliedly recognizes as due by said Government. What is, therefore, the practical scope of Doctor Zuloaga's objection? Is it not true that the right to claim from the Venezuelan Government a part of the amount of the claim subsists in the widow Brignone, whatever her nationality?

She must run the same risks as the other heirs of the estate, for her interests therein are bound up with theirs and depend upon the same title. By the fact of her having presented to the Italian legation the documents in connection with her claim, and through said agency submitted it to the Mixed Commission, she acknowledges the competency of this tribunal and at the same time expresses her choice for the Italian nationality, should any doubt exist on that point. It will be noted that I attach considerable weight to this option, given the circumstance of a conflict between the two laws; but of this we will speak later.

Now, I ask, let us suppose that the sum claimed as indemnity was originally owed to a Venezuelan, and that his heirs were Italian; as a matter of fact, the legation would not support such a claim; but admitting that it presented it to the Commission, how would it be received by the Venezuelan Commissioner? He would most certainly reject it, objecting, with reason, that the claim was not originally Italian, and would, I am sure, advance still other sound reasons, as, for instance, that the cession by Venezuelans of their interests in a claim against the Republic to Italians, in order that these latter might make them the object of a claim before the Commission, could not be tolerated.

But why, on the other hand, given but not conceded that the widow Brignone is wholly Venezuelan, not apply a contrariis, the same rule? Why say, when the injured party is a Venezuelan and those to whom indemnity should be paid are foreigners, that indemnity can not be awarded because the claim is originally Venezuelan and therefore not to be considered, and when the injured party is Italian and the actual claimants Venezuelans the claim should likewise be rejected, because in this case the original nationality of the claim need not be taken into account? Where is the logic of such reasoning, and where the equity of such a principle? Two weights and two measures can not be admitted.

I will admit that when the cession of an interest forming the basis of a claim takes place, either in bad faith or without just cause, and with the manifest or concealed design of procuring the readiest means for obtaining indemnity, the Commission should not sanction such proceedings; but in the case of the widow Brignone, even though she were a Venezuelan, bad faith is absolutely excluded, and the presentation of the claim as a whole before the Commission is a natural condition of things, not created expressly for secondary ends.

Let us examine the question briefly from a purely juridical point of view. I have observed above that the estate is a universitas juris; now, for the same reason the charges against the same, as well as the debts of the deceased, should on principle be charged against all the heirs of the estate; so, also, when it is a question of recovering from the credits of the deceased and of his estate action should be brought in the name and interest of all.

It can not be admitted that a contrary rule should be followed when it is a question of fulfilling an obligation or enforcing a right, when the heirs find themselves, as in the Brignone case, in community, since the object of the successory rights of each of them is the estate taken in its entirety.

The heir in his quality of successor has the personal representation of the de cuius, and by virtue of these principles the claim in question (whatever be the nationality of the heirs) should be examined and judged by the Commission as an Italian interest, and as such is covered by the provisions of the protocols without any restrictions whatsoever, either expressed or implied, having been stipulated in regard thereto.

With reference to the second point: There is no doubt that the widow Brignone was born a Venezuelan; neither is there doubt that by her marriage with an Italian she became Italian. (Art. 19 of the Venezuelan Civil Code, and art. 9 of the Italian Civil Code.) The Italian Civil Code declares that the foreign woman who marries an Italian citizen acquires his nationality and retains it even in her widowhood, while according to the Venezuelan Code she is so only during the life of her husband; therefore, on the death of Brignone his widow found herself Italian by the Italian law, and Venezuelan by the Venezuelan law.

If in regard to this circumstance Italian tribunals should be called upon to decide there can be no doubt they would declare the widow Brignone to be an Italian, while the local tribunals would just as surely consider her a Venezuelan. Now, what should the decision of the Commission be on this point, given, but not conceded, that it has power to judge and determine the nationality of a claimant in whom the Royal Government, according to its laws and through its legation, has recognized as an Italian?

There is no doubt in my mind that the Commission should consider the widow Brignone as an Italian, and this for the following reasons:

1. The exception urged by the Commissioner for Venezuela rests on "provisions of local legislation," and should therefore a priori be rejected in obedience to Article II of the protocol of May 7, 1903.

2. The coexistence of two nationalities in the same individual not being theoretically admitted in international law, and (as I have more fully set forth in the claim of Giordana) the nationality of origin being in every way the one that should prevail, the widow Brignone should be considered an Italian. In fact, although the lady was born a Venezuelan, she by the terms of both laws became exclusively Italian on her marriage, and her nationality as a widow can not be other than the one she was peacefully enjoying on the date of her husband's decease, when without ceasing to be Italian she found herself invested with an additional nationality. The fact that this latter nationality is the same she had before her marriage does not affect the case, since the question arises at the moment of Brignone's death—that is to say, when to the Italian citizenship of the widow another was added.

3. Admitting that the juridically abnormal fact of the existence of two nationalities in the widow Brignone should be recognized, an international tribunal, such as this Commission, in whose decisions the circumstance of its sitting in Caracas can have no weight, since it might equally have been called to sit in Rome or Washington, or any other city, can not but take into account that the widow by the fact of having herself presented the claim to the royal legation in favor of the heirs of the deceased shows her preference for the Italian nationality, and unhesitatingly chooses it instead of the Venezuelan.

.The Commission, therefore, evidently should not impose on her a nationality she does not desire, and should respect her liberty of choice.

4. But admitting that in her case the Italian citizenship does not exclude the Venezuelan, no one surely would dare to affirm that the latter may on the contrary exclude the former. The claimant would at least be as much one as the other. Now, she is entitled to the full exercise of her rights as an Italian, and among these is that of claiming before this Commission, and by this means obtaining, the share to which she is entitled of the Brignone estate as one of the heirs out of any indemnity which may be awarded them either present or absent.

Article IV of the protocol of February 13 is clear and precise. It speaks of Italian claims without exception. To now except claims of persons to whom, though admitted to the enjoyment of another nationality, that of Italy may not be desired, is an infraction of the protocol itself, and is a restriction of its stipulated terms, which should have been done in Washington by the Venezuelan plenipotentiary, but which can not now be done, according to the dictates of common sense and the maxim laid down by Vattel (sec. 264, Bk. 2):

Si celui qui pouvait et devait s'expliquer nettement et pleinement ne l'a pas fait, tant pis pour lui. Il ne peut être reçu à apporter subséquemment des restrictions qu'il n'a pas exprimées.

I ask for no amplification of the protocol, and I hold to its letter "all Italian claims without exception," but I reject all exceptions and restrictions sought to be made in Caracás and which were not made in Washington.

With regard to the third point: If under a most extreme hypothesis, none of the arguments hitherto employed by me have succeeded in convincing the honorable umpire of the justice of my contention, I maintain that the Brignone estate should be liquidated according to the provisions of the Italian law, which says that when, as in the present case, referring to estates ab intestato, the surviving wife or husband joins with the ascending heirs of the deceased, to these latter belong two-thirds of the estate and the remaining third to the survivor aforesaid. (Art. 754 of the Italian Civil Code.) As the father of Sebastiano Brignone is living, as proved by documents submitted by the royal legation, he is entitled to two-thirds of the sum awarded as indemnity by the Commission.

It is a prevailing rule, and the Commission will surely not adopt another, that estates should be liquidated according to the personal law of the deceased, in the correctness of which rule my Venezuelan colleague appears to agree, and thus spares me the necessity for a long dissertation. It suffices for me to quote Article VIII of the preliminary title of the Italian Civil Code, which reads:

The legitimate and testamentary successions, however, whether as to the order of succession or as to the measure of the rights of succession and the intrinsic validity of the provisions, are regulated by the national laws of the person whose estate is in question, whatever be the nature of the property or in whatever country it may be situated.

In thus inscribing and proclaiming in the Italian Civil Code so lofty and liberal a principle of international law its compilers foresaw that it would redound greatly to their credit, and Italian legislation has warmly welcomed it in every case, whatever the nature of the testamentary property, and it seems to acquire additional force whenever this latter is personal, from the maxim, "Mobilia sequuntur personam."

Fiore, in paragraphs 103 et seq., Volume I, Diritto Internazionale Privato, illustrates and justifies this principle, and in paragraph 109 sums up in these words his learned argument:

Among all the systems, the one which best responds to rational law is the one adopted by the Italian legislator and found in Article VIII (already cited in the present memorial) of the general provisions of the Civil Code.

Pasquale Stanislao Mancini in this connection says that the “ragione successoria” being naught else than the combination of the principle of property with that of the family should be governed by the law of the person, and I qualify the principle tot hæreditates quot territoria as scientifically erroneous, and conducive to complications, incoherencies, onerous charges, and injurious to the heirs.

My honorable Venezuelan colleague in one of the recent sessions of the Commission said, that if there were conceded to the heirs of Brignone residing in Italy two-thirds of the indemnity awarded, the widow might consider herself as injured in her interests, because the local law gives her a larger share of the property of her deceased husband than is granted by the Italian law.

It seems to me the widow, by the fact of her having submitted her claim through the Italian legation, which means that she accepts the Italian law, has impliedly renounced every right she might have under the Venezuelan law in the matter of the partition of the estate.

It would be far too convenient to invoke the Italian law in the prosecution of the claim, and then the Venezuelan in the award of the indemnity.

In any case, whatever may be the difficulty or responsibility of the Commission, it will be avoided by awarding indemnity “to the heirs” of Sebastiano Brignone, as was done in the case of Massardo, Carbone & Co.

It will be the business of the heirs to divide among themselves, by mutual agreement or according to law, the amount awarded them.

I come now to the conclusion, and ask, first, that the honorable umpire award to the heirs of Sebastiano Brignone an indemnity of 81,137 bolivars, with interest from November 1, 1892, to December 31 of the current year; and second, that he allow the ascendant heirs of Brignone two-thirds of said amount, or 54,091.34 bolivars, with interest thereon calculated as above.

No opinion by the Venezuelan Commissioner.

RALSTON, Umpire:

This case comes to the umpire upon difference of opinion between the honorable Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela.

The claimants acquired their rights before this Commission through Sebastiano Brignone, an Italian citizen domiciled for many years in Venezuela as a merchant. The claim originated because of supplies furnished by Brignone, Delfino & Co. to the Venezuelan Government in 1892, and is for 81,137 bolivars, with interest from October 8, 1892.

The original beneficiary was married in Venezuela to a Venezuelan woman, September 5, 1891, and died in Caracas in September, 1898. His widow, who is one of the claimants, has always lived in Venezuela, and the question arises whether she may be treated as an Italian subject, and as such entitled to one-third of the estate. Of course, if she be Venezuelan she has no standing before the Commission. It is said that a conflict of laws as to her citizenship exists as between Italy and Venezuela.

The Civil Code of Italy provides as follows:

ART. 9. La donna straniera che si marita a un cittadino acquista la cittadinanza, e la conserva anche vedova.

ART. 14. La donna cittadina che si marita a un straniero diviene straniera, semprechè col fatto del matrimonio acquisti la cittadinanza del marito.

Rimanendo vedova, ricupera la cittadinanza se risieda nel regno o vi rientri, e dichiara in ambidue i casi davante l'ufficiale dello stato civile di volervi fissare il suo domicilio.

Upon the same points the Civil Code of Venezuela provides as follows:

ART. 18. La extranjera que se casare con un venezolano adquirirá los derechos civiles propios de los venezolanos, y los conservará mientras permanezca casada.

ART. 19. La venezolana que se casare con un extranjero se reputará como extranjera respecto de los derechos propios de los venezolanos, siempre que por hecho del matrimonio adquiera la nacionalidad del marido y mientras permanezca casada.

In the opinion of the umpire there is not a true conflict of laws, if we read the foregoing extracts with a due regard to their spirit.

Each country, speaking for its own nationals, declares that the native-born woman, marrying a foreigner and becoming a widow, having resided all the time at home, reassumes her original condition.

To permit so much of the Italian code as declares that the foreign woman marrying an Italian becomes Italian, to override the Venezuelan code, would therefore be against the spirit of the other section of the Italian code above referred to. It is therefore proper to say that in a true sense there is no conflict of laws.

But if it still be considered that a conflict exists, how should it be determined? Upon this point text writers and courts assist us.

Says Bluntschli (sec. 374):

Certaines personnes ou familles peuvent exceptionnellement être ressortissantes de deux Etats différents, ou même d'un plus grand nombre d'Etats.

En cas de conflit la préférence sera accordée à l'Etat dans lequel la personne ou la famille en question ont leur domicile; leurs droits dans les Etats où elles ne résident pas seront considérés comme suspendus.

In a note to the section he adds:

Contrairement à mes opinions antérieures, je pense aujourd'hui qu'en cas de collision on doit, en faveur de la liberté d'émigration, accorder la préférence à la nationalité de fait, c'est-à-dire, à celle qui s'unit au domicile.

Phillimore, volume 4, chapter 17, section 368, discussing the doctrine determining personal status, says:

An overwhelming majority of authorities pronounce that the law which governs the status is the law of the domicile, referring to Rocco, Fœlix, and Savigny.

Let us now turn to the courts:

In the cases of de Hammer and others against Venezuela (3 Moore, p. 2456), there arose exactly the question before us. The claimants were Venezuelan born, but married to American citizens, and claimed American citizenship by virtue of the law of the United States of 1855, which declared a citizen—every woman capable of naturalization married or who might marry thenceforward a citizen of the United States.

Commissioner Andrade decided against the claimant, and the American Commissioners, while not always following his reasoning, reached the same conclusion. Said Commissioner Findlay:

The question in the case is whether this law can have an extraterritorial operation and effect against the will and policy of another country in which the persons in whose behalf it is invoked are and have always been domiciled since their birth; and in my opinion there can be but one answer to that question. Whatever rights the United States had in its power to bestow will unquestionably pass under the law establishing the status of citizenship in favor of non-resident aliens, including the right to take property by descent and succession, and the right to prosecute any claim against the United States; but more than this can not be done without interfering with the rights of other States and involving them and itself in conflicting claims of the most absurd character.

In the case of Jane L. Brand, before the British and American Claims Commission (3 Moore, p. 2488), it was held that the doctrine that the national character of a married woman was in all cases determined by that of her husband had always prevailed in Great Britain, as elsewhere, where the domicile of the wife and widow had continued to be that of the husband's nationality.

It is true, however, that the majority of the Commission in the cases of Calderwood and others (3 Moore, p. 2486), against the strong dissent of Commissioner Fraser, held that a widow of American birth, always remaining in the United States, did not regain her American citizenship, but in view of all the foregoing decisions and authorities this view may be rejected.

The reason for the decision above given, reestablishing citizenship of a woman always resident, upon the death of her foreign husband, in so far as the question of conflict of laws is concerned, is excellently stated in the case of Alexander before the British and American Claims Commission (3 Moore, p. 2529), in which a decision was presented by the American Commissioner which met the approval of the umpire, Count Corti. According to English law the claimant was an English subject, and by American he was an American citizen. Said the opinion:

The practice of nations in such cases is believed to be for their sovereign to leave the person who has embarrassed himself by assuming a double allegiance to the protection which he may find provided for him by the municipal laws of that other sovereign to whom he thus also owes allegiance. To treat his grievances against that other sovereign as subjects of international concern would be to claim a jurisdiction paramount to that of the other nation of which he is also a subject. Complications would inevitably result, for no Government would recognize the right of another to interfere thus in behalf of one whom it regarded as a subject of its own. It has certainly not been the practice of the British Government to interfere in such cases, and it is not easy to believe that either Government meant to provide for them by this treaty.

The conclusion to be reached from the foregoing is that the claimant, Madame Brignone, is a citizen of Venezuela, and is without standing before this Commission.

But a second question arises. There are relatives of the original claimant of the ascending line. What part of the succession may these relatives claim?

The civil code of Italy provides:

ART. 754. Se non vi sono figli legittimi, ma ascendenti o figli naturali, o fratelli o sorelle, o loro discendenti è devoluta in proprietà al coniuge superstite la terza parte dell'eredità.

The civil code of Venezuela provides:

ART. 719. * * * Si existen cónyuge y ascendientes legítimos, y faltan hijos naturales, la herencia se divide en dos partes iguales, una que corresponde al cónyuge, y otra á los ascendientes legítimos.

If, therefore, the Italian code is to rule, the ascending heirs will receive from this Commission two-thirds, and if the law of Venezuela governs, they will receive one-half.

The Italian civil code provides:

ART. 7. I beni mobili sono soggetti alla legge della nazione del proprietario, salvo le contrarie disposizioni della legge del paese nel quale si trovano.

I beni immobili sono soggetti alla legge del luogo dove sono situati.

ART. 8. Le successioni legittime e testamentarie, però, sia quanto all'ordine di succedere, sia circa la misura dei diritti successorii, e la intrinseca validità delle disposizioni, sono regolate dalla legge nazionale della persona della cui eredità si tratta, di qualunque natura siano i beni, ed in qualunque paese si trovino.

The Venezuelan civil code contains nothing similar to section 7 of the Italian civil code, but provides as follows:

ART. 8. Los bienes muebles é inmuebles situados in Venezuela, aunque estén poseidos por extranjeros, se regirán por las leyes Venezolanas.

Shall this Commission be controlled by the law of nationality of the decedent, as Italy requires, or by the law of domicile, as indicated by the Venezuelan law? It will be borne in mind that Brignone died at his place of domicile, Caracas.

The differences of principle existing upon the question of succession to the estate of a deceased person are summed up in section 848 of Calvo's work as follows:

SEC. 848. Sur la question des lois généralement applicables aux successions testamentaires et aux successions ab intestat, la jurisprudence admet une triple division:

1. La jurisprudence qui soumet l'universitas juris (les biens mobiliers et les biens immobiliers) de la succession à la loi du dernier domicile du défunt. Cette jurisprudence est d'accord avec l'opinion de Savigny et les décisions des tribunaux supérieurs de l'Allemagne. Elle est aussi conforme à l'unité de constitution du patrimoine.

2. La jurisprudence, directement contraire, qui soumet les biens à la loi de l'endroit où ils se trouvent, laquelle admet en conséquence la possibilité de l'application de lois différentes aux différentes portions des biens, et ne pose aucun principe relativement aux dettes et aux créances dont il est loisible dans chaque cas de disposer pratiquement aux mieux des intérêts en cause. Cette jurisprudence est basée sur la loi féodale de la souveraineté territoriale.

3. La jurisprudence intermédiaire, qui soumet les personnes et les meubles à la loi du domicile du défunt et les biens à la loi de l'endroit où ils sont situés, lex situs. C'est la jurisprudence en vigueur en France (art. 3, du Code Civil), en Angleterre et aux Etats-Unis.

Si la succession ne comprend que des biens meubles, alors on applique le principe que les biens meubles suivent la personne et son domicile; c'est la loi du domicile qui gouverne la succession mobilière.

In the opinion of the umpire, the true rule, at least as to personal property, is indicated by Savigny, who says (Droit Romain, sec. 377, vol. 8):

La succession ab intestat se règle d'après la loi en vigueur au dernier domicile du testateur à l'époque où s'ouvre la succession. Cela s'applique notamment à l'ordre d'après lequel la loi appelle à succéder les héritiers ab intestat.

This principle is, it would seem, recognized by the Italian civil code, which declares:

ART. 923. La successione si apre al momento della morte, nel luogo del'ultimo domicilio del defunto.

The Venezuelan civil code similarly declares:

ART. 894. La sucesión se abre en el momento de la muerte y en el lugar del último domicilio del defunto.

The umpire feels, therefore, obliged to follow the principle recognized by both laws as to succession, despite the conflict above indicated, the Italian law in apparent conflict being regarded as applying under the present circumstances only to estates opened in Italy. Any other view would, in the umpire's opinion, give to the Italian law an extra-territorial effect overruling the law of the domicile where the goods were situate and the decedent was domiciled. The adoption of such contrary principle would in his opinion infringe the territorial supremacy of a state.

But it is urged that no attention should be paid to the local laws of Venezuela because of the provision of the protocol of May 7, 1903, as follows:

The decisions of the Commission shall be based upon absolute equity, without regard to objections of a technical nature or of the provisions of local legislation.

This unusual provision is to receive a rational and not a strained interpretation, and in the umpire's opinion amounts simply to saying that any local legislation which operates against equity shall be rejected. An extended interpretation rejecting any and all local legislation would at once defeat the very purposes of the Commission, as may well be illustrated by the present case. Mrs. Brignone was married in Venezuela under Venezuelan laws. Deny efficacy to these laws, and no marriage existed, for marriage is, in civilized nations, regulated by law. Her deceased husband acquired a complete interest in partnership assets from his associate (the partnership itself being created in accordance with the provisions of local law) by virtue of laws providing for such transfers. Proofs in this or in other cases have been taken before judges created by local laws and in the manner they provide. Reject local laws indiscriminately and the whole fabric of sworn testimony built up in more than 300 cases presented or to be presented to the Commission absolutely fails.

The only possible question, therefore, left to consider is, whether the provision of Venezuelan law giving the widow one-half of the estate of her deceased husband (there being no children) is contrary to equity. In view of the number of States in the United States as well as elsewhere in which precisely the same rule prevails, it is impossible for the umpire to say that the provision is opposed to equity or could be conceived as shocking to the moral sense of mankind.

A word should be added relative to the suggestion of the honorable Commissioner for Italy that the claim should be allowed without reference to the present citizenship of the claimant, and to enforce this position he cites Moore, pages 2398-2400, and 2360-2379, and 1865.

The first reference (Camy's case) simply sustains the validity of the assignment of an international claim, but the claim being against the United States, and the assignment having been made by a Frenchman to an American citizen, the demurrer of the United States was sustained and the claim rejected. The case is, therefore, if at all in point, opposed to the contention of the honorable Commissioner.

The second reference (Texan Star case) shows that a court acting equitably will in proper circumstances recognize the title and citizenship of the actual owner rather than those of the titular owner, whose title simply served temporary purposes.

The third citation (Delagoa Bay case) sustains the real interests of an American citizen who was required by Portuguese law to create a Portuguese corporation to exploit his concessions, and is not therefore in point.

In the view of the umpire, the "Italian claims," of which this Commission has jurisdiction, must have been Italian when they arose as well as when presented.<sup>a</sup> Without discussing this point at length, he confines himself to referring to 2 Moore, page 1353, as well as to cases hereinbefore cited.

No dispute as to fact existing, a judgment will be signed in favor of the Italian heirs of Brignone, for one-half of the amount of the claim, with interest, but without prejudice as to the right of the widow to pursue her remedies elsewhere.

GENTINI CASE.

(By the Umpire:)

Local laws of prescription can not be invoked to defeat an international claim. Nevertheless, the principle of prescription will be recognized internationally, and equity will forbid the recognition of stale and secret claims. A claim first presented thirty years after its supposed inception, the existence of which was never before revealed, may be rejected.<sup>b</sup>

AGNOLI, Commissioner (claim referred to umpire):

At the session of the Italian-Venezuelan Mixed Commission of the 29th of August the honorable Commissioner for Venezuela, Doctor Zuloaga, intimated that he would not agree to a demand for indemnity from the Italian citizen Odoardo Gentini, because the facts upon which said claim is based occurred more than thirty years ago, from which it appears that my illustrious colleague of Venezuela intends to invoke the principle of prescription.

This conclusion must, it seems to me, be based on motives of equity, or upon rules of international law, or, finally, on the provisions of local legislation.

In each of these three cases the exception taken must be rejected.

With regard to the first point, I observe that a tribunal of equity can not invoke prescription in order to evade obligations established by authentic documents.

If to-morrow a creditor presents to me a receipt of mine, the genuineness of which I can not doubt, and representing a debt of more than thirty years' standing, even though I may legally refuse payment, my conscience would always counsel me to not recur to such exception unless in the case where, though a summum jus, it might be a summum injuria.

The law which declares a debt prescribed does not, on that account, properly deprive a creditor of his rights, but interposes an exclusively legal obstacle to the double payment of the sum due.

The principle of prescription has indeed been admitted in the codes from motives of public order and with a political character (that of maintaining peace between individuals and preventing property from becoming a perennial source of contention), but it is not based on pure morals, so that when he who may does not invoke it the judge may not officially supplement an unexercised prescription (art. 2109 of the Italian Civil Code) even in case of minors or incapacitated persons. (Trop long on Prescription, No. 89.)

Dumond, commenting on art. 2223 of the French Civil Code, which has a similar provision, gave as the principal reason therefor "that he who does not oppose prescription may be induced thereto by remorse of conscience."

It is admitted in jurisprudence that a magistrate may not constitute himself an indiscreet patron of a party (V. Zacharie, Vol. III, p. 775; Trop long on Prescription, No. 91) or furnish officially a means of defense which, though permitted under the law, frequently offends the conscience of an honest debtor.

From the point of view of absolute equity, which should inspire the decisions of a mixed commission, I categorically reject the exception of my honorable colleague of Venezuela, and should this question come before the umpire, confidently expect his decision will found itself on my criteria.

On the second point I affirm that prescription is not admitted in the juridical reports based on the jus gentium.

I have consulted various authorities and found that while their opinions vary as regards the law to be applied when citizens of different nations raise the question of prescription in the act of regulating private interests, none of them has discussed or even raised this question in the settlement of claims, and therefore of actions of credit sustained by a government in the interest of its subjects as against another government and based on the treaties and protocols, as in our case.

I affirm that I have not found this question treated by the authorities consulted by me, though others may have done so; but on this matter we have the decision of the permanent court of arbitration of The Hague—that is to say, of the supreme tribunal in matters of international law, which decision must have a positive value, the more so that the decision to which I refer, that of the "Pious Fund of the Californias," is quite recent and absolutely analogous from the identical point of view in which we are concerned—the Gentini case.

The court of arbitration was convened to decide a case of credit of the Pious Fund of the Californias, represented by the Archbishop of San Francisco and the Bishop of Monterey v. Mexico, and the question was submitted to the court under the terms of a protocol stipulated at Washington, May 22, 1902, between the United States and Mexico.

It is worthy of note that, as in the case of present claims of Italy, so in the Pious Fund case, it was not a question of a credit of the United States against the Government of Mexico, but of a debt of this latter in favor of the prelates above named. The representatives of Mexico raised the question of prescription before the court because the case under consideration was one in which demand for payment had for many years been neglected.

The exception seemed to derive additional force that prescription, according to the law of Mexico, requires five years, and by the existence of a decree of the same Government, promulgated June 22, 1885, calling on all its creditors to present their claims within a certain period (extended by another decree of 1894) under pain of prescription and extinguishment. In fact, the Catholic prelates of Upper California had not insisted upon their credit, either principal or interest, according to the provisions of the above decrees.

The distinguished agent of the United States before the court objected that it was not yet established, that an international tribunal had ever rejected a claim on the ground of an exception based on laws having no validity whatever before a tribunal of such character, and added (as I have already observed herein) that prescription does not extinguish the right of a creditor; but merely impedes his right of exercising it.

It did not require a lengthy argument from the honorable agent of the United States to obtain from the court a decree of payment from Mexico, including this maxim:*

This principle is besides absolutely logical and moral, since when it is a question of private credits and debits it may be presumed that he who has permitted the lapse of a long period without bringing his rights into court may have intended to renounce them; or it may be admitted that he should suffer the results of his negligence. But when the debtor is a government, and, moreover, when the demand of the individual may be the subject of a claim, the reasons which may induce a creditor to postpone his action may be many and of varied nature; as, for instance, the interruption of diplomatic relations between the Governments concerned, the lack of political influence of the creditor, the unfavorable financial conditions of the debtor government, the want of faith of the creditor in the impartiality of magistrates, who, unprotected by a feeling of permanency, might against their better judgment become pliant tools of a party, and many other similar motives.

Many reasons may therefore operate to render unavailable a credit against a government, and as it is a general rule that the term of a period of prescription does not commence to run until the day when the payment falls due and action for its recovery may be had, it would be necessary to prove (and the proof would always be difficult and uncertain) when these conditions occurred in the case of claims against governments.

As there is not in international law an exact and generally accepted provision which establishes when and within what limits a credit becomes null and void through prescription, there can not be a presumptive negligence on the part of the dilatory creditor, and the plea of prescription must be absolutely rejected.

In regard to the third point, to wit, the eventual invoking by my honorable colleague of the principle of prescription according to the provisions of local laws, it is only necessary to observe that I have already clearly expressed my opinion in the arguments used by me in my reference to the Pious Fund case, but I will add some further considerations. The law of prescription of Venezuela can not be considered here, inasmuch as it is contrary to the provisions of Article II of the Washington protocol of May 7.

If in the case of claims based on alleged denial of justice it may be opportune and even necessary to search the laws of the Republic to afford this Commission unlimited freedom and facility for the full performance of its duty, in any other case the introduction of them would constitute so patent and manifest an infraction of that clause of the protocol, which is for us the supreme law, that such a fact might well be considered a sufficient cause for invalidating our sentence.

The clause referred to, which we should not and can not ignore, was not included in the protocol without due reason, which was not merely to avoid placing the Commissioner for Italy in a position of manifest inferiority to that of his Venezuelan colleague, who is known to be profoundly versed in the laws of his own country, while I am at best but superficially acquainted with them.

But inasmuch as the protocol requires no such learning on my part, it is but just that I should avail myself of its authority and refuse to join in any discussion touching Venezuelan codes and legislation.

Without concerning myself, therefore, with the rules from which, according to Venezuelan law, prescription is derived, I wholly reject the principle of prescription as being contrary to Article II of the protocol of May 7, 1903, and request the Commissioner for Venezuela, or the honorable umpire in case the Commissioners fail to agree as to the question of principle, to receive the claim of Odoardo Gentini and award him an indemnity in the following amounts: 293.50 bolivars due him as per receipts; 360 bolivars for eighteen days forcibly closing of his store, and 546.50 bolivars for his illegal arrest—in all, a total of 1,200 bolivars.

ZULOAGA, Commissioner :

Thirty years have passed since the transaction to which this claim refers without its appearing that during this long period it has been submitted to the consideration of the Government of Venezuela. The cause upon which this claim is based is barred. It is barred in accordance with the internal law of Venezuela. It is barred in accordance with the Italian law (arts. 1956 and 1936, Civil Code of Venezuela, and 2135 and 2114, Italian Civil Code). It is barred in accordance with the principles of international law, which establishes prescription as a legitimate cause for the extinction of obligations.

Prescription is founded upon a social necessity, and by all civilized peoples and at all times, it has been recognized as a substantial element of stability and peace.

Prescription, says Laurent, is more than a right consecrated by a law. It is a right of humanity. Nations have conceded also that a State is subject to prescription the same as an individual. (Art. 1936, Civil Code of Venezuela; 2114, Civil Code of Italy; 2227, Civil Code of France.) Limitation, therefore, runs against a State as a State ordains that it should run against individuals. Limitation will run against the Italian State as it ordains that prescription should run against an individual, and I do not see why these principles, which have been considered just in the internal civil law, should not be so considered in the life of nations, and why a claim of a civil nature only, and therefore essentially liable to prescription, must become unextinguishable thereby because it is converted into an international claim. It is not explained how a right already barred (if it is called to the attention of the claimant government after the expiration of the legal term) can give rise to a valid claim by the circumstance that the claim, as in the present case, appears as in the first instance as an international one. What would be the length of time necessary for prescription? It would be difficult to determine the shortest period, because an internal law can not govern; but, for my part, I do not doubt that a period of thirty years is more than sufficient, especially where there is a reference to a question between Venezuela and Italy, all the more since this period is greater than both States have fixed for prescription; having made it such an essential to public order that both recite in their respective laws that there can not be pleaded in opposition to it want of title or good faith.

As a precedent in the Mixed Commissions we find the case of John H. Williams, No. 36, of the United States and Venezuela Commission of 1890 (Moore, p. 4181), which disallowed the claim because it was barred by a lapse of twenty-six years. The argument contained in the opinion gives us to understand that a less term is sufficient.

I believe, therefore, the claim of Gentini against the Government of Venezuela is barred.

AGNOLI, Commissioner (supplemental opinion):

The undersigned prays the honorable umpire to take into consideration the fact that the Italian Government has never heretofore had a protocol or a mixed commission for the settlement of its claims against the Government of Venezuela, while the majority of the other European powers—that is to say, France, Spain, England, Holland, and even the United States—have obtained the adjustment of claims by means of commissions opened to all claimants. Therefore, even if the principle of prescription had been admitted by a previous mixed commission, such precedent could have no application to Italian claims, because Venezuela has always refused us mixed commissions and the liquidation of claims accorded by it to other nations, basing her refusal on an erroneous interpretation of the treaty of 1861, against which refusal we have always protested.

It is worthy of note in this connection, besides, that, notwithstanding that, in the French-Venezuelan five claims more than 30 years old (not one, as affirmed by the honorable Commissioner for Venezuela), have been liquidated.

In any case, we have the right to invoke in this question also the “most-favored nation” clause (Art. VIII of the protocol), it not being admissible that Italy should have intended to renounce her right to indemnity in a category of claims which other nations have had occasion to obtain.

The honorable umpire should, in addition, appreciate the fact that in the protocol which confers upon this Commission the right of competency in all classes of Italian claims no reserve is made of antiquated claims, but express mention is made of those relative to holders of bonds and those otherwise settled (Art. IV), the only ones not submitted to the action of the Commission.

RALSTON, Umpire:

In this case, referred to the umpire upon difference of opinion between the honorable Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela, it appears that the claimant, an Italian, was, in 1871, a resident of Trujillo, when, as it is said, his store was closed temporarily and business-injured by the presence of a large number of soldiers, the claimant sent to prison on the order of the jefe, his establishment plundered, and later on forced loans were imposed upon him under threat of imprisonment. The proofs were taken the following year, and from that time till the past month nothing appears to have been done with the claim, it not having even been called to the attention of the royal Italian legation. The claim is for the sum of 3,900 bolivars.

It is submitted on behalf of Venezuela that this claim is barred by prescription, although it is admitted that no national statute can be invoked against it.

On the other hand, it is insisted for Italy that prescription can not be recognized in international tribunals, this contention being based upon the arbitral sentence given by the Hague permanent court of arbitration in the Pious Fund case. If this contention be correct the argument must stop at this point. Let us examine it carefully.

In the Pious Fund case it was urged by Mexico that the claim, as presented, was barred by two short statutes of limitation, one of five years and a later one of about the same length of time, the claimants having failed, it was said, to present their claims before the proper authorities within the time limited. On the other hand, it was contended on behalf of the United States (American agent's report, p. 63<sup>a</sup>), that—it has never yet been held in international tribunals that a claim brought before them could be defeated by reason of the existence of a statute of this sort, such statute having no authority whatsoever over international courts.

Passing upon these diverse contentions, the court held (American agent's report, p. 858) that les règles de la prescription étant exclusivement du domaine du droit civil, ne sauraient être appliquées au présent conflit entre les deux États en litige, adopting almost verbatim the position taken on behalf of the United States.

It will be noted that the declaration of the court had reference not to the principle of prescription, but to the rules with which civil law had surrounded it. A "règle," as we are told in Bourguignon & Bergerol's Dictionnaire des Synonymes—est essentiellement pratique et, de plus, obligatoire * * *; il est des règles de l'art comme des règles de gouvernement,

exprime une vérité générale, d'après laquelle on dirige ses actions, qui sert de base théorique aux divers actes de la vie, et dont l'application à la réalité amène telle ou telle conséquence.

The permanent court of arbitration has never denied the principle of prescription, a principle well recognized in international law, and it is fair to believe it will never do so. Such denial would tend to upset all government, since power over fixed areas depends upon possession sanctified by prescription, although the circumstances of its origin and the time it must run may vary with every case. The expressions of many international law writers upon this point, including Wheaton, Vattel, Phillimore, Hall, Polson, Calvo, Vico, Grotius, Taparelli, Sala, Coke, Sir Henry Maine, Brocher, Domat, Burke, Wharton, and Markby, are collated in the case of Williams v. Venezuela, Venezuelan-American Claims Commission of 1888, cited at length in 4 Moore, page 4181. To them we may add Bello, who, on page 42 of his Derecho Internacional, says:

La prescripción es aun más importante y necesaria entre las naciones que entre los individuos, como que las desavenencias de aquellas tienen resultados harto más graves, acarreado muchas veces la guerra.

Bluntschli (sec. 279) finds that a taking of territory, originally wrongful, becomes by time transformed into a legal condition.

But it remains true that the international law writers have referred almost invariably to that form of prescription involved in the taking and possession of property known at one time as usucaption, and we are left to examine whether the general principles of prescription should be applied to claims for money damages as between nations.

In using the word "prescription" in the ensuing discussion, let us follow the definition given by Savigny (Droit Romain, vol. 5, sec. 237):

Quand un droit d'action périt parceque le titulaire néglige de l'exercer dans un certain délai, cet extinction de droit s'appelle prescription de l'action.

The same idea is embodied and somewhat enlarged in Article 2219 of the Code Napoléon, which says:

La prescription est un moyen d'acquérir ou de se libérer par un certain laps de temps et sous les conditions déterminées par la loi.

On examining the general subject we find that by all nations and from the earliest period has it been considered that as between individuals an end to disputes should be brought about by the efflux of time. Early in the history of the Roman law this feeling received fixity by legislative sanction. In every country have periods been limited beyond which actions could not be brought. In the opinion of the writer these laws of universal application were not the arbitrary acts of power, but instituted because of the necessities of mankind, and were the outgrowth of a general feeling that equity demanded their enactment; for very early it was perceived that with the lapse of time the defendant, through death of witnesses and destruction of vouchers, became less able to meet demands against him, and the danger of consequent injustice increased, while no hardship was imposed upon the claimant in requiring him within a reasonable time to institute his suit. In addition, another view found its expression with relation to the matter in the maxim "Interest republica ut sit finis litium."

The universal opinion of publicists and lawgivers has been that the statutes of prescription or "limitation," as they have come to be called, were equitable and the outgrowth of a general desire for the attainment of justice. Let us quote some not given in the opinion hereinbefore referred to.

Savigny says (Vol. 5, sec. 237):

Le motif le plus général et le plus décisif également applicable à la prescription des actions et à l'usucaption est le besoin de fixer les rapports de droits incertains susceptibles de doutes et de contestations, en renfermant l'incertitude dans un laps de temps déterminé. Un second motif est l'extinction présumée du droit que protège l'action. Mais ce motif grave et véritable peut aisément être mal entendu. Le sens de cette présomption est l'in vraisemblance que le titulaire du droit ait négligé pendant un temps aussi long d'exercer son action si le droit lui-même n'eût été éteint d'une manière quelconque, mais dont la preuve n'existe plus. * * *

Le demandeur peut intenter son action quand il lui plait; il peut, donc, en la déférant, augmenter les difficultés de la défense; car les moyens de preuve peuvent périr sans la faute du défendeur; par exemple, si des témoins viennent à mourir. Restreindre ce droit absolu du demandeur, dont la mauvaise foi peut abuser, est surtout ce qui mérite considération.

In section 245, Savigny says:

Mais la prescription, quoique de droit positif, n'en est pas moins une institution des plus bienfaisantes, et nous ne devons pas, à cause de son origine, affaiblir ou même annuler son efficacité par des restrictions sans fondement.

Says Troplong in "Droit Civil Expliqué," title Prescription, 2d ed., Vol. I, p. 14:

Ces considérations sont, je crois, suffisantes pour nous montrer tout ce qu'il y a d'équitable et de rationnel dans le principe de la prescription. Que le droit arbitraire soit intervenu ensuite pour déterminer la mesure du temps au bout duquel se trouve la déchéance, c'est ce qui était nécessaire pour tenir en éveil la prudence des citoyens et pour donner à tous une règle uniforme. Mais le droit civil n'a fait que travailler sur des notions préexistantes; le droit naturel avait parlé avant qu'il ne songeât à codifier.

Says Laurent, title Prescription, volume 32, page 23, section 12:

C'est plus qu'un droit consacré par une loi; c'est un droit de l'humanité; donc, en cette matière toute distinction entre nationaux et étrangers s'efface, comme n'ayant pas de raison d'être; tout homme peut invoquer la prescription.

In Bouvier's Law Dictionary (Rawle's edition), title Prescription, we read:

The doctrine of Immemorial Prescription is indispensable in public law. (1 Phill., Int. L., sec. 255.) The general consent of mankind has established the principle that long and uninterrupted possession by one nation excludes the claim of every other. All nations are bound by this consent since all are parties to it. None can safely disregard it without impugning its own title to its possessions. (1 Wheaton, Int. L., 207.) The period of time can not be fixed in public law as it can in private law; it must depend upon varying and variable circumstances. (1 Phill., Int. L., sec. 260.)

As appears to the writer, all the arguments in favor of it as between individuals exist equally as well when the case of a national is taken up by his government against another, subject to considerations and exceptions noted at the end of this opinion. For may not a government equally with an individual lose its vouchers, particularly when, if any exist, they are in the hands of far distant subordinate agents? If there be collusion between claimant and official will not government witnesses die as readily as those of private individuals? If the claimant's own action be the cause of the misfortunes of which he complains, will not knowledge of the fact be lost with the flight of time? May the claimant against the government, with more justice than if he claimed against his neighbor, virtually conceal his supposed cause of action till its investigation becomes impossible? Does equity permit it?

And this brings us to a further point. We are told with truth that this is a Commission whose acts are to be controlled by absolute equity, and that equity will not permit the interposition of a purely legal defense, as prescription is said to be.

But is this position correct? As appears from the foregoing citations, the principle of prescription finds its foundation in the highest equity—the avoidance of possible injustice to the defendant, the claimant having had ample time to bring his action, and therefore if he has lost, having only his own negligence to accuse.

Additionally, however, we may refer to the position taken by courts of equity in England and the United States with reference to statutes of prescription.

Says Bouvier (Rawle's edition) title Limitation:

Courts of equity, though not within the terms of the statute, have nevertheless uniformly conformed to its spirit, and have, as a general rule, been governed by its provisions, unless especial circumstances of fraud or the like require in the interest of justice that they should be disregarded. (12 Pet., 56; 130 U.S., 43, etc.) Courts of equity will apply the statute by analogy, and in cases of concurrent jurisdiction they are bound by the statutes which govern actions at law. (149 U.S., 436; 169 U.S., 189.) Some claims, not barred by the statute, a court of equity will not enforce because of public policy and the difficulty of doing full justice when the transaction is obscured by lapse of time and loss of evidence. This is termed the doctrine of laches.

It thus appears that courts of equity, even when not bound by the statute recognizing its essential justice, have followed it in spirit.

Let us turn to the cognate title of Laches, in the same work, and we find that—

Courts of equity withhold relief from those who have delayed the assertion of their claims for an unreasonable time, and the mere fact that suit was brought within a reasonable time does not prevent the application of the doctrine of laches when there is a want of diligence in the prosecution. (5 Col. App., 391; 155 U. S., 449; 160 id., 171.) The question of laches depends not upon the fact that a certain definite time has elapsed since the cause of action accrued, but upon whether under all the circumstances the plaintiff is chargeable with want of due diligence in not instituting the proceedings sooner (160 U. S., 171); it is not measured by the statute of limitations (155 U. S., 449); but depends upon the circumstances of the particular case (141 U. S., 260). Where injustice would be done in the particular case by granting the relief asked, equity may refuse it and leave the party to his remedy at law (158 U. S., 41), or where laches is excessive and unexplained (34 U. S. App., 50).

Laches in seeking to enforce a right will, in many cases in equity, prejudice such right, for equity does not encourage stale claims nor give relief to those who sleep upon their rights (4 Wait, Act. & Def., 472; 9 Pet., 405; 91 U. S., 512; 124 id., 183; 130 id., 43; 142 id., 236; 150 id., 193; 1 App. D. C., 36; 157 Mass., 46); this doctrine is based upon the grounds of public policy, which requires for the peace of society the discouragement of stale claims (137 U. S., 556). * * *

It has been held to be inexcusable for thirty-six years (16 U. S. App., 391); twenty-seven years unexplained (145 U. S., 317); twenty-three years (146 U. S., 102); twenty-two years, during which the defendant company spent much money and labor in improvements (161 U. S., 573); twenty-two years after knowledge of the facts (152 U. S., 412); nineteen years on a bill to establish a trust (7 U. S. App., 481); fourteen years in the assertion of title to lands which meantime had been sold to settlers (4 U. S. App., 160); ten years, in proceedings to enforce a trust in lands (158 U. S., 416); ten years, after the foreclosure and sale of a railroad in a bill by a stockholder to set aside the sale for collusion and fraud, which were patent on the face of the proceedings (146 U. S., 88); nine years in a suit to have a deed declared a mortgage on the ground that it was obtained by taking advantage of the grantor's destitute condition (7 U. S. App., 233); eight years' acquiescence in a trade-mark for metallic paint, during which the defendant had built up an extended market for his product (17 U. S. App., 145); eight years in proceedings where complainant in consideration of $10,000 had released certain claims and sought to set the release aside on the ground that it was entitled to a much larger sum than it received (159 U. S., 243); three years where a person bought property of uncertain value, and after three years brought suit to rescind the contract on the ground of fraudulent representation (31 U. S. App., 102).

We may refer for a moment before concluding to such international precedents as exist upon the subject.

The first case to be cited is that of Mossman before the American and Mexican Mixed Claims Commission of 1868. The claimant alleged that he had been imprisoned unjustly by the Mexican authorities in 1854, and first presented his claim in 1867. Sir Edward Thornton, the umpire (4 Moore, p. 4180), in the course of his discussion said:

It seems unfair that the latter (the Mexican Government) should be first informed of the alleged misconduct of its inferior authorities more than fifteen years after the date of the acts complained of. The umpire can not, under this circumstance, consider that the Mexican Government can be called upon to give compensation for a very doubtful injury, and he therefore awards that the claim be disallowed.

The same subject was thoroughly discussed in the case of Williams v. Venezuela (4 Moore, p. 4181), heretofore alluded to, in which there had been a delay of twenty-six years in the presentation of an account.

After a very learned and thorough discussion, the Commission held (p. 4199):

Upon these principles, too lengthily discussed, without awaiting further proof called for in defense from Venezuela, we disallow claim No. 36. It was withheld too long. The claimant's verification of the old urgent account of 1841, twenty-six years after its date, without cause for the delay, supposing it to be competent testimony, is not sufficient under the circumstances of the case to overcome the presumption of settlement.

We next have the case of Barberie v. Venezuela, No. 47, of the same Commission, and we quote from 4 Moore, pages 4202, 4203, expressions that cast a strong light upon the whole subject-matter under discussion.

It is true that this Commission is an international tribunal, and in some sense is not fettered by the narrow rules and strict procedures obtaining in municipal courts; but there are certain principles, having their origin in public policy, founded in the nature and necessity of things, which are equally obligatory upon every tribunal seeking to administer justice. Great lapse of time is known to produce certain inevitable results, among which are the destruction or the obscuration of evidence by which the equality of the parties is disturbed or destroyed, and as a consequence renders the accomplishment of exact or even approximate justice impossible. Time itself is an unwritten statute of repose. Courts of equity constantly act upon this principle, which belongs to no code or system of municipal judiciary, but is as wide and universal in its operation as the range of human controversy. A stale claim does not become any the less so because it happens to be an international one, and this tribunal, in dealing with it, can not escape the obligation of a universally recognized principle, simply because there happens to be no code of positive rules by which its action is to be governed. The treaty under which it is sitting requires that its decisions shall be made in conformity with justice, without defining what is meant by that term. We are clearly of the opinion that in no sense in which the term is used would it be just for us to make an award which would require the levying of a tax on the whole present population of Venezuela to pay a claim which originated before nearly all of the oldest of them were born, and which is presented at a time when it is impossible to say whether it is well founded or not, the delay being without excuse or justification, and we accordingly reject the claim and dismiss the petition.

Before the same Commission was presented the case of Driggs v. Venezuela, No. 7, which was rejected on the same grounds as the Williams case. The Commission, among other things, say: <sup>a</sup>

Twenty-eight years had elapsed since the alleged wrong by the Colombian Government, and not a complaint had been made by Driggs. There is not a case on our list that better illustrates the wisdom of the prescriptive rule.

The same principle has just received the consideration of the American and Venezuelan Claims Commission now sitting. The claim of William V. Spader was, by the opinion of Commissioner Bainbridge, rejected. The honorable Commissioner, speaking of it, says: <sup>b</sup>

A right unasserted for over forty-three years can hardly, in justice, be called a "claim."

He further declares—

It is doubtless true that municipal statutes of limitation can not operate to bar an international claim. But the reason which lies at the foundation of such statutes, that "great principle of peace," is as obligatory in the administration of justice by an international tribunal as the statutes are binding upon municipal courts.

In opposition to the foregoing it is suggested that the umpire of the French-Venezuelan Commission, now in session in Caracas, has admitted claims dating from 1867, although there have been intermediate

French commissions. As it is understood that the arbitral sentences referred to were not accompanied by a statement of reasons, we may imagine that they were based upon some exception to the rule above indicated, and we may now refer, at least partially, to exceptions to the application of the principle of prescription between nations.

In a case referred to in 4 Moore, page 4179, it seemed to have been considered that where there was an infraction of a treaty obligation by the legislative power of the Government itself, prescription would not lie. Whether the position be sound or otherwise need not be discussed.

Again, it was recognized in the Williams case (4 Moore, p. 4194) that the time which would bar an account might not affect a bond as to which a public register had been kept.

Further, the fact will not be lost sight of that the presentation of a claim to competent authority within proper time will interrupt the running of prescription.

The qualifications above referred to, and others which might be imagined, can not, however, have any application to the present case, in which for thirty-one years after proof had been prepared the case does not appear to have been presented in any manner, the royal Italian legation, even, until very recently, having been in ignorance of its existence. Of this conduct on the part of the claimant no explanation is offered.

The umpire, while disallowing the claim, expresses no opinion as to the number of years constituting sufficient prescription to defeat claims against governments in an international court. Each must be decided according to its especial conditions. He calls attention to the fact that under varying circumstances the civil-law period is ten, twenty, and thirty years; in England, for many years—for contracts, six years; in the United States, on contracts with the Government, six years, and in the several States, on personal actions, from three to ten years.

It is sufficient to say that in the present case the claimant has so long neglected his supposed rights as to justify a belief in their nonexistence.

A judgment of dismissal will be signed.

GUASTINI CASE.

(By the Umpire:)

Opinion in the Sambiaggio case as to non-responsibility of government for acts of unsuccessful revolutionists save in case of proven negligence (p. 666) affirmed and followed.

The legitimate government can not enforce a second payment of taxes once paid to revolutionary authorities when the latter were for the time being at the place in question the de facto government.<sup>a</sup>

AGNOLI, Commissioner (claim referred to umpire):

The honorable umpire in the claim of Sambiaggio has expressed the opinion that the protocol of February 13, 1903, does not implicitly allow indemnity for damages caused by the revolution.

The Italian Commissioner not being able to accept this point of view, on account, no doubt, of a lack of similar data of fact and of law, has the honor to present the following new considerations on this controversy, supporting them by documents not heretofore produced and by arguments not yet fully examined.

The honorable umpire justly remarks that the treaty of 1861 does not explicitly admit damages caused by revolution, but we must observe that neither does it reject them. In fact, it says that "Italians in Venezuela shall be entitled to indemnity in the same measure as the nationals," not that they "shall have right only." Now, if one right is conceded to foreigners this does not necessarily mean that they shall be excluded from additional rights, which is in point provided by article 26 of said treaty containing the most favored nation clause. And let us observe, by the way, that the treaty of 1861 may not be invoked against the protocol of February 13, and this is to say, that the protocol recognizes rights superior to those recognized by the treaty—that is, including the right to indemnity for revolutionary damages (Art. VIII of the protocol of February 13) above all when a similar advantage is granted others.

Now, we will undertake to show that the Royal Government has intended to reserve and make good the rights of Italian claimants on the basis of a responsibility which includes revolutionary damages. The whole question, according to and judging by the arguments employed in the Sambiaggio case, seems to hinge on the meaning of the word "injury" contained in the English version of the protocol.<sup>a</sup> "Injury," according to its English law meaning, is a "damage done contrary to law; illegal damage." The honorable umpire, therefore, holds that in order to render Venezuela responsible it would be necessary to show that she is so according to the "jus gentium." To reach this conclusion the honorable umpire has recourse to the correspondence between Italy and Venezuela prior to the protocol, and from it he thinks it may be shown that the royal Italian legation sought only to reject the pretension of the Venezuelan Government to limit its responsibility to that recognized by the decree of 1873; but it does not seem to us that his opinion is justified; in fact, the royal Italian legation not only denied this restriction of responsibility decreed by Guzmán Blanco, but has expressly declared (in the note of April 12, 1901, of the royal Italian legation) as follows:<sup>b</sup>

The Government has given me, in addition, the charge of adding, and I do so add, the most ample reservations in regard to the rights of Italian claimants.

This general reservation had for its object to protect the more important rights of injured Italians—rights which have been contemplated subsequently by the protocol of February 13 (Art. IV). Plainer still was the memorandum note presented by Minister Riva on December 11, 1902, which, by order of his Government, informed the Government of Venezuela that not only did it exact the payment of claims recognized by the legation, but made reservation with regard to other claims on the basis of a much broader Venezuelan responsibility than that partially discussed previously, and which Italy never expressly surrendered. This memorandum served as a starting point for fixing the conditions of the protocol of February 13, 1903. This has been impliedly admitted by the honorable umpire, who has evidently intended to take the text of the memorandum in order to explain the views of the Royal Government, and has formally alleged it, saying he had consulted the correspondence of the high contracting parties to acquaint himself with their intentions. Now the memorandum<sup>a</sup>— expressly reserves all those claims which, posteriorly to the period 1898-1900, were or shall be presented by Italian subjects as well for damages arising from the civil war begun in 1901, as for whatsoever title of credit or action toward the Venezuelan Government.

Here, on the eve of a rupture of relations between the two countries, we have a new phase—one in which Italy has asked for a generic and complete, not partial settlement, of all accounts with Venezuela, in which she has considered her rights as a whole, making the most ample reservations, and invoking a broader and indisputable responsibility.

What is the significance of the words, “all those claims * * * for damages arising from the civil war begun in 1901?” Is it not evidently intended to cover thereby all losses and destruction of property occurring in civil strife? Such losses must include those occasioned as well by government as by revolutionary forces.

In the memorandum note reservation is also made “for whatsoever other title of credit or action against the Government of the Republic,” thus making double reference to future demands for indemnity on account of Venezuela’s negligence in protecting Italian citizens, and to revolutionary damages.

The damages arising from civil war form a sum total embracing all losses, deteriorations, destructions, and damages suffered by property, since such is the meaning of the word “damage,” which has nothing to do with the sense of the word “injury,” as understood by various American and English jurists. The word damage employed in the memorandum has been repeated in Article IV of the protocol, and translated in the English text by the word “injury.” In case of doubt, which of the two meanings should hold, the Italian or the English? Fiore, at paragraph 1036, says:

Where a word used in a treaty has a different juridical meaning in one State from that which it has in the other, it should be determined according as it is understood in the State to which the disposition of the treaty refers.

Evidently this State can be neither England nor the United States, but Italy, the English language having been employed simply for translation, or as an auxiliary tongue, because the third powers can have no part in a litigation which does not concern them. The language of a third nation can not have served except as a copy of the original substantiating the original in case of doubt, but is not to be construed against it. As a still further proof, it may be added that in the official documents published by the Venezuelan Government (Memorandum of December 11 and Gaceta Oficial, containing the official translation of the protocol), the words “danno” or injury were translated into “daño, daños,” which are the equivalent of the English term.

The sense of the word “danno,” as understood in the vernacular, as well as in Italian jurisprudence, is one and the same, whether referring to damages from natural causes, as storms, fire, etc., or the result of accident or intention, or to damages arising from war. While not wishing to enter into a juridical dissertation on this point, we will, nevertheless, remark that a damage caused by the fault of one occasioning it, directly or indirectly, becomes a civil crime or quasi crime. Only in practice has it happened that the meaning of quasi crime has sometimes been confused with that of damage, in order to avoid the reiteration of definitions and explanations already well understood.

In the Roman law the definition of injuria is taken from the Digest: "Injuriam accipimus damnum culpa datum," to become crime or quasi crime (in the English sense of "injury," which, however, at times simply means damage). To "damage" must therefore be added a new element—that of guilt. We say in Roman law that the "damnum est ademptio et quasi diminutio patrimonii;" that is to say, a subtraction and a quasi diminution of patrimony; in other words, an indirect loss equivalent to a diminution.

From the foregoing it follows that the protocol did not intend to distinguish between damages caused by unlawful acts and those brought about by civil war, and has not therefore eliminated those of the latter class which the jus gentium, according to some authorities, does not consider entitled to indemnity.

The Venezuelan Government having assumed so broad and extraordinary a responsibility as that of Article IV, should pay not only the damages caused by the revolution, but also those caused by the operations of war, such as bombardments, breaching of walls by shot during battle; in other words, all damages coming under "whatsoever title of credit or action against the Government of the Republic." It is useless to repeat here that Articles III and IV set a limit to the powers of this Commission as regards claims of the second class of the period 1898–1900, and for all other claims without exception, saving as provided in the last line of Article IV.

The responsibility sanctioned by the protocol is, according to the principle that a nation admitted to the concourse of civilized nations, as Venezuela has been, should be held responsible for whatever abnormal occurrences happen within its territory in damage to the interests of pacific foreigners and neutrals. Such is the view of the "Institute of International Law," and more than once expressed by that distinguished body, which counts as members the greatest expounders of the doctrine of the "jus gentium." And further, the rule of the institute itself, formulated after mature consideration and learned discussion, and representing, as it were, the last word in the science of argument, establishes the general responsibility of a state for damages occurring during an uprising or a revolution.

Text of the regulation on the responsibility of states for damages suffered by foreigners during riots, insurrections, or civil war, adopted by the Institute of International Law in the session of September 10, 1900.<sup>a</sup>

1. Independently of cases where indemnity may be due foreigners in virtue of the general laws of the country, foreigners have right to indemnity when they are injured in their person or property in the course of a riot, an insurrection, or a civil war; (a) when the act through which they have suffered is directed against foreigners as such, in general, or against them as subject to the jurisdiction of any given state; or (b) when the act from which they have suffered consists in the closing of a port without previous notification at a seasonable time, or the retention of foreign vessels in a port; or (c) when the damage results from an act contrary to law committed by an agent of the authority; or (d) when the obligation to indemnify is founded in virtue of the general principles of the laws of war.

2. The obligation is likewise established when the damage has been committed (No. 1 (a) and (d)) on the territory of an insurrectionary government, either by said government or by one of its functionaries. Nevertheless, demands for indemnity may in certain cases be set aside when they are based on acts which have occurred after the state to which the injured party belongs has recognized the insurrectionary government as a belligerent power, and when the injured party has continued to maintain his domicile or habitation in the territory of the insurrectionary government. So long as this latter is considered by the government of the injured party as a belligerent power, claims contemplated in line 1 of article 2 may be addressed only to the insurrectionary government, not to the legitimate government.

3. The obligation of indemnity ceases when the injured parties are themselves the cause of the events which have occasioned the injury.

There is evidently no obligation to indemnify those who have entered the country in contravention of a decree of expulsion, or those who go into a country or seek to engage in trade or commerce, knowing, or who should have known that disturbances have broken forth therein, no more than those who establish themselves or sojourn in a land offering no security by reason of the presence of savage tribes therein, unless the government of said country has given the emigrants assurances of a special character.

4. The government of a federal state composed of several small states represented by it from an international point of view, can not invoke, in order to escape the responsibility incumbent on it, the fact that the constitution of the federal state confers upon it no control over the several states, or the right to exact of them the satisfaction of their own obligations.

5. The stipulations mutually exempting states from the duty of extending their diplomatic protection must not include cases of a denial of justice, or of evident violation of justice, or of the jus gentium.

CONCLUSIONS.

1. The Institute of International Law expresses the hope that states will refrain from inserting in their treaties clauses of reciprocal irresponsibility. It believes that such clauses are wrong in that they dispense the states from the duty of protecting the foreigner in their territory.

It believes that states which, through a series of extraordinary circumstances, do not feel themselves to be in a position to insure in a sufficiently effective manner the protection of foreigners on their territory can not withdraw themselves from the consequences of such a state of things except by a temporary interdiction of their territory to foreigners.

2. Recourse to international commissions of inquest and international tribunals is, in general, recommended for all causes of damages suffered by foreigners in the course of a riot, an insurrection, or a civil war.

Is not the protocol of February 13 a sanction of these very principles which seem to be dictated by a desire to safeguard a pacific and well-ordered agreement among civilized nations? The council of contentious diplomacy in Rome referred directly to the foregoing expressions of the Institute of International Law in enunciating the views which served as a basic motive for the rupture of relations with Venezuela, and a demand for an equitable satisfaction.

In accord with this, Fiore, very far from sharing the opinions of the honorable umpire, as he seems persuaded, giving his views on the situation in Venezuela, thus defines her responsibility in the case of one Mammini, already known to this Commission.

The Venezuelan Government is especially responsible by reason of insufficient measures of security and a lack of vigilance in contravention of the principle laid down in the Italian-Venezuelan treaty of June 16, 1861, which provides that the citizens and subjects of one of the contracting states shall enjoy in the territory of the other the most constant protection and security in their persons, etc. (Extract of ministerial dispatch of March 29, 1899.)

It is clear, therefore, that Article IV refers to losses and deteriorations of property in civil wars, and to those inflicted by the government, by states, by the federation, and their employees, as well as by revolutionists, and undue appropriations chargeable to both parties.

We lay stress on the term "undue appropriations." To unduly appropriate an article is to despoil the legitimate owner to one's own profit, and is equivalent to enriching one's self at the expense of one's neighbor. Whatsoever spoliation, says the protocol, if undue—that is, without right on the part of the spoliator—must give occasion to a claim for indemnity. Thus was had in view the numerous spoliations and forced requisitions unjustly suffered by Italians, especially during the struggles between contending factions at times when foreigners were frequently unable to tell which represented the legitimate power. Such are the limits which the protocol assigns to the responsibility of a state, and this view is the only one which gives a logical and natural meaning to Article IV.

It is idle to insist that such a view is unreasonable and absurd in that, giving a too extended interpretation to Article IV, the Venezuelan Government would be obliged to recognize any claim for damages, even if inflicted by private individuals, and any claim which the royal legation might see fit to present. It is insinuated that in admitting such a responsibility the Venezuelan plenipotentiary would not have been in his right mind; but such a supposition is out of reason, because having accepted the situation we have clearly explained it was but natural he should have affirmed it. May he not have been in the same frame of mind which impelled the Commissioner for Venezuela in the French-Venezuelan Commission to accord, without objection, indemnity for revolutionary damages in 82 cases of the period 1900–1903?

If the French protocol of 1902, was, without objection by Venezuela, construed as allowing indemnity in a multitude of various cases, for the most part of revolutionary origin, running as far back as 1867, France having already had two settlements since that date, while Italy had had none, how can the latter nation be denied an equal treatment when it has a more stringent protocol and enjoys besides the provisions of the most favored nation clause?

Can the Venezuelan Commissioner above mentioned have intended to convey a lesson to the honorable Mr. Bowen, or did not, rather, the latter clearly recognize a condition of affairs so eminently logical and natural? Can the Commissioners and the umpires who on this point have so exactly agreed with the views here expressed be said to have lost their reason? If it be desired to ascertain the views of the high contracting parties, have we not here most precious data?

We have never maintained that indemnity should be exacted for damages inflicted by private parties for whatsoever motive. We have only sought to establish a responsibility for the state of disorder and insecurity arising from the revolutions which have almost continuously distracted the land, and obtain indemnity for damages in the past, with a moral guaranty for our people in the future.

This special responsibility the Institute of International Law establishes on a general principle such as to justify a demand for indemnity in all cases arising from riots and revolutions. In other words, there would be, according to the institute, a general responsibility from the very fact of the admission of Venezuela among the family of civilized nations. Having been received on a par with more progressive nations, it should guaranty order and security of persons and property. Failing in this, it should suffer the consequences of an habitual deviation from internal political order when such results in damage to its associates, and this in virtue of the principles of reciprocity of guaranties established on equal terms among civilized peoples. The International Institute lays down this concept as a fundamental maxim, and as the highest expression of progress in the "jus gentium."

Even should the Italian Commissioner not go as far as the Institute of International Laws in its conclusions on this point, he must insist that the protocol has established a concrete rule modeled after the most progressive doctrine, and this to him is sufficient.

But there is another point to be examined in this controversy. From our standpoint Venezuela has not been sufficiently diligent in the protection of foreigners—that degree of diligence the omission of which the honorable umpire himself holds to be sufficient to render the State responsible, and to receive claims for damages arising from the revolution. This lack of diligence consists not only in not preventing by appropriate means, but also in encouraging instead of repressing, the damages, violence, and spoliations charged.

To prove this it needs but to narrate in brief the different phases of the "Hernandez" revolution. This revolution, breaking out on May 2, 1898, interrupted on June 12 following, by the capture of its chief, burst forth afresh October 17, 1899. On May 27, 1900, Hernandez was again captured and shut up in the fortress of San Carlos to December 11, 1902. But his associates and partisans continued the war, coalescing subsequently with the forces of General Matos, who had in truth but a small following aside from the Hernandists.

The insurrection spread throughout almost all the Republic, embracing a majority of the nation, and involving an extraordinary organization. It established a de facto government, many even contending that the government so established in various States for considerable periods was more legitimate than that of the capital, alleging that the election of the President had been irregular and that the constitution was illegal, not having been duly published. But we will not enter into a discussion unsuited to a foreigner, who should be content to receive the protection and indemnity due him while respecting the laws of the country in which he lives.

Seeing itself unable to make headway against so many tireless enemies the Caracas Government compromised and offered guarantees and official positions to the principal leaders, civil and military, of the Hernandists, who controlled the most important nucleus of the revolution. In this guise attained to power, in part at least, the revolutionary party of "El Mocho" (Hernandez), which now has members in the cabinet, in Congress, among the high officials of the customs, and even among the presidents of the States. Some of these have governed uninterruptedly, first in the name of the revolution and now in the name of the Central Government. To others were given positions and emoluments, so that the revolution, to-day in subjection, might to-morrow become the controlling power of the Government.

For these reasons, in addition to the general responsibility sanctioned by the protocol, there is invoked here a special responsibility for the period of the Hernandez and Matos revolutions, the latter being a continuation of the former, whose adherents were its mainstay.

In the present case it is contended that the authorities failed in the use of due diligence. The officials who took part in the recent insurrections might, in fact should, be compelled to a restitution of the goods wrongfully taken. They should be proceeded against and condemned to punishment. But the Government has made no effort to punish or even prevent the wrong, nor is it our intention to advise it to do so, since we are not called upon to criticise its political movements. This policy, however, unquestionably weakens the guarantee of security to foreigners provided for by the treaties, by its constitution, and by international law. It would be absurd to require the claimant, in each case of damage from the Hernandez-Matos revolution, to prove that the Government could, but would not, prevent the damage, since the responsibility of that Government rises to the origin, even to the political and moral causes which precipitated the revolution, and depends upon the character and general consequences of civil war.

The case of Divine (Moore, Vol. 3, p. 2980) can not be appealed to in justification here. A pardon in certain special cases of riots is comprehensible, but certainly not in cases where revolution has progressed so far as to actually take on the functions of government.

In the present instance, either the Government is strong enough to crush the rebellion, and then it should punish at least the ringleaders, causing a restitution of the property unlawfully seized, or else, confessing its inability to cope successfully with the opposing faction, seek to compromise by sharing its functions with the leaders, and then the honorable umpire is in duty bound to award indemnity in virtue of the very principles admitted by him (on which we make reservations with the object of establishing a general responsibility) in the case of successful revolutions. And besides, in the Divine case there was no protocol containing so categorical a clause as that of Article IV of the protocol of February 13, 1903. In that case it is stated that governments granting pardon are not obliged to pay indemnity for damage inflicted by rebels, while in our case, leaving out the discussibility of the principle in virtue of which Mexico was absolved from paying indemnity in the case of Divine, an agreement was made ad hoc which could not have sanctioned the civil and penal impunity enjoyed de facto by the successful revolutionists now sharing in the legal Government. Not thus, without cause, was abandoned the obligation of protecting foreigners, which led to the extreme resort of the blockade. What weight would an isolated and little-known case in Mexico have in such a question by comparison with a general moral principle and the obligation of safeguarding the interests of foreigners?

Summing up our arguments, we maintain:

1. That no distinction should be drawn between revolutions wholly or partially successful.

2. Venezuela has been and is wanting in that degree of diligence which the umpire expressly recognizes as necessary to the exclusion of governmental responsibility.

Returning now to the construction to be given Article IV, let us determine to whom it belonged to make restrictions to the principle of general responsibility defined by the Institute of International Law and sanctioned by the protocol, and what modes of interpretation should be adopted for Article IV.

The making of restrictions, the elucidation of doubtful points, if such there can be, properly fell to the plenipotentiary for Venezuela. There having been submitted to him so rigid a draft of a protocol, one which insisted on a most categorical responsibility on the part of Venezuela (unprecedented in the annals of treaty making), would he not have refused to assent to the measure, if there had been any doubt in his mind, without further explanation? The opinion of Vattel (sec. 264, Vol. II), incorrectly invoked by the honorable umpire in favor of Venezuela, on the contrary, militates against that country. The Venezuelan Government, with power to explain itself clearly, failed to do so, and it can not now bring forward restrictions of which it gave no intimation in the protocol or during the negotiations at Washington. It accepted its responsibility in all cases of damages and wrongful takings and the admission of all claims without exception. On the other hand the Italian plenipotentiary based himself principally on the memorandum of December 11, above referred to, and on the well-understood meaning of the word "danno" (as was invoked by the honorable umpire himself, who has misinterpreted the intentions of the Royal Government and its plenipotentiary and their idea as to the character and extent of responsibility). The Italian ambassador had even considered the term "Matos revolution" (see the diplomatic documents), inserted in a first draft of the protocol, decisive though it was, not sufficiently rigid and comprehensive, and so preferred a more general formula, which would embrace all claims without exception. Who can complain if Venezuela did not see fit to protest against such general formula without precedent in diplomatic history? Certainly not Venezuela, as is evidenced by the fact that she allowed some 82 claims in the French-Venezuelan Commission for damages arising from the revolution without the least objection.

We will observe in passing that in the event of interpretation of clauses involving the interests of persons who have actually been injured, despoiled, and robbed, any doubt in regard thereto should be resolved, according to general principles of jurisprudence, preferably in favor of the injured party.

The opinion of Wharton (Digest, sec. 133) inclines in favor of the claimants, since the Royal Government knew the extension given to the responsibility of Venezuela and was itself the proposing party.

As to the opinion of Woolsey (sec. 113), it seemed derisive to speak of benefits for claimants while intending to reject their claims, since no real advantage is reserved to them, but at most only a part of what they have lost, and in the case of revolutionary damages, even that will be lost to them.

It is their right, their just due, that it is proposed to secure to them not a favor or a benefit, a just indemnity; perhaps incomplete, but certainly not a gift. The benefit will, on the contrary, fall to Venezuela, whose payments will be far less than they would be were she to pay all she justly owes.

The vague opinion of Pradier-Fodéré (sec. 1188), quoted in the Sambiaggio case, is not sufficient to neutralize the effect of a public treaty so grave and important as is the protocol, under the pretext that there is something doubtful in its provisions and it can only have reference to matters of detail and not to the essence of an express stipulation. Were it so wished it would be possible to find in the clearest and most explicit of texts some elements of doubt and uncertainty by which its most equitable and just purposes might be assailed. What would be the use of protocols if they are to be opposed at every step by doubts, uncertain principles of international law, complex local legislation, and generic and hypothetic views of authors who, under the cloak of the rarely-applicable opinion of Pradier-Fodéré, would emasculate every provision drawn in the interest of unfortunate foreigners whose indemnities Venezuela has undertaken to pay.

How many opinions or maxims might not be adduced in favor of injured Italians! Calvo (par. 1650) says:

Les traités étant essentiellement des contrats de bonne foi (actus bonæ fidei) doivent avant tout s'interpréter dans le sens de l'équité et du droit strict. Lorsqu'il n'y a aucune ambiguïté dans les mots, que la signification est évidente, et ne conduit pas à des résultats contraires à la saine raison, on n'a pas le droit d'en fausser le sens et la portée pratique par des arguties et des conjectures plus ou moins plausibles.

Is it not an evident violation of the foregoing rule to seek to twist and distort out of their obvious meaning the words of a treaty, and to confuse the word "danno" with the word "delitto," or "quasi-delitto civile" (see art. 1151 et seq. of the Italian Civil Code), instead of applying to them their common meaning, spread throughout the entire Italian legislation?

Fiore (par. 1037) recommends:

The second general rule which it appears to us should be established is suggested to us by Grotius, and this is that, even though the intention of the parties and that to which they have consented is to be considered as expressed in the words written and subscribed to, nevertheless there should be found a meaning in harmony with that which the parties intended, and not have recourse to pitiful subtleties to destroy by the dead letter the true intent of the contracting parties.

Now, who will undertake to say that the plenipotentiaries at Washington intended to elaborate out of their own minds that complicated tissue of hypothesis and technicalities upon the word "danno" with a view to giving it a meaning out of the ordinary, and such as to exclude the payment of indemnity for revolutionary damages—that is to say, more than half of all the Italian claims—while the honorable umpire, speaking of damages of the revolution, by this alone seems to give the word the meaning invoked by us in the name of common sense.

But it is superfluous, nay, even injurious to the cause of justice, to indulge in so many quotations, precedents, decisions of tribunals more or less obscure or contradictory, contrary to the spirit of the protocol, which takes equity as its principal rule of action. The Italian Commissioner and the royal legation have no desire to and can not follow in this road the other members of the arbitral Commission, since, so intending, they might by similar means destroy the integrity of any protocol whatsoever. "Give me but two words of any man's utterance," said Napoleon, "and I will undertake to hang him."

It would thus be possible to take away every vestige of restriction to the powers of the Commission as established by Article IV, which stipulates that in the case of damage or unlawful seizure it must determine if the damage actually occurred, if the seizures were unlawful, and what amount shall be paid.

Now, is it logical and equitable to say the damage took place, the Venezuelan Government is responsible in principle? These things are indisputable. But nothing will be awarded because the plenipotentiaries, though admitting that awards should be made to claimants who were fortunate enough to see the troops who despoiled them enter Caracas, decided to reject the claims of those whose damages were caused by those who did not succeed, but might yet do so, almost as if it had been their intention to cast the fortunes of these claimants on the hazard of a die, or the chances of success of the opposing factions as one would wager on the result of a horse race (in fact, Matos was still in the field after February 13). Would it not have been much more simple and logical to clothe the Commission with unlimited powers by suppressing altogether Article IV and thus, without words, say to the Commission: "Judge with full and absolute liberty, whether the damage done be legal or illegal, according or contrary to international law?" Where do we find international law, the existence of which is opposed by many, and which is of no force and effect without the mutual consent of the parties, sanctioned by the protocol as a rule of action, giving it preponderance over an express and mandatory clause?

Finally the following point is insisted upon: To say that Article IV, which affirms and establishes in principle the responsibility of Venezuela for damages to property, was simply and only intended to eliminate the objections which had in the past been discussed between the two Governments, is contrary to the rule of international law in matters of interpretation of treaties which states that each special clause must have a special object. Now, in order to do away with the objections formulated by Venezuela on the basis of her laws and the decree of 1873 with regard to claims, it would have been quite sufficient to invoke: First, the constitution of the Mixed Commissions having jurisdiction over all claims without exception, thus avoiding decrees and local legislation; second, Article II of the supplemental protocol of May 7 which removed objections of a technical nature, or those founded on the provisions of local legislation. The reservations made by Article IV have therefore another purpose and may not be considered vain or superfluous by a long argument based on the very local laws so expressly disregarded by the Italian plenipotentiary at Washington, and appeals to which were expressly prohibited by Article II of the protocol of May 7.

It is curious to note how, on certain occasions, for reasons which escape our comprehension, Venezuela pays for damages committed by the revolution, as for instance in the case of Gen. Manuel Corrao, who received 7482.29 bolivars for loss of stamps stolen from him by revolutionists. (See Gaceta Oficial of August 14, 1903.) It may be urged that this is simply a case of voluntary relief to which the Government was in nowise compelled.

But why afford relief when all should suffer equally; why derogate indirectly and in favor of certain privileged ones to a principle which is proclaimed as absolute?

Let us now examine the question solely from the standpoint of equity.

It is repugnant to the umpire to hold the Venezuelan Government responsible for damages caused by revolutionists, for the reason that they are the enemies against which Venezuela is fighting. At first this seems plausible, but in fact is not so. It is not a case of foreign enemies penetrating from outside into the national territory and robbing the inhabitants. It is rather a case of damages committed by insubordinate subjects, whose very insubordination must be held as due to a lack of care and provision on the part of the Government.

The Venezuelan revolutionists are not belligerents, and they have not been regarded as such by either Venezuela or the powers. Their repression is wholly a question of internal policy, and Venezuela can not, in order to escape her responsibility, invoke the rules of international law, applicable only and in a certain measure to damages caused by belligerents.

For the chronic condition of internal political agitation in Venezuela some one must be found morally responsible, and this some one can be none other than the Government, upon whom falls, as a logical consequence, likewise a material responsibility for all damages occasioned by the revolutions.

In addition to refusing indemnities for damages caused by revolutionists, the honorable umpire places foreigners in a condition of manifest inferiority to the natives in so far as regards the protection of their persons and property. The latter may defend themselves by force of arms, the former can not. The natives run the chances of perils or advantages consequent upon the discomfiture or the success of the party to which they belong; but there is nothing for the foreigner but perils and damages. Justice demands, then, that provision be made for a relative indemnity, and thus in favor of the latter the powers have intervened and the protocols of Washington have been framed.

It is futile to say that the carrying out of these protocols will place the foreigners in better position than that occupied by Venezuelans. Venezuela is under no obligation not to indemnify her citizens, and she can readily place them on a par with the foreigners in this respect, as she has done in certain cases of revolutionary damages. Italy has nothing to do with this phase of the question. She only asks that justice be done her sons, and is in nowise concerned with those whom she is not bound to protect. So that if any difference of treatment exists, the fault thereof will not lie at her door, nor will her demands on that account be less equitable.

The refusal to grant indemnity for revolutionary damages will be a grave offense against equity under another point of view. It is a fact that the troops of the Government have everywhere defeated those of the revolution, and that all the arms, ammunition, stores, animals, money, etc., in possession of these latter, have passed into the possession of the former, for their use and disposal. Almost all of this property was violently, or at least unduly, taken from the inhabitants, and it is no exaggeration to say that the larger share belonged to foreigners. Were the honorable umpire to deny indemnity to the foreigners in question he would be sanctioning an enrichment of the Venezuelan Government at their expense—a thing which to us appears contrary to justice.

When, therefore, damages have been inflicted upon foreigners simultaneously by government and by revolutionary troops, or successively by either, it has frequently been impossible for claimants, perhaps for a lack of eyewitnesses easily understood at times of agitation and terror, perhaps because the courts were not in operation for months after the occurrences complained of, to determine what portion of the damages suffered by them were chargeable to one and what to the other party—i. e., government or revolution.

Now, it may happen that in these cases the honorable umpire will fail to find elements by which to discriminate between damages entitled to indemnity and those to which he has so far refused it. He must, therefore, either integrally accept the claims or reject them utterly. In the first hypothesis—the only just and acceptable one—he will run counter to the principles heretofore laid down by him; in the second he will deny the sacredness of a right admitted without restrictions of any kind by Venezuela herself.

Let us now cast a look to the future. However optimistic we may choose to be, it would be difficult to believe that revolutions in Venezuela are at an end. Hence, future revolutionists, (never, according to our experience, promptly suppressed), strong in the decision of the honorable umpire, may with absolute impunity make themselves masters of the persons or property of Italians with entire freedom from any obligation to indemnify in the event of their party not being successful. This feeling of security will be a powerful incentive to abuses of every sort, while the assurance that the country would in every instance be held to a strict accountability for damages inflicted upon foreigners could not but act as a salutary check.

The decision in the Sambiaggio claim on the other hand will strongly tend to make Italians heedless of their neutrality, for even the honorable umpire himself would hardly expect these people to rise to the sublime heroism of allowing themselves, with meekness and equanimity, to be stripped of their possessions by revolutions, with the certainty that their claims would never be indemnified. They will have to either resort to arms for self defense, or, making common cause with the revolutionists, assist these latter to attain to power as the only means of securing reimbursement. All of which would injure the peace of the Republic and tend to inaugurate a profoundly immoral and subversive state of affairs.

Great as may be, therefore, the responsibility which the honorable umpire seems thus far disposed to assume for past events, a much greater will rest upon him in the future, either on account of attempts upon the life and property of Italian citizens, or the political tranquillity of the Republic, which, in view of its best interests, can hardly be grateful to him should he in this present claim decide not to adopt principles different from those governing his previous decision.

Let us now consider the treatment to which Italian subjects are entitled under the provisions of the "most-favored-nation" clause contained in the Italian-Venezuelan treaty of 1861, and confirmed with especial reference to claims in the Washington protocol of February 13, 1903.

Assuming that the Guastini claim (which, had it been French, would have been awarded indemnity for revolutionary damages, but, being Italian, is in danger of rejection) seems expressly calculated to render more glaring the injustice of the treatment which it is proposed to inflict upon our fellow-citizens, let us call attention to the fact that the treaty of 1861 has never been repealed, and has never for a moment ceased to be in force. There has been no declaration of war between Italy and Venezuela, and the blockade has been no more than an interruption of diplomatic relations, which could not have annulled existing treaties according to the opinion of the best authorities on international law.<sup>a</sup>

It is true that Article VIII of the protocol of February 13 speaks of the treaty as being "renewed." But if we consider well we will see that the word was used ad abundantiam, to obviate all future doubt and discussion. In the said article there is no explicit declaration that the treaty had ceased to exist, and the sole purpose in view was precisely to explicitly confirm the "most-favored-nation" clause now in force, and to give it so full and ample an application as to render its elusion by subterfuge impossible.

It was not possible to more clearly express this intention than was done by the phrase—

The Italians in Venezuela and Venezuelans in Italy shall in all respects, and particularly in the matter of claims, enjoy the provisions of the most favored nation clause, as stipulated in article 26 (of the treaty).

In order that the scope of this fact might not suffer diminution from any restrictive interpretation of Article IV of the treaty, which, without excluding better conditions, provides that Italians in Venezuela shall not in any case receive a less favorable treatment than that accorded the nationals, the last line of Article VIII of the protocol provides that the treaty shall never be invoked against the provisions of the protocol.

In the decision in the Sambiaggio case not only was there no account made of this provision of the last line of Article VIII of the protocol of February 13 and the treaty invoked against it, but there was likewise invoked the noted Article IV, to prevent the application of which it is well known that the last clause of Article VIII, above mentioned, was especially framed, if it be desired to discuss the question logically and with unprejudiced mind. But let us admit, for the sake of argument, that the treaty of 1861 was no longer in force on February 13 of this year. None the less would the "most favored nation" clause apply in favor of Italian claimants since the treaty was renewed and confirmed by the protocol of that date.

In fact, it can not logically be held that so important a clause of a protocol framed expressly to settle a preceding question with regard to claims should not be applied to the claims themselves; to claims of a civil war not yet then terminated, and which continued for five months after the signing of that instrument.

It is in any event an unquestioned rule of law that an explanatory clause is retroactive in its effect, because, except in cases of resjudicata, it tends to clear up the intention of the legislator, and, in the present case, that of the original negotiators.

Fiore, after a long discussion of this subject, thus sums up his arguments in the following maxim (par. 1012):

The effects of international conventions extend, on general principles, to juridical relations established and formed prior to the stipulations of the treaty. A contrary provision might, however, be provided by express agreement.

This "express agreement" does not appear either in the treaty or in the protocol, and hence the umpire's concept of the nonretroactivity of Article VIII of the protocol does not seem to conform to the principles of international law.

To us, however, it seems clearly established that the "most favored nation" clause should apply in every supposable case in the interests of Italian claimants. It remains to be seen whether this application may be invoked by us in view of the decisions rendered in the French-Venezuelan and German-Venezuelan Commissions, in which indemnities were granted to French and German claimants for revolutionary damages.

With regard to this, it has been objected that if this principle were admitted, should those commissions subsequently render decisions of an opposite nature, it would become necessary for this Commission to follow them in this devious and uncertain path. Hence it has been concluded that this Commission is not to accept as binding on it decisions rendered in the others.

We will merely observe, in relation to the foregoing supposition, and more especially with reference to the French-Venezuelan Commission, that the latter has about terminated its labors, that more than eighty indemnities for revolutionary damages have been granted without discussion on the part of the Venezuelan delegate in said Commission, and that when he, with tardy objections attempted to raise difficulties, the umpire cut short those objections by declaring that there must be complete similarity between damages created by the Government and those of the revolution. So far as the German-Venezuelan Commission is concerned, we have time to consider this point, and should it transpire that its decisions have changed we will not refuse to do so, but there is no reason to anticipate such change, in view of the evident equity of the course so far adopted by it.

It suffices us that a single one of the Commissions assembled in Caracas for the settlement of foreign claims should have granted indemnity for revolutionary damages to give us the right to demand and obtain that an equal treatment be accorded Italian claimants.

In fact, the decisions in this sense of a single Commission even would constitute the authentic and sovereign interpretation of the treaty and of the protocol stipulated by the Venezuelan Government for the pacific settlement of claims brought forward by subjects of the respective nations. Hence it is that, according to the protocols and treaties, of which the decisions of the Commissions are the unchallengeable interpretations, we demand for our fellow-citizens the application of the "most-favored-nation" clause. But granting that Article IV of our protocol lends itself to a double interpretation, which we positively deny, the honorable umpire should, even reluctantly, give a decision granting indemnity for revolutionary damages, in order to avoid giving one which, in view of the action of the French and German Commissions in this respect, would be in open contradiction with the provisions of Article VIII of the protocol of February 13, above named.

If the treatment accorded the most favored nation be not accorded us by the granting of indemnity for revolutionary damages, in what other case may we hope to obtain this advantage? What effect, if not this, has the clause referred to? Shall we remain satisfied with a differential treatment which leaves us in a position of manifest inferiority, when the treaty of 1861 and the Washington protocol guarantee to us the contrary in the widest and most explicit manner?

If the honorable umpire rejects claims for revolutionary damages, the effect will be as though Article VIII of the Washington protocol had not been written, or as if the provisions of the same were to have no application—a conclusion repugnant at once to intellect and to conscience. In short, such a course would be tantamount to an emasculation of the entire protocol, since what has so far been granted by the honorable umpire is nothing if not that which in principle was not refused by Venezuela, even before the framing of that instrument—that is, that indemnity should be granted for damages caused by the Government or its agents. Now, when it is considered that, as has already been remarked, the Venezuelan Commissioner in the French Commission conceded, without discussion, over 80 claims for revolutionary damages, it should logically and in good faith be recognized that the interpretation given in that tribunal to the French protocol, much less explicit than ours, is the one admitted by the Venezuelan Government itself.

If, indeed, the Commissioners are free to judge according to rules of equity and justice, and with full and absolute independence, the facts and circumstances on which the claims are based, and the efficacy of the respective proofs, they are none the less, in questions of principle, as in the question of revolutionary damages, bound by the instructions of their governments, and governed by them in the judgments they render.

None of us has accepted the honorable charge which has been intrusted to him without first thoroughly investigating between what limits and according to what general rules lay the duties of his office. Our appointment as Commissioners, who are not exactly or exclusively judges, clearly shows this.

The diplomatic course pursued by Italy in Venezuela in favor of her claimants, if always inspired by extreme moderation, has nevertheless constantly aimed to secure to injured Italians a treatment analogous to that granted to other foreigners. The honorable umpire will find an absolute proof of this in the documents we send herewith, which are all of an earlier date than that of the protocol of February 13, to wit, in the note of the royal Italian legation at Caracas to the Venezuelan minister of foreign affairs of April 24, 1901, in that of the Italian minister of foreign affairs at Rome to the United States ambassador at Rome, in a telegram of the aforesaid minister to the ambassadors at Berlin, London, and Washington and in the telegraphic reply to the latter.

Convinced that the honorable umpire will recognize that Italy is not here asking more than it has always been her intention to ask, even prior to the negotiations at Washington, we await with confidence a decision from him in favor of the claimant, Luigi Guastini in the sum of 582 bolivares for damages inflicted upon him by civil authorities and for judicial expenses, and in the sum of 6,247 bolivars on account of requisitions, forced loans, and other damages from troops and authorities of the revolution, or a total of 6,829 bolivars.

ZULOAGA, Commissioner:

In this case the honorable Commissioner for Italy has deemed it proper to reopen the discussion touching the responsibility of Venezuela for damages caused by acts of revolutionists, especially with reference to the Washington protocol.

To me it seems that the decision of the honorable umpire, given in the Sambiaggio case, has settled the question. The Commissioners fully stated their opinion in that case before the honorable umpire, verbally and in writing, and he then gave a learned and extended decision in which were carefully considered and solved all the points which the honorable Commissioner for Italy now desires to reconsider, and I believe the subject to be exhausted, as appears proven by the fact that the new opinion of the honorable Commissioner simply endeavors to refute the decision of the umpire. I will not undertake for my part to make a new exposition, since it would only result in uselessly prolonging the labors of the Commission.

Venezuela never accepted responsibility for claims arising from acts of revolutionists, as is evidenced by her laws. In the case referred to by the honorable Commissioner for Italy, which appears to be inferred from an Executive resolution published in the Gaceta Oficial of August 14, only by a strained interpretation may it be construed that the Government had accepted such responsibility. There was no disbursement in payment thereof, nor was it paid in any other way.

The honorable Commissioner for Italy insists that the French-Venezuelan Commission accepted revolutionary claims, and referring thereto I will quote here the opinion of the Venezuelan Commissioner in that Commission:

Notwithstanding the respect which the Commissioner for Venezuela owes to the decision which has been rendered by the honorable umpire in the claim of Antoine Bonifacio and in other cases where indemnity has been claimed for damages to property by revolutionary forces which have committed depredations in various sections of the Republic, and principally in the town of Carúpano, I consider it my duty to maintain the opinion heretofore expressed by me, that claims based on negotiations, loans contracted between revolutionary chiefs and private individuals, as well as those for forced requisitions and damages sustained at the hands of revolutionary troops by neutrals, do not affect the responsibility of the Government of Venezuela.<sup>a</sup>

The historical-political narration made by the honorable Commissioner for Italy for the purpose of deducing the responsibility of the Venezuelan Government for its lack of diligence in suppressing the revolution is weakened by serious inaccuracy in both its general scope and minor details. The Venezuelan Government did energetically and resolutely attack the revolution, and the fact of its having continued to the present year was due to the action of the three allied powers in destroying the war vessels of the Government, with which Venezuela was pursuing the dismembered revolutionists, permitting the latter to reorganize, and thus cause new and bloody combats.

"The most-favored-nation" clause invoked by the honorable Commissioner for Italy finds no place in the labors of this Commission, but refers solely to the drawing up of treaties, not to the application of their provisions, which must necessarily depend on the point of view of those who construe them. It would be well to note, however, that it is extremely difficult to determine which is the nation having the most favored claimants in these mixed commissions.

In some, as in this one, by the decision of the umpire a long delay has been granted for the presentation of the claims; in others, not. In some, the consideration of proof has been left absolutely free; in others, not. In some, the responsibility of the Government for acts of revolutionists has not been admitted, while admitting its responsibility for the acts of its agents; in others, the Government has been held accountable for the acts of revolutionists, but not for the acts of its agents. Again, interest has been allowed in some commissions, and not in others. England has presented no revolutionary claims, yet it has a protocol similar to the Italian. By what criterion is it possible to determine which is the most favored nation in carrying out the provisions of the various protocols?

There remains but a brief consideration of the serious charge made by the honorable Commissioner for Italy that the doctrine of the non-responsibility of the Government for acts of revolutionists will prejudice the peace of the Republic and tend to inaugurate a profoundly immoral and subversive state of things, and, he adds, the umpire will incur a grave responsibility for future attempts against the lives and property of Italians in Venezuela, and even for the peace of the Republic, in deciding, as he has, that the Government can not be held for the acts of the revolution.

Immoral and unjust it is to assume to withdraw Venezuela from the operation of laws which govern all cultured peoples, and insist that the honorable umpire shall decide accordingly. Immoral and unjust to ask that foreigners in Venezuela shall be governed by laws other than those under which Venezuelans themselves live, and that the Government shall be as an insurance company against real or imaginary losses from force majeure, and profoundly immoral it would be, as well, to advocate the doctrine that the state is responsible for acts of revolutionists.

Foreigners should be interested in the preservation of peace and public order, and they have numerous ways of contributing thereto without intervening in the politics of the country. But the day when the state is made responsible for the damages mentioned will see foreigners grow indifferent to the continuance of public peace, aye, and even become eager to foment revolution, as a means of acquiring by trumped-up claims what they might not be able to obtain by means of honest labor.

The honorable Commissioner for Italy seems unduly preoccupied as to the future. In the future the foreigner in Venezuela will live as he has in the past—under the constitution of the country, which establishes that the nation has no more or greater obligations toward them than it has toward its own citizens, according to the laws of the land—as the Venezuelans themselves live, who know very well that under the law they have no right to claims for damages committed by revolutionists.

I am confident that the honorable umpire, abiding by his decision, will reject the claim of Guastini as one based on acts of revolutionists.

RALSTON, Umpire:

The above case has been referred to the umpire upon difference of opinion between his honorable associates relative to an allowance for damages committed by insurgents during the recent revolution.

The questions presented in this respect are the same as those presented by the recent case of Salvatore Sambiaggio, No. 13,<sup>a</sup> in which the umpire reviewed in extenso the subject of responsibility of the Government for revolutionary damages in the case of unsuccessful revolution. In the present case, as before, the honorable Commissioner for Italy has presented a learned and able exposition of his views, which exposition has received the careful and respectful consideration of the umpire. He is, however, unable to change the views then expressed, but feels obligated to discuss briefly some of the fundamental positions taken on behalf of Italy.

The honorable Commissioner for Italy rests his opinions largely upon the assumed inequity of a refusal to require the Government to pay such revolutionary damages. The subject was fully investigated by the umpire in the former opinion, in addition to which discussion he desires now to call attention to article 21 of the treaty of 1892 between Italy and Colombia, which reads as follows:

It is also stipulated between the two contracting parties that the Italian Government will not hold the Colombian Government responsible, save in the case of

proven fault or negligence on the part of the Colombian authorities or of their agents, for injuries occasioned in time of insurrection or civil war to Italian citizens in Colombian territory, through acts of rebels or caused by savage tribes beyond the control of the Government.<sup>a</sup>

The foregoing sufficiently indicated the opinion of the Italian foreign office, and, in exact accord as it is with the opinion he expressed in the Sambiaggio case (as well as with a fair interpretation of the Italian-Venezuelan treaty of 1861, as pointed out in the case mentioned), confirms the ideas of the umpire; for had Italy believed such a clause inequitable and unjust to her subjects that enlightened and cultivated nation would never have solemnly ratified a treaty with Colombia, situated as it was and is like Venezuela, containing such a provision.

It is worthy of note that, according to the opinions of nearly if not quite all the umpires now in Caracas in the various Commissions, there exists no legal responsibility on the part of Government for the acts of unsuccessful revolutionists. Such is the view of the umpire of the English and Netherlands Commission,<sup>b</sup> of the German Commission,<sup>c</sup> and, as it appears, of the Spanish Commission.<sup>d</sup> Furthermore, it is the opinion of the umpires above referred to (save that of the Spanish Commission, possibly) that such claims are inequitable. It is true that the umpire of the German Commission, influenced by a construction of his protocol which this umpire can not conscientiously follow, has allowed (but within strict limits) certain claims of the character in question. It is also true that the umpire of the Spanish Commission, notwithstanding his apparent belief as to their illegality, has granted claims of this nature, considering the objections raised thereto by Venezuela as "technical," and therefore opposed to the protocol. This view the present umpire is unable to accept, believing as he does that an objection going to the foundation of the right to recover can not be regarded as technical. In addition to the Commissions above named, the American Commission has already indicated<sup>e</sup> that it would deny the right to recover for claims of this nature. Nothing is said above about the decision of the umpire of the French Commission, as, according to information furnished, the reasons for his decision were not given and the particular facts are unknown.

To the suggestion that Italy is entitled to the benefit of the "most-favored-nation" clause contained in the protocol, and that she has been deprived of it—a point argued at length and ably—it only remains to add that Italy obtained from Venezuela a protocol, certainly so far as this discussion is concerned, more favorable than those given other nations, for while (to illustrate) under the German protocol Venezuela admitted its liability—in cases where the claim is for injury to or wrongful seizure of property, and consequently the Commission will not have to decide the question of liability, but only whether the injury or the seizure of property were wrongful acts, and what amount of compensation is due, in the Italian protocol Venezuela admitted its—liability in cases where the claim is for injury to persons and property, and for wrongful seizure of the latter, and consequently the questions which the Mixed Commission will have to decide in such cases will only be: (a) Whether the injury took place or whether the seizure was wrongful; and (b) if so, what amount of compensation is due.

The French protocols contain no similar admission.

It is true that there have existed differences of opinion among umpires as to the responsibility of Venezuela for acts of unsuccessful revolutionists; but such differences of opinion, relating as they do to questions of international law or of the construction of protocols, can not be said to have any relation to a "most-favored-nation" clause obligatory upon Venezuela, which nation has apparently given Italy all she promised. These opinions may be studied to advantage, but they are not protocols, nor are they "treatment," within the meaning of the Italian-Venezuelan agreement.

It is greatly urged that the decision in the Sambiaggio case rested largely upon the meaning of the word "injury," and that the word "danni," used in the Italian version of the protocol, has a vastly different meaning. To this observation several answers are to be made. The text of the protocol is in English and Italian. It was the result of long negotiations between the representatives of England, Germany, and Italy on the one hand, and Mr. Bowen, Venezuela's representative, on the other. These negotiations were carried on almost altogether in English, and the drafts (afterwards becoming protocols) were in English. It is therefore evident that the basic language is English, and in case of difference of translation resort should be had to it.

But if this were not so, no difficulty would arise. We must conceive that the language employed, used as it was in a document in a sense legal, is to be interpreted with some regard to law. Examinations of articles 1151-1152 of the Italian Civil Code, with reference to "danni," "quasi delitti," shows that:

1151. Any act of man which results in damage to others obliges the one through whose fault the damage occurred to indemnify therefor.

1152. Every one is responsible for the damage which he has occasioned, not only by his individual act, but also by his own negligence or imprudence.

Careful examination of these words descriptive of "danni" will fail to show any difference between its significance where used in a legal way, and that of the word "injury" similarly employed, for there always exists the idea of responsibility only for acts with which one has some association, physically or by intentment of law.

Furthermore, if difference exist, it should be settled in favor of the party obligated, as pointed out under other conditions in the Sambiaggio case.

Although the umpire has the highest respect for the opinions of the Institute of International Law, which are referred to by the honorable Commissioner,<sup>a</sup> he does not discuss them specifically, as the principles covered by the citation made by him have received the attention of the umpire at great length, so far as they may be esteemed pertinent to the present case.

The claimant demands 150 bolivars for having paid double license to the revolutionary authorities in 1902 and 1903. The facts in connection with this item appear to be as follows:

The claimant paid—

		Bolivars.
To the revolutionists:
Apr. 1, 1902.	For second quarter of 1902 .....	50
July 16, 1902.	For third quarter of 1902 .....	50
Mar. 10, 1903.	For first quarter of 1903 .....	50
To the Government:
Jan. 1, 1902.	For first quarter of 1902 .....	50
Mar. 24, 1903.	For the entire year of 1902 and first quarter of 1903 .....	250

It appears from the receipts evidencing the foregoing that during the period named the claimant was a merchant of the fifth class at El Pilar, and subject to annual license of 200 bolivars, payable quarterly.

It is impossible to grant the claim in the manner presented. If the taxes were wrongfully exacted by the revolutionary authorities the Government can not be required to refund them.

But the claimant apparently has a ground of recovery founded upon another principle. We are justified in believing from the evidence in the case that during nine months of 1902, and at least to March 10, 1903, the revolutionary authorities were in possession of El Pilar. The claimant was therefore authorized, and we may presume compelled, to pay them the license fees which would have been payable to the legitimate authorities had they controlled the town. In fact, without such payment or some other, he could not have gained his livelihood as a merchant. A payment to them discharged (at least so far as the "expediente" informs us) his obligations toward his municipality. For him in his local relations the revolutionary authorities were the Government. They constituted his municipal government de facto.

We learn from Bouvier's Law Dictionary (Rawle's edition, title de facto) that:

Where there is an office to be filled, and one acting under color of authority fills the office and discharges its duties, his actions are those of an officer de facto, and are binding on the public. 159 U. S., 596. An officer in the actual exercise of executive power would be an officer de facto, and as such distinguished from one who, being legally entitled to such power, is deprived of it—such a one being an officer de jure only. * * * An officer de facto is prima facie one de jure. * * * An officer de facto is frequently considered an officer de jure, and legal validity allowed his official acts.

Money paid, therefore to the de facto authorities in the shape of public dues must be considered as lawfully paid, and receipts given by them regarded as sufficient to discharge the obligations to which they relate. Any other view would compel the taxpayer to determine at his own peril the validity of the acts of those exercising public functions in a regular manner.

We must apply to the facts before us the principle which would be invoked if the acting jefe civil had been illegally appointed or elected by legal authorities acting improperly. In such case no dispute could possibly exist as to the right of the taxpayer to be protected by payment to such illegal but acting officer.

Says Morawitz on Corporations, sec. 640:

In order to secure the peaceful and orderly government of the community, the rule has been established that the right of a de facto public officer to exercise the powers of his office can not be investigated in a collateral proceeding. It must be determined once for all times in a direct proceeding to oust the officer.

In Norton v. Shelby Co., 118 U. S., 425, the Supreme Court of the United States held that where an office exists under law, it matter not how the appointment of the incumbent is made, so far as the validity of his acts are concerned. It is enough that he is clothed with the insignia of the office and exercises the power and functions.

Let us add another consideration. During the period for which taxes were collected by the revolutionary government, the legitimate government (as we may believe from the "expediente") performed no acts of government in El Pilar. It did not insure personal protection, carry on schools, attend to the needs of the poor, conduct courts, maintain streets and roads, look after the public health, etc. The revolutionary officials, whether they efficiently performed these duties or not during the time in question, displaced the legitimate authorities and undertook their performance. The legitimate government therefore was not entitled at a later period to collect anew taxes once paid to insure the benefits of local government which it was unable to confer.

We need not question the obligation of taxpayers to pay to the rightful authorities taxes accrued but not paid during illegitimate government. That does not enter into this discussion.

If the opinion above expressed need support from precedent and the views of others, it is at hand. A situation analogous to that now presented arose out of the holding of the town of Castine, near the eastern extremity of the State of Maine, by the British during the war of 1812 between the United States and Great Britain. That eminent jurist, Justice Story, in passing upon the questions presented to the United States Supreme Court, said (U. S. v. Rice, 4 Wheaton, 246):

The single question arising on the pleadings in this case is, whether goods imported into Castine, during its occupation by the enemy, are liable to the duties imposed by the revenue laws upon goods imported into the United States. It appears by the pleadings that on the 1st day of September, 1814, Castine was captured by the enemy and remained in his exclusive possession, under the command and control of his military and naval forces, until after the ratification of the treaty of peace, in February, 1815. During this period the British Government exercised all civil and military authority over the place, and established a custom-house and admitted goods to be imported according to regulations prescribed by itself, and, among others, admitted the goods upon which duties are now demanded. These goods remained at Castine until after it was evacuated by the enemy, and, upon the reestablishment of the American Government, the collector of the customs, claiming a right to American duties on the goods, took the bond in question from the defendant for the security of them.

Under these circumstances we are all of opinion that the claim for duties can not be sustained. By the conquest and military occupation of Castine the enemy acquired that firm possession which enabled him to exercise the fullest rights of sovereignty over that place. The sovereignty of the United States over the territory was, of course, suspended, and the laws of the United States could no longer be rightfully enforced there or be obligatory upon the inhabitants who remained and submitted to the conquerors. By the surrender the inhabitants passed under a temporary allegiance to the British Government, and were bound by such laws, and such only, as it chose to recognize and impose. From the nature of the case no other laws could be obligatory upon them, for where there is no protection, or allegiance, or sovereignty, there can be no claim to obedience. Castine was, therefore, during this period, so far as respected our revenue laws, to be deemed a foreign port, and goods imported into it by the inhabitants were subject to such duties only as the British Government chose to require. Such goods were, in no correct sense, imported into the United States. The subsequent evacuation by the enemy and resumption of authority by the United States did not and could not change the character of the previous transactions. The doctrines respecting the jus postliminii are wholly inapplicable to the case. The goods were liable to American duties when imported, or not at all. That they were not so liable at the time of importation is clear, from what has been already stated, and when, upon the return of peace, the jurisdiction of the United States was reassumed, they were in the same predicament as they would have been if Castine had been a foreign territory, ceded by treaty to the United States, and the goods had been previously imported there. In the latter case there would be no pretense to say that American duties could be demanded, and, upon principles of public or municipal law, the cases are not distinguishable. The authorities cited at the bar would, if there were any doubt, be decisive of the question. But we think it too clear to require any aid from authority.

American statesmen have since followed the precedent. For instance, in 1873, Secretary Fish wrote to Mr. Nelson (Wharton's Digest of Int. Law, vol. 1, sec. 7, p. 29):

The obligation of obedience to a government at a particular place in a country may be regarded as suspended, at least, when its authority is usurped, and is due to the usurpers if they choose to exercise it. To require a repayment of duties in such cases is tantamount to the exaction of a penalty on the misfortune, if it may be so called, of remaining and carrying on business in a port where the authority of the government had been annulled. * * * Since the close of the civil war in this country suits have been brought against importers for duties on merchandise paid to insurgent authorities. Those suits, however, have been discontinued, that proceeding probably having been influenced by the judgment of the Supreme Court adverted to. (U. S. v. Rice, 4 Wheaton, 248.)

Without multiplying at length possible citations, reference is also made to a letter to like effect from Mr. Cass, Secretary of State, to Mr. Osma, dated May 22, 1858. (Wharton's Int. Law Digest, vol. 1, sec. 7, p. 28.)

Perhaps the latest similar instance in American international affairs is to be found discussed in Foreign Relations for 1899, and refers to an attempted second collection by the Government of duties at Bluefields, Nicaragua, a first payment having been made to a revolutionary government. After an extended correspondence, and pursuant to instructions from Mr. Hay, Secretary of State, the American envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, W. L. Merry, signed an agreement for settlement, providing, among other things, that—

The deposit (conditional deposit for second payment made by merchants) shall be paid by Her Britannic Majesty's consul to the authorities of the custom-house if it is decided that that Government has had the right to demand the payment claimed, or to its owners, the American merchants, if it is decided that the payment made to the revolutionists of Bluefields was legal for the reason that they pretend that the revolutionary organization of General Reyes, between February 3 and 25, 1899, was the government de facto. (For. Rel., 1899, p. 576.)

It will be seen that the only question for consideration was the character of the government. In the pending case its de facto character is sufficiently established, and therefore the second payment, made, as satisfactorily appears, under circumstances of compulsion, must be returned to the claimant.

In this case an award will be signed for 1,517 bolivars, including amounts taken by the Government, for which receipts were or were not given, and the second payment of taxes above referred to, with interest, and refused for acts of revolutionists, no want of diligence on the part of the Government having been shown.

CASES OF REVESNO, BIGNOSO, STIZ, MARCHIERO, AND FANTI.

Government is not to be held liable for acts of revolutionists unless negligence be clearly apparent or proven by claimant, the more so when claimants have never appealed to it for protection.

RALSTON, Umpire:

The above cases, all from Colonia Bolívar, came to the umpire on difference of opinion between the honorable Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela.

It is urged on behalf of Italy that the above cases come from a distance not greater than 30 miles from Caracas, that the takings were all by Matos revolutionists under command of General Rolando, and occurred during the months of May and October, 1902, and January, February, March, April, May, June, and July of 1903, happening at Custire, El Bautiamo, Chispita, and Colonia Bolívar; that by reason of their nearness to Caracas they could have been prevented by the exercise of proper diligence, and that therefore these cases are exceptions to the general rule laid down in the Sambiaggio case, No. 15,<sup>a</sup> and affirmed in the Guastini case, No. 225.<sup>b</sup>

A study of these cases will show that the burden of proving want of diligence rests upon the claimants. In the "expedientes" now under consideration not a word of affirmative proof is furnished to show negligence on the part of the Government. The umpire is aware of the fact that for several months the revolutionists remained within a short distance of Caracas without being dislodged by the Government, or perhaps without a serious attempt being made to dislodge them. But he is also aware that during that time war was being actively prosecuted over large areas of the country, while the external relations of Venezuela were in a state of danger. He is unable, and if furnished with data would doubt his right, to judge as to the military or political considerations which made military activity or concentration more necessary in one portion of the country than another.

Furthermore, he knows nothing of the relative strength of the forces of General Rolando and of the Government in this neighborhood or their advantages of location. He only knows that when the tension was apparently released elsewhere the forces of Rolando were attacked and ultimately defeated.

The claimants, so far as the evidence shows, never made any appeal to the Government for protection, as it was their right to do if they desired to obtain it, and although such appeal, if made, might have had an important effect upon the question of liability.

In view of the foregoing an order dismissing said cases will be signed.

GUERRIERI CASE.

Government will not be held responsible for results of legitimate acts of warfare.

RALSTON, Umpire:

The above case has been presented to the umpire upon difference of opinion existing between the honorable Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela.

The larger part of the claim is for damages committed by unsuccessful revolutionists, and, resting upon the principles discussed in the Sambiaggio and Guastini cases,<sup>a</sup> can not be given further consideration.

A further claim of 225 bolivars is made because of the fact that the Government steamers bombarded the town of Puerto Cabello, where claimant's property was situated, a shell in part destroying the walls of claimant's house. It is urged that the bombardment was without reason or purpose, and therefore the Government should be held responsible for wanton destruction of property. This principle was adopted by the Commission in the case of Eugenio Barletta, consul at Ciudad Bolívar,<sup>b</sup> and, in the opinion of the umpire, correctly adopted, it then appearing that the Government vessel had thrown 1,400 or 1,500 shells into the town without directing its attack upon the quarters of the revolutionary troops, without any supporting force to make the bombardment effective, and when the city had not broken out in insurrection, but a body of troops had defaulted in their allegiance.

Nothing like this is proven in the present case. We are simply informed that shells were thrown, one of them injuring claimant's property. Upon this statement of a single fact, a state of war existing, the umpire is not justified in assuming that the act was needless or unjustifiable. The legal presumption would be in favor of the regularity and necessity of governmental acts.

A decree of dismissal will therefore be signed.

MILIANI CASE.

(By the Umpire:)

In cases of double citizenship neither country can claim the person having the same as against the other nation, although it may as against all other countries.

However such matters may be treated by the diplomatic branch of a government, an international commission can only accord damages to a citizen or subject of a claimant country—not to the country itself, and taking no account of offenses to a nation as such.<sup>c</sup>

AGNOLI, Commissioner (claim referred to umpire):

Article 4 of the Italian Civil Code declares that "the father being a citizen, the son is likewise a citizen."

The constitution and the civil code of Venezuela declare, instead, that all who are or may be born on Venezuelan soil are Venezuelans. From which it follows that sons of Italians born in Venezuela are Italian citizens according to the law of Italy and Venezuelans according to the law of Venezuela. In the event of conflict between the two provisions, would Italy have the right to protect individuals finding themselves in the juridical condition above mentioned, and would the Mixed Commission be competent to consider the claims of such according to the protocol of February 13, the principles of equity, and the principles of international law?

To both questions I answer in the affirmative. The right of Italy to accord diplomatic protection to the sons of her citizens, wherever born, was expressly reserved by the Royal Government, so far as concerns Venezuela, in a note of the royal chargé d'affaires at Caracas, dated March 18, 1873, by which protest was made against the provisions of the Venezuelan act of February 14 of that year.

The sons of citizens are citizens by the national law, and subsequent legislation by another State can not deprive them of this quality or minimize the rights accruing to them under the former act.

The imposition of a nationality on a preexisting one is a fact juridically abnormal, and certainly can not in any manner vitiate the original one.

We must distinguish between these two facts: The acquisition of the new nationality and the loss of the old one. The first depends exclusively upon the foreign law; the second exclusively upon the home law, and it is clear that the denationalization of an Italian is not to be sanctioned by any but Italian law.

Our law grants the citizen full and absolute liberty to become a foreigner, but insists that the change shall be of his own spontaneous choice. We can not, therefore, consider a foreigner him upon whom a foreign law imposes a new nationality, when it does not appear that he has lost or relinquished his Italian nationality, and we can not abandon him.

Were we to accept such a rule we would arrive at excessive consequences, since we would thereby subject ourselves without discussion to the provision of any foreign law whatever operating upon our citizens in this respect, however illiberal and contrary to general custom it might be in principle.

The consequence being thus illogical and absurd, the principle from which it flows must be erroneous and unacceptable.

Granting that the local law may impose another nationality on the sons of Italian subjects born in Venezuelan territory, it can not thereby deprive them of the quality of Italian citizenship. In regard to this very question the court of Lyons laid down this maxim:

Si l'acquisition d'une nationalité est régie par la loi du pays où elle est obtenue, la perte de la nationalité l'est par celle du pays auquel appartenait l'individu naturalisé.

If, therefore, loss of nationality does not take place under the conditions above stated, neither can Italy lose the right to protect the sons of citizens born on foreign soil. If such were not the case, by the operation of special Venezuelan laws all foreigners here residing might be declared citizens of Venezuela, in which event claims would cease to exist, and there would no longer be need of diplomatic representation.

Now there can be no doubt that the limits of diplomatic action are fixed by international law, and can not be restricted by internal legislation.

This right being established, there logically flows therefrom the admissibility of claims of persons coming under this head before the Mixed Commission.

This Commission, be it understood, is governed by the terms of the protocol, which, from our point of view, has referred to it all classes of Italian claims, without distinction or exception.

Why should the Commission deem itself incompetent to pass upon them? Is it not a tribunal which was constituted and accepted by the mutual agreement of both Venezuela and Italy? What motive is there for rejecting the consideration of claims of persons having two nationalities, and therefore entitled to the protection of both countries?

None, from the point of view of equity, so the claim be just and well founded. There would only remain the elimination of technical exceptions, but this is already accomplished by the protocol.

The tribunal of arbitration is therefore competent, even in the case where the incubus of a dual nationality bears upon the claimant, because under no circumstances may the local citizenship outweigh the other.

But we may go further. It seems to me that, as between the two nationalities enjoyed by Venezuelan-born sons of Italians, that of Italy ought, for various reasons, to prevail. There is no doubt that the more liberal laws do not regard the mere accident of birth in any country as being of itself sufficient to convey citizenship, but hold, on the contrary, that it should be determined with due regard to family. The contrary principle, sanctioned by various legislations, especially the American (with the exception of the United States, the Supreme Court of which favors the view (based on the act of April 9, 1866, Rev. Stats., U. S., sec. 1992) that children born in the union of foreign parents who have not been naturalized are themselves foreigners), constitutes an abandonment of the rules which inspired the wisdom of the Roman legislator and are a return to the now-condemned system of the middle ages, adopted for political reasons and expediency, but carrying within itself something contrary to the order and peace of the family, in that a father might have ten sons, each of a different nationality. While the ties of family rest on sacred and indissoluble foundations, which are the basis of our social order, there is not always a moral bond, a tie of affection, or a mutual interest between the land and the person born therein.

Cogordan (p. 25) observes:

Il était logique, en effet, sous l'ancien régime, d'attribuer la qualité de français à quiconque était né sur le sol de France; puisque la nationalité n'était que la soumission au Roi; mais quand parut le sentiment de la race, l'idée de la patrie française existant en elle-même, abstraction faite du Roi, et résidant dans l'ensemble des français, il était juste de revenir à la filiation, puisque c'est par la famille qu'on acquiert les qualités physiques et morales qui rattachent l'homme à une race et à une patrie.

The fact of birth in any given country may be a mere accident.

Fiore (par. 330 et seq. of Vol. I of "Diritto Internazionale Privato"), examining the question of a double nationality coming before a tribunal of a neutral State—that is, a tribunal which, like the present Mixed Commission—is not to apply any particular law on the question of citizenship, but determine that of a given person, holding to the principles of international law as well as to the general principles of common law, concludes that such tribunal should admit that "a legitimate son acquires by birth the nationality of his father (Vol. I, p. 334), and adds (p. 335, par. 333):

The principle which bestows upon the son the nationality of the father is derived from Roman law, and rests on the natural tendency of the individual, which warrants the assumption that each desires the citizenship of his father. The oneness and homogeneity of life, of the affections, of the sentiments of family, all render such assumption reasonable, founded as it is on the ties of blood, and surely more rational than that which would attribute to the son the nationality of the soil on which he was born, "jure territorii."

The court of cassation of Belgium, founding itself on the adage, "Nasciturus pro nato habetur quando de ejus commodo agitur," decided that the son of a person who changed nationality after the conception, but before the birth, of said son, may invoke the nationality which his father had at the time of his (the son's) conception, and thereby admitted that citizenship should be considered as a personal right of the individual from the moment of his conception.

According to this ruling the Venezuelan-born sons of Italians first possessed Italian citizenship, and at birth acquired the Venezuelan; but the original and prevailing one, the one to be considered by the Commission, which is not to apply either Italian or Venezuelan laws, but, on the contrary, reject exceptions based on local laws, is surely the Italian.

The Mixed Commission, resting upon sound principles of international law, should hold inefficient the law which would impose citizenship when not only is there no act tending to show a voluntary renunciation of the original nationality, but everything showing a preference for it, as in the case of claimants, who, having a dual citizenship, in fact, choose the Italian, as clearly evidenced by their appearance before this tribunal demanding indemnity due them from Venezuela through the intermediary of the royal Italian legation.

Bearing in mind that the courts of the Republic dispense justice with no less impartiality than does the Commission, and considering as well that while the sentences of the former are susceptible of immediate execution, those of the latter are subject to some years' delay and to the fluctuations of Venezuelan custom-house receipts, it is evident that a claimant having two nationalities who turns to this tribunal rather than to the local courts for justice in spite of all delay, impliedly testifies his choice for Italian nationality. Various reasons, both in law and in equity, exist why this Commission should accept well-founded claims of Venezuelan-born sons of Italians. But the strongest, to my mind, is that, the Italian nationality of the claimants having been established, the nationality of their claims can not be denied, and that therefore they should be treated according to the provisions of article IV of the Washington protocol of February 13 of this year.

Claims of this character have been received and adjudicated in the French-Venezuelan Commission, before which the question of nationality of sons of French citizens born in Venezuela was not even raised. Our own are, therefore, under Article VIII of the above-mentioned protocol, entitled to equal treatment.

AGNOLI, Commissioner (additional opinion):

With one or two exceptions, in which damages for which claims were presented to this Commission were suffered in person by Venezuelan-born sons of Italians, all claims of persons finding themselves in regard to citizenship in the condition above mentioned were by them presented as representatives of deceased fathers, who had themselves suffered the losses on which the claims were based and about whose citizenship there was and could be no question.

The undersigned maintains that Venezuelan-born sons of Italians are competent to present claims before this Commission, not only because of the reasons assigned in the first part of this memorial, but also because said claims are of Italian origin, since in nearly all cases indemnity is asked for damages suffered by persons unquestioningly recognized as Italian by their heirs.

The gist of the question at issue, therefore, lies in deciding whether the original nationality of the claim shall be taken as the fundamental and decisive reason for its admission to the Commission.

The Commissioner for Italy feels no hesitancy in taking the affirmative on this point, being impelled thereto by every consideration of law, of logic, and of equity. The lack of time and the amount of work before him compel him to sum up briefly as follows:

The protocol makes no restriction as to the presentation of claims. To restrict the range of that instrument would be equivalent to an infringement of its spirit.

All requisitions, acts of personal violence, forced loans, illegal imprisonment—in short, all damages inflicted upon an Italian by the Venezuelan Government, or by its agents, or committed against an Italian on Venezuelan soil, when not characterized as acts of private malice, constitute an offense against the Italian Government, because by their nature and repeated occurrence they take on a political character and establish the right of intervention, and that of exercising a protective action—that is to say, a diplomatic action.

If to-morrow an Italian is killed in Venezuela, or his private interests are damaged, under circumstances which establish lack of diligence or prevention on the part of the Venezuelan Government, the Kingdom of Italy intervenes and claims. Would it be admitted in the course of diplomatic negotiations that Venezuela might object that the murdered man had no heirs, or that his heirs were born in Venezuela, and by this quibble escape the granting of adequate satisfaction? Certainly not, because in the person of the citizen the nation has been offended. Did the United States stop to inquire whether there were any heirs of the American citizen assassinated by brigands in Asia Minor when they demanded and obtained an indemnity of $100,000 from the Turkish Government?

Did France undertake to determine the nationality of the widows or children of the Italian operatives murdered at Aigues-Mortes, when an indemnity was awarded them on the demand of the Italian Government?

Now, should an exception, which would not be admitted, and I believe would not even be offered in the course of a simple convention between governments, be accepted before a mixed commission? No, because the mixed commission was constituted for the purpose of giving effect in its results to the diplomatic action which preceded it.

The Washington protocols were not drawn with a view to restricting the rights of claimant governments, but to affirm them in the solemnity of an international agreement.

Let us suppose that a principle contrary to the foregoing is admitted; what will be the consequences? The first would be that every debtor government would seek to retard to the utmost the fulfillment of its obligations, and each passing year would see diminished the amount of indemnity to be paid. Each death of a claimant leaving no heirs, or leaving heirs born on foreign soil having laws like those of Venezuela, would mean the virtual annulment of the claim. We would therefore see negligence compensated, or, what is worse, encouraged.

But let us consider another result, and as a practical case, that of the claim of Poggioli recently submitted to this Commission.

The firm of Poggioli Brothers (and I do not enter here into any consideration of the value of the evidence) suffered heavy damages through the operations of governmental agents. The firm was composed exclusively of Silvio and Americo Poggioli, brothers, both Italians, born on Italian soil. Among the damages for which claim is made was the wounding of Silvio, who remains a cripple, and the murder of Americo, whose heirs, associated in the claim and forming now part of the existing firm of the same name, are the widow, daughter of an Italian but born in Venezuela, and several minor children, likewise born in this Republic.

The claim of Silvio Poggioli, for himself and his heirs, may not be denied for reasons of nationality, because, though badly wounded, he was not killed. The share of the claim demanded for Americo and his family may be rejected, and why? Because Americo was not merely wounded, he was killed, and to his widow and children, born in Venezuela, this Commission should award nothing. It would have perhaps been better to suppress Silvio as well; then there would be no occasion to discuss the Poggioli claim.

If the Commissioner for Italy could believe that a principle contrary to the one he is advocating is to prevail in this Commission, he would consider it his duty to advise the heirs of Americo Poggioli and all other claimants analogously situated to withdraw their claims, so as to leave a way open to future diplomatic action on the part of his Government.

The case is quite different when the claimants have voluntarily assumed Venezuelan nationality, either by naturalization or marriage, acts in which may clearly be seen a deliberate renunciation, excepting, however, the case of Berti-Nieves, in which the marriage of the Italian claimant to a Venezuelan was not solemnized until after the stipulation of the protocol at Washington.

It is an elementary rule in logic that any principle which leads to unjust or absurd consequences must itself be deemed unjust and absurd.

I invite the attention of my Venezuelan colleague and of the honorable umpire to decision No. 34 of the American-Venezuelan Mixed Commission of Revision in the case of Albino Abbiatti,<sup>a</sup> who suffered damages while he was an Italian citizen, and, being subsequently naturalized as an American citizen, presented his claim before that Commission, which in its just sentence enunciated these two principles: "The infliction of a wrong upon a State's own citizen is an injury to it," and that "in claims they must have been citizens at least when the claims arose."

No opinion was filed by Doctor Zuloaga.

RALSTON, Umpire:

The above-entitled claim is referred to the umpire upon difference of opinion between the honorable Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela.

The claim is based upon "vales" or receipts given by certain chiefs in 1871 and 1872, and as well upon seizures said to have been made by revolutionary and governmental chiefs in 1899 and 1900. The claim for the events of 1871 and 1872 during his lifetime belonged to Michele Miliani, an Italian subject, who was married to Matilde Miliani May 29, 1872, she then being a Venezuelan citizen. He died in Valera, Venezuela, in 1890. Their children were apparently born in Venezuela, which, by legal presumption, may be considered still their residence, though no proof is offered on the subject. The widow has always lived in this country.

It is urged against the claim, first, that the earlier part is barred by prescription, thirty-one years having elapsed since its origin, and it never having been presented to the Venezuelan Government; and in addition, second, that the widow and children, claiming as of their own right for the later damages and by inheritance as to the earlier ones, are to be regarded as Venezuelan citizens. The latter objection will be discussed.

So far as the rights of the widow are concerned, the questions affecting them were disposed of in the case of the estate of Sebastiano Brignone<sup>a</sup>, wherein it was held that in the event of conflict of laws the status of a woman born in Venezuela, married here to an Italian, and becoming a widow and always residing here, was to be determined by the laws of Venezuela, the land of her domicile, which declared her to be Venezuelan. The condition of the widow in this case being identical, her claim must be rejected for want of jurisdiction, but without prejudice to her other remedies.

The case of the children deserves careful consideration. The Italian civil code provides:

ART. 4. È cittadino il figlio di padre cittadino.

The Venezuelan constitution provides:

ART. 8. Los venezolanos lo son por nacimiento ó por naturalización.

(a) Son venezolanos por nacimiento;

1. Todas las personas que hayan nacido ó nacieren en el territorio de Venezuela, cualquiera que sea la nacionalidad de sus padres.

It thus appears that a conflict of laws again exists, Italy claiming her nationality for the children of her subjects, without limitation as to the location of their birth, and Venezuela claiming as her citizens those born within her territory, irrespective of the nationality of their parents. Which should control?

England, the United States, Portugal, and nearly all the Central and South American States accept the rule followed by Venezuela, while Germany, Austria, Hungary, France, Sweden, and Switzerland follow broadly the rule adopted by Italy. Either theory has, therefore, very respectable support.

It is urged on behalf of the Italian rule that Venezuela should not be deemed to have power perforce to confer nationality irrespective of the desires of the person concerned; that a child is Italian not merely from the time of birth but from the time of conception, and that the Venezuelan law, operating from birth, can not change a nationality already established.

The doctrine that citizenship is fixed by conditions existing from the moment of conception, while occasionally referred to by courts and writers, is not so far established by reason or authority in international disputes as to induce the umpire to largely regard it. To base citizenship upon the conditions of such an uncertain moment would be to introduce into the international law an element of doubt.

In the umpire's opinion, therefore, the natural moment for determining the commencement of citizenship is that of birth, both laws from that moment receiving such effect as they may deserve. Assuming this position, it can not be contended that Venezuela, more than Italy, has given an enforced citizenship.<sup>a</sup>

In discussing the rule that place of birth determines citizenship Cogordan (La Nationalité, p. 39) says that "the eminently practical spirit of the English Government has inspired a wise solution," in that Lord Malmesbury, in writing to Lord Cowley, ambassador at Paris, on March 13, 1858, said that if England recognized as English, children born in England of foreign parents she did not pretend to protect them as such against the authorities of the parents' country, which claimed them, above all when they voluntarily returned to that country; in other words, the Frenchman born in England would be protected by England in Germany, Italy, everywhere, in fact, except in France, where he could be legally called to military service.

Restating the same rule as existing in certain States, Tchernoff (Protection des Nationaux Résidant à l'Étranger, p. 470) says:

Un individu à double nationalité n'en aura qu'une dans le territoire de chacun des États qui le considèrent comme leur sujet. C'est la pratique de l'Angleterre et de la Suisse.

It follows from the foregoing that while the children of Miliani may with absolute legal propriety be recognized as Italians in Italy, or by Italy in any country other than Venezuela, in this country, and, as a consequence (following the decisions cited in the Brignone case, and accepting the domicile as furnishing the rule in case of conflict), before this tribunal, they must be considered, for the purposes of this litigation, as Venezuelans.<sup>b</sup>

The umpire is the more disposed to the rule above indicated because certain equities in the case favor it. Miliani came to Venezuela some

(1) Confr. Richelot, t. I, p. 115; Caen, 5 février 1813; affaire Montalembert. V. Emigré. (Note de M. Fiore.)

La même solution est donnée par la jurisprudence française. Il est admis, en effet, et enseigné que l'enfant né à l'étranger, de parents étrangers, ne pourrait se prévaloir des dispositions de l'article 9 du Code civil, bien qu'il eût été conçu en France: la maxime infans conceptus pro nato habetur, quoties de commodis ipsius agitur, n'étant point applicable dans ce cas, parce qu'il résulte, et du texte de l'article 9 et de la discussion au Conseil d'Etat, que c'est exclusivement à la naissance sur le sol français qu'est attaché le bénéfice dont il s'agit. <sup>b</sup> The rule here laid down is that accepted by Bluntschli, who says (Droit Public Codifié, sec. 374):

"Certaines personnes ou familles peuvent exceptionnellement être ressortissantes de deux états différents ou même d'un plus grand nombre d'états.

"En cas de conflit la préférence sera accordée à l'état dans lequel la personne ou la famille en question ont leur domicile; leurs droits dans les états où elles ne résident pas seront considérés comme suspendus."

time prior to 1871, and died in 1890 at the age of 56 years. He had married in 1872. His children were all born here, and, so far as appears, have never claimed Italian citizenship till now, or lived in Italy. It is scarcely to be supposed that they have any intention of living upon Italian soil. To declare them to be Venezuelans is not to deny them anything that they have ever felt in any essential way they possessed, and an option to choose Italian citizenship is scarcely to be inferred from the fact that their mother has seen fit in their names to file a claim before this Commission.

Another consideration may be added. Michele Miliani, the father, deliberately established his domicile and married in Venezuela, choosing that his children should there and under her laws first see the light of day. While he had not power to select the land of his own birth, he could control that of his children. In so far as a father may be considered as selecting the citizenship of his children he did so, and under all the circumstances of the case it seems proper they should abide the consequences of his actions.

The foregoing considerations make it unnecessary to discuss the question of prescription.

The umpire has not discussed the suggestion that the claim, largely at least, was Italian in origin and should be considered, even if not now Italian, because involving an infraction of international duty on the part of Venezuela toward Italy which would survive even change of citizenship on the part of the individual claimant. It is sufficient to observe that all the considerations for or against a claim which appeal to the diplomatic branch of a government have not necessarily a place before an international commission. For instance, unless specially charged, an international commission would scarcely measure in money an insult to the flag, while diplomatists might well do so. On the other hand, commissions have and exercise jurisdiction over contract claims, while the diplomatic branch of government, although usually reserving the right, rarely presses matters of this nature. While it remains true that an offense to a citizen is an offense to the nation, nevertheless the claimant before an international tribunal is ordinarily the nation on behalf of its citizen. Rarely ever the nation can be said to have a right which survives when its citizen no longer belongs to it. Italy, save when her own pecuniary rights are affected, recovers nothing for her own benefit before a tribunal such as this, however much her own dignity may have been affected by the treatment of her subjects.

A decree may therefore be entered dismissing the claim, but without prejudice to such rights as the claimants may have elsewhere.

PETROCELLI CASE.

The Government is liable for loss from having so taken possession of property as to especially expose it to destruction, but not for damages incident to ordinary warlike operations.

RALSTON, Umpire:

This case is submitted to the umpire upon difference of opinion between the honorable Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela.

While the claim is for 45,000 bolivars, embracing a large number of items, very few circumstances are so established by proof as to be worthy of consideration, and these only will be discussed.

It appears that the Government troops in the month of May, 1902, entrenched themselves in front of the claimant's dwelling house at a street corner in Ciudad Bolívar, and that as a result a battle raged around that house for five days, it being made the object of attack and being greatly damaged. It further appears that the same troops broke open the doors, smashed wardrobes, and helped themselves to property, but no satisfactory evidence is furnished as to the value of property so taken or injured. It seems fair to believe that the house was used in connection with the entrenchments. In addition, it is said that during the battle of last July five bombs were thrown, apparently by the Government troops or vessels, which entered this house and another, causing considerable damage. An expert valuation of the amount necessary to restore the dwelling house fixes it at 1,850 bolivars, and to repair a storehouse, belonging to the claimant and located elsewhere, at 100 bolivars.

The damages to the storehouse are rejected, as incident to the operations of war. The damages to the dwelling rest upon another principle. When the Government troops entrenched themselves in front of claimant's habitation and took possession they made it the object of the enemy's attack. They condemned it specially to public use. Claims for damages to it were taken out of the field of the incidental results of war, the Government having invited its destruction. The claimant's property was exposed to a special danger, in which the property of the rest of the community did not share. The Government's responsibility for its safe return was complete. The principle upon which such responsibility rests is above indicated, and is more at large set forth in 4 Moore, page 3718, Putegnat's Heirs, decided by the American-Mexican Commission formed under the treaty of 1868, which decision was recently followed in the case of the American Electric and Manufacturing Company v. Venezuela,<sup>a</sup> the opinion being presented by Doctor Paúl, in the American-Venezuelan Commission now sitting in Caracas.

Part of the damages caused to the dwelling house were from shells thrown by the Government during the battle of July, and, as incident to the usual operations of war, no recovery from them can be had.

An expert examination shows that the dwelling house can be repaired for 1,850 bolivars. Only so much of this amount can be paid as may be considered the result of the special use made of it by the Government. The evidence does not distinguish, and perhaps could not be expected to distinguish, clearly the damages caused by the two classes of acts—those involving and those refusing responsibility. The umpire, however, believes himself justified in holding responsibility to the extent of one-half of the amount claimed for damages to the dwelling house, or 925 bolivars.

TAGLIAFERRO CASE.

Responsible officers of the Government having had full knowledge of the claim from the beginning, the reclamation, although 31 years old, is receivable. Where the reason for the application of the principle of prescription ceases, as in this case, prescription can not be invoked to defeat the claim.<sup>a</sup> Illegal refusal of amparo by superior judge and procurador-general will sustain claim for denial of justice.

RALSTON, Umpire.

The above-entitled cause is referred to the umpire upon difference of opinion between the honorable Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela.

The claimant, an Italian subject, was, in 1872, a merchant of Tariba, doing a considerable business. On January 28 of that year, the general in chief of operations in the States of Mérida and Táchira issued an order of the collection of enforced exactions against a number of citizens of Táchira, requiring, among things, the collection from the claimant, by name, of 12 "morocotas," a morocota being the equivalent of an American 20-dollar gold piece, the order stating that those who should not make the payment "will be conducted to the prison, subject to the disposition of Gen. Manuel Pelayo."

Pursuant to the foregoing, the claimant was, on February 1, required to pay the money, but refused, electing to accept imprisonment. Immediately upon being imprisoned his petition for "amparo" or protection was presented to the superior judge, who, contending that the military power was superior to the civil, refused to grant amparo.

Immediately thereafter, and on February 5, the claimant addressed a petition to the procurador-general of the nation for the State of Táchira, setting up the foregoing facts, and praying that he might be set at liberty, and that the order depriving him of the same might be revoked. The procurador returned claimant's petition to him on February 6, authorizing him to apply again if he saw fit, producing documents showing that he was an Italian subject, without which requisite, he said, nothing could be done.

The duration of claimant's stay in prison is not fixed in the expediente, but, as on March 11 he prepared his proofs, we may presume that it did not exceed forty days at the outside. It does not appear that he paid the exaction.

The first question presented is one of prescription, more than thirty-one years having elapsed between the infliction of the injury and the presentation of the claim. In the Gentini case, No. 280,<sup>b</sup> the umpire sufficiently indicated the reasons why prescription could properly be invoked in international claims. It may be said that none of the reasons then adduced can be given effect in the pending case. Here the acts complained of were committed pursuant to the orders of the highest military authority of the State. The injured party at once appealed to the judicial authority, which denied relief, and then to the immediate representative of the nation, who, upon a subterfuge, refused his assistance. The responsible constituted authorities knew at all times of the wrongdoing, and if the complaint were baseless—an impossible conclusion under the evidence—judicial, military, and prison records must exist to demonstrate the fact. When the reason for the rule of prescription ceases, the rule ceases, and such is the case now.

It is true that the claimant has not presented his claim to the Government at Caracas, but his unavailing efforts to get relief at home may well have discouraged him. As having some incidental bearing we are told that complaints made by Italians of acts of the character here indicated came to the General Government about the time of the occurrence of the injuries, and strict orders for the cessation of the causes for them were very promptly and properly given, a representative of the Government being sent to the neighborhood to secure correction of abuses.

The offenses complained of now are double in nature, consisting of unjust imprisonment and denial of justice. The only cause for imprisonment was the nonpayment of an illegal exaction. Clearly this affords ground for recovery. That there was a denial of justice is likewise evident. Military authority could not justly override civil authority, as the superior judge seemed to admit, and it was immaterial whether the claimant were Venezuelan or Italian, although the procurador refused relief because of a supposed lack of proof of Italian citizenship.

The forced loan violated many provisions of the constitution, among them, that property should only be subjected to contributions decreed by the legislative authority, in conformity with the constitution; that no Venezuelan could be taken or arrested for debts not proceeding from fraud or wrongdoing; that all shall be judged by the same laws and subject to like duties, service, and contributions. Strangers enjoy, under the constitution, all the rights of Venezuelans.

In refusing the relief prayed for, the officers of the judicial department were guilty of a gross denial of justice, failing, as they did, to follow the excellent laws prescribed by Venezuela. In so doing they unfortunately subjected the Government to liability.

The claimant fixes no amount for his demand, but the royal Italian legation asks 5,000 bolivars. In view of the gravity of the case this amount seems reasonable, and will be accorded without interest.

GIACOPINI CASE.

Venezuelan authorities having been notified of the taking of proof thirty-two years ago and having assisted therein, the principle of prescription held not to apply, although no express demand was made.

Allowance made for imprisonment of claimant.<sup>a</sup>

RALSTON, Umpire:

This case comes to the umpire upon a difference of opinion between the honorable Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela.

<sup>a</sup> Measure of damages for unlawful imprisonment is largely discussed in the Topaze case (supra, p. 329), and many of the authorities to be found in Moore are abstracted in that case on page 330. In addition in Moore and elsewhere may be enumerated the following:

Moore, pages 1646-1653, case of Charles Weile, before the Peruvian Claims Commission, for imprisonment for an uncertain time, payment was allowed of $32,407.

Moore, page 1655, case of George Hill, before the same Commission, for being fired upon and made a prisoner for three days, without food or medical attendance, claimant was awarded 6,000 Peruvian soles, or $5,555.

In 1871 Domenico and Giuseppe Giacopini, Italian subjects, were merchants, doing an extensive business at Valera. In November of that year their partnership store was entered by Venezuelan troops, by order of General Pulgar, commanding the right wing, and there was forcibly taken from it property of the value indicated: Coffee, 14,400 fuertes; potatoes, 250 fuertes; cacao, 40 fuertes; fennel, 112 fuertes; general merchandise, 2,000 fuertes; personal and household effects, 500 fuertes; figs, 640 fuertes. In addition, mules were taken to the value of 2,400 fuertes and oxen worth 100 fuertes. About the same time Domenico Giacopini was arrested on an unfounded charge of complicity in political disturbances, and transported by the army, in chains, under dangerous conditions, to Maracaibo, where, contrary to the Venezuelan constitution, he was thrown into prison in association with criminals, and again, contrary to the same instrument, loaded with fetters. After some weeks he was released from prison upon payment of a forced exaction to General Pulgar of 400 fuertes and the execution of a bond requiring his presence in Maracaibo to meet any charge brought against him. None such was ever brought, and after seventy-five days of absence from his business, part in actual and part in virtual captivity, he was restored to his home in Valera. Giuseppe Giacopini also spent some time in prison, but its term is not fixed, and this element of damage is not considered for reasons hereinafter given.

Against the claim it is first urged that prescription should lie, about thirty-two years having elapsed since its origin. In the Gentini case, No. 280,<sup>a</sup> in this Commission, the umpire referred to the fact that under certain circumstances prescription would not be recognized as a defense, mentioning specifically that of bonds "as to which a public register had been kept," and furthermore stated that the presentation of a claim to competent authority within proper time would interrupt the running of the time of prescription, adding that there were other qualifications "which might be imagined" without entering into an attempt to enumerate them.

Examination of the expediente in the present case shows that the tribunal before which the proofs were made (in November, 1872), directed notice to the fiscal of the nation before their taking; that he was present and vigorously cross-examined the witnesses; that he asked and was accorded by the judge a copy of the evidence. The Government knowing in this manner of the existence of the claim had ample opportunity to prepare its defense.

As was stated in the Gentini case:<sup>a</sup>

The principle of prescription finds its foundation in the highest equity—the avoidance of possible injustice to the defendant.

In the present case, full notice having been given to the defendant, no danger of injustice exists, and the rule of prescription fails.<sup>b</sup>

In addition, as bearing upon the question of its good faith (though not to be considered as of conclusive legal value), the claim was made known to the royal Italian legation in 1872. At a later period one of the claimants (with a letter from a high Venezuelan authority recognizing the justice of his demand) came to Caracas to press for relief, but died here before anything could be accomplished. In the Gentini case the claimant never made his supposed grievances known to anyone in authority in any manner for thirty-two years.

We are brought next to the consideration of an objection to a part of the claim. As before stated, one of the original complainants, Giuseppe Giacomini, is dead. His widow has remarried with a Venezuelan citizen. Giuseppe Giacomini's children were born in Venezuela. By the laws of this country the foreign woman who marries a Venezuelan becomes Venezuelan. Under the decision in the Miliani case, No. 223,<sup>c</sup> the children of a foreigner who are born in Venezuela are Venezuelans. In so far, therefore, as the claim belongs to Venezuelans, it is not considered and must be dismissed without prejudice.

The value of mules, coffee, potatoes, cocoa, fennel, merchandise, household articles, figs, and oxen taken from the firm was 20,442 fuertes, or 102,210 bolivars. Four hundred fuertes, or 2,000 bolivars, were paid (apparently in the end by the firm) to General Pulgar, to secure the release of Domenico Giacomini. One-half of this amount may be awarded to Domenico Giacomini. For the time he was in constraint, either in prison or in Maracaibo, the average sum of 50 fuertes per day, or a total of 3,750 fuertes, will be awarded without interest.

The total award to Domenico Giacomini will therefore be 52,105 bolivars, upon which interest may be calculated since December 1, 1872, approximately the date of the taking of proof, and 3,750 fuertes without interest. No award is made of the sufferings of Giuseppe Giacomini nor for money expended by him personally, as only his heirs could possibly be entitled to an interest therein, and they are excluded from this judgment for the reasons hereinbefore set forth.

BOTTARO CASE.

Letter received to explain statement of facts.<sup>a</sup>

RALSTON, Umpire:

The umpire has carefully considered the expediente in this case, as well as the opinions of the honorable Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela; this case reaching him because of their differences of opinion.

It is contended on behalf of Venezuela that the case is badly proven; two of the witnesses testifying, not from their knowledge of the facts, but from their public notoriety, and the third witness giving no reason to support the testimony furnished by him. Furthermore, it does not appear in evidence whether the troops taking the property, for the seizure of which recovery is sought, belonged to the Government or revolutionary forces.

On the other hand, it is contended that the proof is sufficient, and it is pointed out that a letter from the claimant has been filed, showing that of the eleven chiefs whose action was complained of, four were chiefs of the Government.

In some respects the proof in this case affects the umpire favorably. For instance, the property taken has been enumerated specifically and the values of each class given; the values so furnished being in every case apparently reasonable. It is true that two witnesses attest the facts from public notoriety, but the third witness speaks with sufficient definiteness, and apparently of his own knowledge.

The proof is not as complete as it should be, in that it fails to show the number of cattle, burros, or horses taken by each particular leader, either of the Government or of the revolution. We are only favored with the aggregate number. The letter of the claimant designating which chiefs were of the Government or of the revolution, undertakes to attribute to the governmental chiefs the taking of more than four-fifths of the property lost by him. As but four of the eleven chiefs were of this side, the umpire is disposed to think that while his statement may be true, it is not probable, and no details are furnished which would tend to establish its probability. In view of this fact, and bearing in mind the proportion existing between the two contending forces, he is disposed to think that approximate justice will be rendered by charging the Government with the taking of property to the extent of 6,000 bolivars, upon which amount interest may be calculated to the 31st day of December, A. D. 1903.

The umpire accepts as evidence, though, naturally, of the lightest character, the letter written by the claimant; it being his duty under the protocols to receive and carefully examine everything presented to him.

DI CARO CASE.

In estimating damages for unlawful killing, age and station in life, deprivation of comforts and companionship, and shock to surviving members of the family may be taken into consideration among other elements.

An award will not be made in favor of Italian subjects who have served in revolutionary forces.

Claim for money said to have been taken rejected because of deficient proof.

RALSTON, Umpire:

The claim of Beatrice Di Caro, widow of Giovanni Cammarano, has been submitted to the umpire upon difference of opinion between the honorable Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela, upon the question of the amount of damages.

The admitted facts seem to be that on May 4, 1902, two government soldiers went to the store or "pulperia" of Giovanni Cammarano in Duaca, when he was absent, and, after demanding various articles with which they were supplied, attempted to assault the claimant, Beatrice Di Caro and her daughter-in-law. The two sons of Giovanni Cammarano struggled with the soldiers and one son, getting possession of the gun of a soldier, shot and killed him. The remaining soldier escaped. The sons thereupon fled.

A detachment of soldiers in charge of an officer shortly after went to the house and, finding Giovanni Cammarano, who had meanwhile returned, demanded the whereabouts of his sons. This he was unable or unwilling to give. They seized him and, conducting him about a square and a half, cut him with a machete and shot and killed him in the street. Thereafter the soldiers sacked the store and again, on January 27, 1903, the store having been somewhat replenished, it was plundered by the government forces.

The claimant fixes the value of property taken at 16,468 bolivars and of cash money at 13,554, or at another place at 14,072 bolivars.

The sons of the claimant, shortly after the occurrences first mentioned (and possibly before), joined the revolutionary army, but there is no sufficient reason to believe that claimant's deceased husband took any part in the domestic difficulties of Venezuela.

The first question presenting itself is as to the damages to be awarded claimant for the unwarranted killing of her husband. The honorable Italian Commissioner would fix this award at a considerable amount. The honorable Commissioner for Venezuela, arguing that the deceased, had he been a young man, could not have earned more than 3 bolivars a day and that, being 64 years of age, his expectancy of life could not exceed six more years, would award damages for his death at not to exceed 6,510 bolivars.

The argument in favor of the sum last named is based exclusively, as appears, upon the theory that the deceased was but a laborer, and that his death only deprived his family of his value as such laborer. But the evidence tends to show that he was a shopkeeper and bought and sold coffee and other productions in considerable quantities, besides apparently cultivating a small piece of land, the extent of which is not given. We may fairly consider, therefore, that his earning power would be much more than 3 bolivars a day.

But while in establishing the extent of the loss to a wife resultant upon the death of a husband it is fair and proper to estimate his earning power, his expectation of life, and, as suggested, also to bear in mind his station in life with a view of determining the extent of comforts and amenities of which the wife has been the loser, we would, in the umpire's opinion, seriously err if we ignored the deprivation of personal companionship and cherished associations consequent upon the loss of a husband or wife unexpectedly taken away. Nor can we overlook the strain and shock incident to such violent severing of old relations. For all this no human standard of measurement exists, since affection, devotion, and companionship may not be translated into any certain or ascertainable number of bolivars or pounds sterling. Bearing in mind, however, the elements admitted by the honorable Commissioners as entering into the calculation and the additional elements adverted to, considering the distressing experiences immediately preceding this tragedy, and not ignoring the precedents of other tribunals and of international settlements for violent deaths, it seems to the umpire that an award of 50,000 bolivars would be just.

The next question of difference is as to the award for property taken. The umpire is not disposed to accept the claim for cash money said to have been taken. This, it is alleged, was sent to the decedent by a bank a short time previous to his death, and the sons, for whose benefit the umpire does not feel he can make an allowance because of their revolutionary career, were apparently interested in it. Besides, its existence is not clearly shown; and if it had been received from a bank, this fact was susceptible of definite and disinterested proof, which is lacking. In addition, the amount, considering the claimed value of the deceased's other property, is so unreasonably large that excessive exaggeration may be presumed. The umpire is further satisfied, taking the evidence as a whole, that the value of the contents of the "pulperia" has been grossly overestimated, and that if he allows 1,000 bolivars as the value of the widow's interest in all of the personal property, he will be doing full justice.

BIAJO CESARINO CASE.

Governments are liable for the wanton acts of their officials.<sup>a</sup>

RALSTON, Umpire:

The foregoing cause was duly referred to the umpire, on difference of opinion between the honorable Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela.

The claim arises because of the killing of Gaetano Cesarino, father of the claimant, in the town of Tocuyo on the 9th day of April, A. D. 1903, by a shot fired by a police official named Manuel Aguilar. The claimant asks 50,000 bolivars.

From the undisputed facts in the case, it appears that Manuel Aguilar was at the time a police official, and fired upon the deceased, a pedlar by occupation, as he was crossing a street of Tocuyo. The first proofs submitted tended to show that Aguilar was about 50 meters from the deceased at the time he shot, but subsequent more exact information places the distance at 200 meters.

At first it was proven simply that the deceased was killed by the official named, no particulars being furnished, leaving it open to be supposed that the killing might have been accidental, or brought about upon sufficient cause. The later evidence, however, demonstrated that the deceased was a peaceful, inoffensive man, who had taken no part whatever in any political questions, and was engaged in no disturbance and furnished no cause for the act against him. The assailant professes entire ignorance of the event, but a man who stood next to him, Giminez, saw him raise his gun and fire at the deceased, and suggests no provocation or excuse.

There is considerable evidence tending to show that there were street fights in Tocuyo on the morning in question between Government troops originally in possession and revolutionary troops which were entering, and the testimony of some of the witnesses would seem to indicate that the killing of Cesarino occurred about the time of an exchange of shots. Other papers submitted apparently demonstrate that there was no contest between the contending parties until about an hour after Cesarino was killed. Whatever may be the exact fact as to this point, it does appear that the deceased took no part in the contention, but was shot down in the street unarmed. Nowhere is it suggested that he suffered because believed to be taking part with the revolutionists, and one is unable to determine whether he was killed by Aguilar in a spirit of reckless bravado or in unreasoning panic. Certain it is that the killing was utterly causeless, while deliberate.

The umpire can not, under all the evidence in the case, accept the theory that the death of Cesarino was one of the incidents of war for which no responsibility exists. True it is that governments are not to be held to too close accountability for the misdirected shots of their soldiers or for every display of lack of judgment, but this is not to say that the existence of war frees them from every responsibility. Cases before the present Commissions in Caracas afford many illustrations of decisions holding the Government of Venezuela liable for the wanton or negligent acts of its agents in war and in peace, and, in the judgment of the umpire, the present claim should be added to the list of such cases.

The claimant apparently claims for himself and his mother and a minor child. In the estimation of damages, he, being a man of full age and married in Venezuela, will not be recognized. There is no proof of the marriage of his mother or the existence of a minor child, except as he has stated, and, in the opinion of the umpire, the royal Italian legation requesting it, an opportunity to furnish other and more exact proof should be afforded. No award will therefore be made pending the furnishing of fuller proof.<sup>a</sup>

OLIVA CASE.

(By the Umpire:)

Expulsion under circumstances of contumely and upon mere suspicion will sustain a claim for damages.

Concession indirectly taken away by unlawful expulsion may be compensated for, the measure of damages in this case being limited to amounts properly expended in procuring it, speculative and conjectural profits being rejected.

AGNOLI, Commissioner (claim referred to umpire):

The principle involved in the claim under consideration is analogous to the one which was fully studied in the Boffolo case, in which was delivered an elaborate decision by the honorable umpire, and to the case of Clemente Giordana, in which an indemnity was agreed upon between the Commissioners.

---

The circumstances attending the expulsion of Lorenzo A. Oliva, however, and the consequences flowing from the arbitrary proceedings against the interests and to the injury of the claimant, are of special gravity and require to be set forth in detail.

Oliva had lived in Venezuela a number of years, and from 1891 to 1898 was employed in the important commercial house of Bisagno, Oliva & Co., Italian merchants of Maracaibo. It does not appear, and no proof to the contrary has been adduced, that the claimant during all this time had ever embroiled himself in the political struggles of the Republic, notwithstanding that during this period the Crespo revolution burst forth. We have from this moment evidence of Oliva's pacific tendencies, for, on the 3d of July, 1900, he made arrangements with the Government of Caracas to contract for the erection of a public cemetery, the clauses of which contract we will examine more closely further on in the course of this memorial. On the 31st of October of that year he entered into an agreement with the firm of I. Brocchi & Co., of Habana, in virtue of which said firm was to advance him $50,000 American with which to commence the construction of the cemetery. On the 23d of November following the claimant went to the Venezuelan counsel at San Juan de Puerto Rico and asked for and obtained a passport for La Guaira. It will be noted that, as passports are not required of foreigners disembarking at ports of the Republic, the spontaneous presentation of himself at the office of the consul, as aforesaid, constitutes for the claimant presumptive evidence that he was proceeding to Caracas for the transaction of important business and not for political reasons.

The claimant reached La Guaira the 27th of that month and Caracas the 28th. On the day following he was arrested, and the next, by official decree, he was expelled.

What were the reasons of the Government of the Republic for issuing an order which not only infringed the liberty of the claimant, granted him under the constitution and by the treaties, but prevented him from carrying out an advantageous contract stipulated nearly five months before between him and the Government of Caracas?

The writer believes there were no reasons, and this from the following considerations:

The decree of expulsion in nowise explains, nor does it even fasten upon the claimant, the vague and indefinite stain of being "notoriously injurious to public order."

He had had personal relations with the ex-president, Ignazio Andrade, and from this arose the suspicion that not only was he a revolutionist, but so closely allied with the rebel factions as to have undertaken to carry with him their political correspondence to Venezuela. All of which is extremely improbable and even absurd. No proof has been advanced in support of these suspicions, and no incriminating papers were found on him at the time of his arrest.

The Venezuelan Government which, when the royal Italian legation, in December, 1900, intervened in behalf of claimant, had alleged as the cause of expulsion "the inconvenience of the attitude assumed by that subject (i. e., the claimant) as contrary to the security of the peace," has not been able to furnish this Commission anything more definite than a report of the Venezuelan consul at San Juan de Puerto Rico that there were rumors connecting Oliva with the Andradists.

It is worthy of note that the consul, to whom Talleyrand would have found it unnecessary to give his famous advice, "Surtout pas trop de zèle," waited until the 2d of April, 1901, to explain why he had conceived suspicions in the preceding November regarding the claimant, and there is nothing to show that he had, either by telegraph or in a letter by the steamer on which Oliva was traveling, denounced him to the Venezuelan authorities; but even admitting that he had done so, it is beyond question that had the consul attributed any weight to the rumors concerning the claimant he would have taken steps to have him searched or arrested on board the Philadelphia, so that the Government might eventually gather proofs in support of the accusations directed against him and prevent all danger from the supposed revolutionary correspondence. But, however all this may be, it is indisputable that nothing material or convincing has been submitted to us that would make us believe or admit that Oliva was a revolutionary agent, or was returning to Venezuela for any other purpose than to complete the contract for the erection of the cemetery at Caracas.

The foregoing would be sufficient to prove his expulsion harsh and arbitrary; but there are other very strong reasons for believing that he was simply the victim of a precipitate and abusive measure.

Even though the claimant be in nowise bound to furnish negative proof of his abstention from political affairs, a most difficult thing in any case, but particularly so in his case, on account of having been compelled for many years to live far from Venezuela, he nevertheless exhibits the statement of Ramiro Callazo, then consul for Venezuela in Habana, from which it appears that that ex-functionary had always known him in that city as a man of pacific habits and one occupied exclusively with the conduct of his business affairs.

It should also be remembered that he had contracted with agents of the very Government that had deposed Andrade from the Presidency to build the cemetery; that there never had been the least probability that the deposed President would ever again assume the reins of government, nor even was there a party that thought of restoring him to his high office after his forced departure from his country. It can not be shown that he ever schemed or intrigued with this end in view, or ever encouraged revolts. It is notorious that Andrade is far from being venturesome, but is of a conciliatory disposition, and his recent submission to President Castro, who has permitted him to return to Caracas, where he is now living peacefully, is the best evidence of the truth of these assertions.

These circumstances are so well known that it is not worth the while to insist on them. They have merely been related to show the impossibility of admitting, except on absolute proof to the contrary, that the claimant at the time he was coming to Caracas for the purpose of constructing the cemetery according to the contract entered into by him with the functionaries of the existing Government, was simultaneously in the secret service of a President and a party that had not the slightest probability of returning to power; he, who from his long residence in the Republic, must have been perfectly acquainted with the internal political conditions among which he had always observed the strictest neutrality. To hold the contrary would be to consider the claimant as guilty of both imprudence and improvidence to an improbable degree.

On the question of the arbitrariness of claimant's expulsion the Italian Commissioner believes he has said enough to place it beyond doubt. An indemnity should therefore be awarded, and it only remains to fix the amount thereof according to rules of equity.

The claimant demands 2,138,707 bolivars, which is an exaggeration. The sum is thus divided by him: 1. For the forced settlement of his business house in Habana, 32,295 bolivars; for moral reparation of his arbitrary arrest and expulsion, 1,000,000 bolivars; for loss of his share of profit following the forced suspension of the contract, 1,126,512 bolivars.

Let us examine these three items.

The claimant has submitted an extract from his account books, sworn to before a notary, from which it appears that during the period from July 1, 1899, to December 31, 1900, his business house in Habana suffered a loss of 32,295 bolivars, as before stated. Of this sum 4,917 bolivars were spent in voyages to Venezuela on business connected with the construction of the cemetery, and this sum it would seem proper to reimburse. It is not possible to state exactly, nor can the claimant on this point give more conclusive evidence than that already furnished, whether the ulterior loss of 27,378 bolivars was the direct result of the precipitate liquidation of the Habana business, but it is presumable that it was largely so. Therefore the writer begs that the honorable umpire, in determining what amount of indemnity shall be allowed, will take into due consideration in this respect the indications furnished by the claimant of the losses suffered by him in consequence of the forced abandonment of the contract for the erection of the cemetery.

The item of 1,000,000 bolivars in compensation for expulsion is by far too large, but an award is certainly due him under this head. Considering, therefore, the good reputation always enjoyed by the claimant, his industrious character, and the high social class in which he moves, as well as the fact that the expulsion was from a free country, without just motives or the assignment of any adequate reasons therefor, besides the injury to his standing and business relations resulting from so arbitrary an act, the writer is of opinion that an indemnity of not less than 40,000 bolivars should be conceded, independently of any sum which might justly be found due him for losses resulting from the arbitrary rupture of the contract aforementioned, since there can be no doubt that, even had he not obtained the concession referred to, the sole fact of his arbitrary expulsion would furnish sufficient ground for a demand of indemnity.

Let us now turn to the oft-cited contract, and assume that no consideration need be given the clause in article 10 thereof, in which Oliva renounces the right to claim by diplomatic recourse. The claimant could not renounce what was not exclusively his, since governments exercise diplomatic protection whenever the same seems to them a just and proper measure in defense of their interests and dignity, without regard to any private agreements to the contrary, particularly as these latter are often made through necessity on the part of their subjects. Never has any validity been attributed to clauses analogous to that found in the Oliva-Otanez contract, and which are frequently encountered in contracts entered into with governments of South American republics, and it has sometimes been necessary to depart from the rule adopted by the legislatures of many of those States, according to which foreigners have not, except in extreme cases, the right to appeal to their governments for protection; this in deference to the principle that sovereignty is not absolute, but limited by the right of others to make good whatever valid reasons they may have.

But in the present case there is more, and that is that by the protocol of February 13, 1903, the Venezulean Government expressly renounced all exceptions of this nature in the Mixed Commission.

Now we must consider in the first place that the contract drawn up between the claimant and the municipal government of Caracas, which is nothing more than a branch of the Federal Government, has nothing in common with those fantastical concessions so frequently put forward as the bases of unjustifiable claims. Oliva undertook to furnish Caracas with something of which it stood and still stands greatly in need. With this object in view, he closed out his business in Habana with the intention of definitely abandoning that city, and made trips to Venezuela, submitting to the Government officials here plans of the proposed cemetery (which are to be found among the papers) designed by the engineer Enrico Giorgi, to whose collaboration the claimant had had recourse.

Before leaving Habana he secured, by means of a special contract, the financial aid of the firm of G. Brocchi & Co., which agreed to furnish him at once $50,000 for the commencement of the proposed work, and additional sums later on, all of which conclusively shows the earnestness of Oliva's purpose. The calculation which he makes of the losses to which the breaking of the contract has subjected him, while certainly not exact, is by no means devoid of foundation.

He certainly could not predicate the number of deaths in Caracas during the twenty years' duration of the concession, nor how many of the families of such deceased would have been minded to purchase the sepulchers that it was proposed to construct, and no one could tell with any degree of exactness whether the prices which it was proposed to charge for the various tombs and chapels would have been within the means of said families, but there is no doubt whatever that the death rate of Caracas is considerable and that many persons intend honoring the remains of their dear departed by depositing them in appropriate sepulchers, and that here one can neither live nor die cheaply.

It is quite possible that claimant may have, in his calculations as to profits, indulged his fancy somewhat largely; but, considered as a whole, his claim is just.

It is worth our while to compare the accounts of the claimant with certain data. From various documents forming part of the expediente, and particularly from the issue of the Gaceta Municipal of January 10, 1903, it is shown that in 1902 3,368 bodies were buried in Caracas. Of this number 2,340 were classed as insolvent. The remaining 1,028 belonged to classes in easier circumstances and were officially designated as solvent. From the report of the governor of the Federal District of February 27 and laid before the National Congress of the present year, it appears that during the years 1901, 1902, and 1903 the number of deaths in this capital were 2,838, 3,233, and 3,199, respectively, and that of those who died during the last of these three years 949 were solvent and 2,257 insolvent. It would therefore seem that the claimant's calculations as to the death rate here is correct; but he exaggerates somewhat the number of families able to purchase tombs for deceased members. According to his figures these would amount to between 33 and 40 per cent, while official data in our possession show not more than 30 per cent.

We must observe, however, that claimant's memorial is dated March, 1901—that is to say, before the last war, which caused great dearth in business and brought ruin to many families. Should the present conditions of public tranquillity continue, as is hoped and as everything seems to indicate, the normal condition will again be reached.

As to the prices at which the tombs were to be sold, we have not, in truth, any official and correct data to establish this point. From the contract we gather that for each high-class funeral the claimant had agreed to turn into the treasury of the city 40 bolivars and for ordinary funerals 20 bolivars, and further that the contract authorized him to receive from whoever might desire to possess a tomb, either large or small, the sum of 350 bolivars, retaining the privilege of disposing of the mortuary chapels at any price that might be agreed upon. These latter, according to plans, were to be 124 in number.

The claimant in his calculations assumes he might have sold the small tombs at 240 bolivars each, the large at 340 bolivars, and the mortuary chapels at 10,000 bolivars each. The tombs, not counting the chapels, numbered, according to the plans, 7,930, and as about 1,000 persons of the better class die each year in Caracas, this claimant affirms, apparently not without good reason, that in less than twenty years the cemetery to be constructed by him would have been filled.

In order to establish the accuracy of his calculations it would be necessary to have data which, perhaps from the lack of statistics and economic research, neither the claimant nor anyone else could here produce. In other words, it would be necessary to determine beyond question what number of those classed as "solvents" belong to families capable of purchasing tombs at from 240 to 340 bolivars each, and how many (certainly few in Caracas) would undertake to purchase a mortuary chapel at 10,000 bolivars.

It is upon this point that the claimant is, perhaps through no fault of his, vague and indefinite in his estimate. The writer thinks therefore that it would not be equitable to award the sum claimed under this head as representing the value of a ten or twenty years' exploitation of the cemetery.

If the act of expulsion, of which he justly complains, prevented his carrying out an enterprise which would have proved profitable, and besides entailed upon him the expense of voyages and compensations to those who were associated with him in this enterprise, loss of time, etc., it is nevertheless true that since his enforced absence from Caracas he has been at liberty to display elsewhere the activity which he would have employed here.

It is equally to be borne in mind that the sum of 971,000 bolivars which was to be used in the construction of the cemetery could not have been furnished him gratuitously by his capitalists, and even though a portion thereof was to be lent him by Brocchi & Co., of Habana, who, in consideration of which loan, were to have a special interest in the future profits of the cemetery (a deduction on account of which the claimant has already made), the remainder of the funds required to carry on the proposed work must necessarily have been productive before its amortization, whether furnished by himself or obtained from others, but this circumstance seems not to have been considered by him. Had it been, it would have lessened his estimate of the amount of prospective benefits.

Taking all these facts into account, the Italian Commissioner is of the opinion that the claimant is entitled to an indemnity for enforced nonexecution of his undertaking of not less than 280,000 bolivars—that is, one-fourth the amount claimed by him under this head; for his arbitrary expulsion, 40,000 bolivars, as above stated; for reimbursement of expenses for voyages to Venezuela, etc., 4,917 bolivars; in all, a total of 324,916 bolivars.

ZULOAGA, Commissioner:

Lorenzo A. Oliva, an Italian, domiciled in Habana, was expelled from the territory of the Republic by a decree of the chief executive magistrate of November 30, 1900. The Government of Venezuela considered the foreigner, Oliva, objectionable, and made use of the right of expulsion, recognized and established by the nations in general, and in the manner which the law of Venezuela prescribes. Italy makes frequent use of this right. The undersigned does not believe that Venezuela is under the necessity of explaining the reasons for expulsion.

Nevertheless, in the Oliva case, the agent of Venezuela has presented a report of the consul of Venezuela in Puerto Rico and two letters, from which it appears that Oliva was denounced by several persons with whom he came in a ship from Habana as an agent of the revolution of General Andrade, and this denunciation having been transmitted to Caracas, was the cause of the arrest of Oliva. The latter in an interview published in the Pregonero says that on being apprehended he was shown an official telegram in which there appeared the denunciation of the consul at San Juan, and in his letter to the minister of Italy at Caracas, December 6, 1900, he says that "The Government proceeded by virtue of a letter from its representative at San Juan;" and he admits, moreover, that he traveled with General Andrade from Habana to Puerto Rico.

The circumstances which the consul of Venezuela recites and the letters which he sent (which were confidential documents of the minister of foreign relations) are entirely sufficient to justify the suspicions of Oliva's revolutionary character. To this circumstance there is added the fact that Oliva was in fact a personal friend of Andrade, and that he had lived a long time in Venezuela in former years, whereby his complicity with the revolutionists was very plausible. The act of having gone to demand a passport from the consul of Venezuela in order to come to this country when it was not necessary shows also that his mind was not easy, and there were reasons for this. (The denunciation which was made to the consul was subsequent to the granting of a passport, as appears from the report.) As to how far it was ascertained that Oliva was a revolutionist is not a matter for discussion. It was sufficient that there existed well-founded reasons in order that the Government of Venezuela might so believe, and this appears to be proved. The honorable Commissioner of Italy asserts that General Andrade was not a revolutionist. The opinion of the Venezuelan Government was different.

Oliva demands fantastic amounts as damages, which he says he suffered because he could not execute a contract which he had made with the municipal council of Caracas to construct the cemetery of Caracas, a chapel, and a pantheon for families, and the honorable Commissioner of Italy believes that a large part of them should be allowed him. If Venezuela makes use of a right in decreeing the expulsion, it is clear that it can not be condemned to pay damages, although they were ascertained. This doctrine appears virtually to have been established in the decision of the honorable umpire in the case of Boffolo,<sup>a</sup> since the damages there allowed are not and could not have been for damages inflicted in the exercise of a right, but for "useless vexations in exercising it," which is very different.

It is useless, therefore, to enter into a concrete examination of what is demanded by Oliva, but it is not useless to observe, even if it only be for the moral appreciation of the case, that all his premises are false.

First. It is not true that because of his expulsion it was impossible for him to complete the work, because he might have done so through another person, or at least obtain new extensions of time within which to begin the work, by the consent of the authorities over him.

Second. The assertion is not true that he had the concession for the cemetery of Caracas. He had only the right to construct therein a building to keep remains and build vaults to deposit cadavers in. The cemetery was to remain such as it is.

All the statements are therefore erroneous.

I do not find that it is shown that Oliva has suffered in his expulsion violences or insults which were not the natural consequences of the decree, and of the necessity of carrying it out, and considering the charges made against Oliva it is easily understood that he was not allowed liberties which might aid the fulfillment of a revolutionary commission, if perchance he carried it.

AGNOLI, Commissioner (in reply):

The Venezuelan Commissioner has characterized the principle that I have maintained as absurd; that is to say, that a contract is broken as soon as one of the contractors is expelled by the other from the territory of the state in which the contract ought to have been performed.

The undersigned refrains from calling the opinion of his colleague as absurd, but he finds it very original, to say the least.

Mr. Oliva stipulated with the municipality of Caracas, which is nothing but a branch or an organ of the Federal Government, to execute his contract himself.

To demand that Oliva should have had recourse to managers or to powers of attorney, to ask of him and impose on him the placing of his confidence in people whom we do not know and whom perchance he could not find—to pretend in fine that he should assign his contract without knowing that anyone would accept his terms or that he should direct the work which was to have been done at Caracas from Habana or any other place—is preposterous.

His contract was broken de facto, because its execution under the conditions agreed on, was rendered impossible by an arbitrary measure of the state, it is true, but of a state which had been by the intervention of one of its organs one of the contracting parties.

Has the Venezuelan Government at last shown its good will by revoking the decree for the expulsion of Oliva? Never.

Under these circumstances it is certain and sure that the claimant has a right to an indemnity because of the consequences of the breach of his contract.

There is not a court in the world that would not allow damages under such circumstances, and the Mixed Commission, which is a tribunal of equity, ought all the more to allow them.

If the demand which Oliva presents on this account is rejected under the pretext that he had not commenced the work on the cemetery when he was expelled, and that therefore he suffered no direct damages, the absolutely subversive principle is sanctioned that the Venezuelan Government can, by an act of expulsion, or by no matter what illegal act, fail in the performance of its obligations assumed by contract, without making itself liable to any penalty.

The Valentiner case<sup>a</sup> that the Venezuelan Commission cites proves nothing, or rather proves that the claim of Oliva is well founded in principle.

Mr. Valentiner made a claim because of the consequences of the recruiting of his laborers. The recruiting was a legal act in principle; and the umpire of the German Commission, in refusing indemnity, has acted properly.

Liability can not attach to a person who exercises his right.

Oliva makes a claim on account of the consequences of an illegal act, and all the more unjust because this act was committed against a person who was in possession of a contract entered into with the Government itself, which by this abusive measure injured him.

The Venezuelan Commissioner finds that Mr. Oliva has not proved his innocence. It is not his place to prove this innocence. Every man is considered innocent until the proof of the contrary is produced. It was therefore the Venezuelan Government that should have proved that the claimant was guilty, and this is just what it has not done.

When expulsion is resorted to in France or Italy the proofs are at hand. Mere suspicions may justify measures of surveillance, but never a measure so severe as that of forbidding the residence in a country of a man who has important interests therein. In the opinion of the Venezuelan Commissioner there is constant mention of a chapel. It was not only a chapel that Mr. Oliva was to have built; it was a chapel and a cemetery. A plot of ground had been granted him of 19,600 square meters in which the chapel should have been built with a great many annexes and sepulchers besides the cemetery. The neighboring ground, 100 meters square (in all 10,000 square meters), was to have been filled with sepulchers.

According to the proposed management and plans the number of sepulchers to be constructed was to have been 7,930, without counting 120 little chapels, which were anticipated being sold at 10,000 francs each.

There was therefore a matter of importance under consideration, and not merely a chapel of which the Venezuelan Commissioner speaks.

RALSTON, Umpire:

The above entitled claim has been duly submitted to the umpire upon difference of opinion between the honorable Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela. The claim, which is for the sum of 2,158,807

bolivars, grows out of the expulsion of Oliva from Venezuela, and the facts in connection therewith seem to be as follows:

In the month of November, 1900, Oliva went as a passenger from Santiago de Cuba to San Juan, Puerto Rico, at which point he changed his steamship for one going directly to La Guaira. At San Juan he received a passport from the consul of Venezuela. He reached La Guaira on the 27th and Caracas on the evening of the same day. In the afternoon of the day succeeding his arrival he was arrested upon the order of the governor of the Federal District in consequence of a telegram sent by the prefect of La Guaira, resulting from a denunciation made by the Venezuelan consul in Puerto Rico, declaring that he was an intimate friend of General Andrade, and was going to Venezuela in the capacity of revolutionary agent. He was taken to the prefecture, where he was detained until 7 o'clock in the evening. He was then returned to his hotel, but kept under guard until the President should order his restoration to liberty, which, it was believed by the police officers, would be immediate. He was placed incomunicado for a number of hours, and was not allowed to speak to his counsel or seek relief in the courts of justice. All of his commercial books, correspondence, and letters were examined without the discovery of anything of an incriminating nature. His companions in jail were French criminals who had escaped from Cayenne. He was then taken to La Guaira, and under circumstances of contumely sent out of the country.

In the month of July, 1900, Oliva had entered into a contract with the municipal council of the Libertador Department of the Federal District, obliging himself to construct a family pantheon in the cemetery of the south, and he had immediately thereafter gone to Habana, where he had been engaged in business, closed up his business, as it is said, at a loss, arranged to raise the money necessary to construct the pantheon, and when arrested was about to commence the work. His expulsion rendered it impossible for him to proceed with the concession so obtained, and he was compelled to abandon it, together with all prospects of future profits.

The umpire does not find it necessary to again discuss the principles governing the right of expulsion. The existence of this right was recognized, and the dangers incident to its exercise were sufficiently pointed out in the case of Boffolo, in which an award of 2,000 bolivars was given. It is sufficient in the present case to say that the expulsion of Oliva appears to have taken place without legal right, although it is recognized that the Government at the time felt itself authorized to exercise its power. The mere idle suspicion of a consul should not, however, in an international commission be received as a sufficient justification for the infraction of an international right.

In the Boffolo case, the umpire, in granting but 2,000 bolivars, was influenced by what seemed to be the unworthy character of the man. In the present case the claimant appears to have been a man of standing and character and recognized by a branch of the Venezuelan Government as a worthy concessionary. The honorable Commissioner for Italy now asks 40,000 bolivars for the expulsion, and this amount is not, under the circumstances, considered as excessive.

Large damages are asked for the practical loss of the concession above referred to, and elaborate calculations have been made as to the probable number of deaths in Caracas during the period of the concession, the number which would have been interred within this pantheon, and the probable profits arising from each sepulture. In the opinion of the umpire this method of computation must be entirely rejected. It is first to be borne in mind that the concession was not exclusive in its nature. Any number of concessions might have been given, the effect of which would have been to render this one valueless. Furthermore, the number of interments in this pantheon and the possible profits on each interment are so absolutely uncertain that they could not be accepted as a basis of calculation in an ordinary civil tribunal, much less in an international one. We have only to refer, so far as international tribunals are concerned, to the Geneva arbitration; some of the reasons for the conclusions arrived at being stated by Mr. Frazier, on the part of the United States, in the American and British Claims Commission, as follows (4 Moore's International Arbitration, p. 3926):

The allowance of prospective earnings by vessels was denied by the tribunal at Geneva unanimously. It is not, so far as I am aware, allowed by the municipal law of any civilized nation anywhere. The reason is obvious and universally recognized among jurists. It is not possible to ascertain such earnings with any approximation to certainty. There are a thousand unknown contingencies, the happening of any of which will render incorrect any estimate of them, and hence result in injustice.

The municipal law of the United States is to much the same effect. Thus in Hodges v. Fries (34 Florida, 63) it was held that profits which are speculative or conjectural are not generally regarded as elements in fixing damages in actions for breach of contract between lessor and lessee, not because there is anything in their nature per se which demands their reduction, but because they can not be estimated with reasonable certainty.

Again, in Newbrough v. Walker (8 Grattan, 16) it was held that the same rule applied to breach of covenant to lease a mill, and evidence in an action for the breach as to what the lessee could have cleared from the use of the mill was speculative and conjectural, and furnished no legitimate basis on which to estimate damages, and the same rule has been followed in a very great number of like cases.

It is not to be inferred, however, that Venezuela has the right, either directly or indirectly, to break the concession, or that no recovery therefor should be allowed against it. A nation, like an individual, is bound by its contract, and although it may possess the power to break it, is obliged to pay the damages resultant upon its action. In the present case, what was the value of the contract? This value is not determined by prospective profits, for the reasons above indicated. In this case, and referring only to the particular facts involved in it, we may concede that the value of the contract is the amount expended to obtain it (plus a reasonable allowance for the time lost by the claimant in connection therewith), and while the proof upon these points is not as clear as might be asked, we may accept as the amount recoverable the figures given in the profit and loss account of Oliva, as expended in his first voyage to Venezuela in the cemetery matter, to wit, $675.54, or 3,512.81 bolivars. For his time, evidently covering several months, the sum of 5,000 bolivars may be allowed.

There is also to be allowed in favor of the claimant the expenditures of his second voyage, amounting to $357.03, or 1,856.56 bolivars.

The umpire is asked to allow the loss to which it is said Oliva was subjected, because of being compelled to dispose of his stock of goods in Habana at a reduced price, to enable him to go to Caracas and enter upon the cemetery concession. So many elements enter into a matter of this sort that the umpire can not accede to this suggestion. The goods may have been sold at a reduced price, because of a falling market, because of their age, or for other reasons he is incapable of appreciating, all the surroundings not being presented to him. He would not be justified in charging this loss, therefore, against Venezuela, even were it otherwise proper, with relation to which he expresses no opinion.

An award will therefore be signed for the amount of 50,369.37 bolivars, with interest on 10,369.37 bolivars from October 28, 1903, to and including December 31, 1903.

CORVAIA CASE.

(By the Umpire:)

This Commission only has jurisdiction over "Italian claims," meaning thereby claims which were Italian in origin and Italian when the Commission was formed.

In the present case the original claimant, born a subject of the Two Sicilies, lost his citizenship, according to the code of that country, by accepting diplomatic employment from Venezuela, and never regained it, and the claim of his heirs must, therefore, be rejected.

Venezuela knowing that when Corvaia entered her diplomatic services he abandoned Sicilian citizenship, Italy is now estopped from claiming him as a subject.

Seem that a man (and consequently his heirs as well) who accepts, without permission of his government and against her laws, such public and confidential employment from another nation is estopped from claiming his prior condition to the prejudice of the country whose interests he has adopted.

Sambaggio case<sup>a</sup> affirmed in its interpretation of "most-favored-nation" clause.

AGNOLI, Commissioner (claim referred to umpire):

Contrary to the position taken by his learned colleague of Venezuela, the Commissioner for Italy holds that Baron Fortunato Corvaia did not, by the fact of his having accepted charges and missions from Venezuela (in the absence of evidence of his having previously obtained the consent of his own Government) lose his Italian citizenship, and, true to the principle he has always maintained that the original nationality of a claim should be considered as the absolute rule and guide in determining its admission before this tribunal, invokes from the umpire a decision which will recognize all the heirs of Corvaia as entitled to share in the liquidation of the estate in just and due proportion, and without distinction based on their actual citizenship.

But should the umpire consider the Baron Corvaia as having lost his primitive nationality, the Commissioner for Italy begs to insist that the deceased had not thereby acquired citizenship in Venezuela, and could not have contracted any bond of allegiance to this Republic.

It is therefore his opinion that this claim should, even under the least favorable hypothesis, be considered foreign with respect to Venezuela, and that consequently the umpire should, without prejudice to the rights of such of the heirs whom he intends considering as invested with Venezuelan or other nationality, in consonance with the principles he has himself proclaimed, award a due share of the indemnity claimed to such of the heirs of Corvaia as are to-day enjoying Italian citizenship.

As regards the nationality of Baron Fortunato Corvaia, the Italian Commissioner again calls the attention of the umpire to the arguments addressed to him in the Giordana claim, No. 116, which was allowed as a claim for salary due for services rendered as engineer for the Venezuelan Government. It is indeed true that the services performed by Baron Corvaia in the United States and at Paris were vastly more important than those of Giordana, but when it is considered that they were rendered in a time of absolute peace between this Republic and other nations, particularly the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, it must be admitted that the deceased was never in a position to defend foreign rights and interests in conflict with those of his country, and that he did not resort to extremes which, according to rule, are considered necessary, when services rendered a foreign government, without the consent of the home government, involve a loss of nationality.

For the rest, it appears from documents submitted to the Commission that the Corvaia family, out of favor with the Bourbon Government on account of its liberal sentiments, had been driven from the Kingdom of Naples. Could Baron Fortunato Corvaia, who had followed his father Joseph in exile, turn to the clemency of his sovereign with a request for a permission which would most certainly have been denied him? We have among the papers of the claim a copy of the petition with which the deceased, finding himself, in January, 1854, passing with his family through Naples, and receiving from the police a new order of expulsion, had had recourse to his King for a revocation of that odious measure, which was denied him. To assume, therefore, that Baron Corvaia, son of a political refugee, and himself driven from the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies and considered as an outlaw, should, shortly after his expulsion and during the most rigorous period of Bourbon tyranny solicit from his Government the above-mentioned authority, or make him fall under the incubus of failing to obtain it, seems contrary to all rules of justice and equity.

Corvaia never solicited any permission, for it would have inevitably exposed him to a refusal which would have placed him in the attitude of disobedience to his King, whose faithful subject he still considered himself, as is abundantly proved by his above-mentioned petition of January, 1854, in which he styled himself a "good citizen." The umpire should particularly note this expression "good citizen" occurring in the petition written by Corvaia himself and addressed to his King.

The Italian Commissioner holds that any tribunal called upon to decide whether the deceased baron had, under the circumstances, lost his nationality through this omission, the consequences of which it is sought to exaggerate in order to cause a rejection of the entire claim, would give a negative answer. In this sense particularly would tribunals of Italy decide it, who are truly competent in this respect, if we consider that that provision of law, which had never been applied, according to the solemn declaration in the Italian Senate of the minister of pardons and justice himself, Emanuel Gianturco, was subsequently abolished by the act of January 31, 1901, it having been recognized that the acceptance of foreign service lacks in general those conditions which warrant the assumption of an intention on the part of a citizen to renounce his original citizenship.

In every case the law which abolishes a provision having a penal character is retroactive, and Corvaia, against whom the loss of citizenship had never been pronounced by the magistrate, should be given the benefit thereof, and through him to his heirs and descendants. The Commissioner for Italy observes besides that the services of Corvaia in behalf of Venezuela had not the true and proper character of an employment, but were missions. The Venezuelan minister of foreign affairs, Giacinto Gutierrez, in a letter to the minister of hacienda, of March 18, 1856, declared having appointed him to a mission to France as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary. Corvaia, in Washington as in Paris, acted as confidential agent; that is to say, in a capacity in which we must recognize the essence of a mission or extraordinary charge, and not an employment.

If afterwards other titles were conferred upon him, as those of envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary in France, when he was in Paris endeavoring to foster emigration, which was in fact the principal object for which the Republic had sent him, it was only because under such title he could more readily place himself en rapport with the Imperial Government and be officially recognized by the French minister of foreign affairs.

Whenever the Italian code speaks of employments, it is in the sense as understood in the Kingdom, those into which one enters as a career at modest compensation with a view to future advancement into more important undertakings. The mission assumed by Corvaia carried with it no assurance for the future, not even so much as a retired pension, and did not constitute an "employment" according to our law.

It never occurred to Baron Corvaia that his operations in Europe and North America in behalf of Venezuela could involve a forfeiture of his original nationality or set up a legal bond of a permanent character between himself and the country for whom he was acting. He lent his services in deference to the President of the Republic, Joseph Thadeus Monagas, whose intimate friend he was, and as a personal favor, as well as to render himself useful to the land to which he had come in his youth, where he had raised a family, and increased his private fortune.

No sooner had his functions of minister from Venezuela to Paris ceased, they having been terminated by the retirement of Monagas from the Presidency, than Baron Corvaia accepted the post of minister from Ecuador to the same capital. As he had no intention of changing nationality by the acceptance of missions under Venezuela, so also he could have had no thought of endangering it by undertaking similar functions for the Government of Ecuador.

These operations imposed upon him living expenses far in excess of the moderate salary granted him by the Venezuelan Government, and which, as proved by documents in the claim, was never fully paid.

The court of cassation of Belgium, by its decree of June 25, 1857, about the time Corvaia was acting as Venezuelan minister in Paris, laid down the following maxim:

* * * la naturalisation est acquise. Tant qu'elle ne l'est pas il n'y a point de changement de nationalité.

Besides that of Cogordan, the umpire will doubtless remember the opinion of the eminent Italian jurist, Fiore, cited by the writer in his memorial in the Giordana case; that opinion is the synthesis of the rulings in Italy whenever there was application of article 20 of the Sicilian code, afterwards replaced by the eleventh article of the Italian code now in force, and that prevail in principle. Says Fiore:

Even if it were established that according to the internal law one should find himself bereft of one nationality without having acquired another, as we must, in accordance with international law, always eliminate the condition of a lack of determined nationality, so we should hold, as more in consonance with just principles, that such person is in the meantime a citizen of the country in which he was born (until he becomes a citizen of another), during the period intervening between the loss of one citizenship and the acquisition of another. (Fiore, Droit International Privé (Antoine), sec. 345.)

The same author observes:

The loss of original citizenship should not be held as an accomplished juridical fact until it is proven that a new one has been acquired. (Ibid., sec. 344.)

We will see in proceeding that Baron Fortunato Corvaia never acquired Venezuelan nationality.

In the work recently published entitled "La República Argentina y el Caso de Venezuela, por el Doctor Luis M. Drago, ex-Minister de Relaciones Exteriores," there is quoted in Spanish an article which appeared in "The Nineteenth Century and After," of April, 1903, from the pen of Mr. John Macdonnel, member of the supreme court of Great Britain, of the Institute of International Law, etc. At page 168 of said article in the aforementioned publication we read that the Ecuadorian Congress passed a law which contained (art. 5) the following provision:

Foreigners who may have filled positions or commissions which subjected them to the laws and authorities of Ecuador can make no claim for payment or indemnity through a diplomatic channel.

And Mr. Macdonnel observes:

It is almost needless to say that the diplomatic corps at Quito protested against this legislation. The United States Secretary of State denounced it as subversive of all the principles of international law.

In this affirmation of the Secretary of State aforesaid is found the proof that in the councils of the North American Government there prevails the principle advanced here by the Italian Commissioner, to wit, that the acceptance of missions and charges abroad, and particularly in South American countries, where there has been and is frequent recourse to foreign collaboration, does not involve a loss of nationality, since it is considered that there persists in the individual accepting such posts a right to claim, per via diplomatica, against the government which availed itself of his services, and that therefore his nationality persists as before.

The contrary theory is justly styled "subversive."

The honorable Commissioner for Venezuela has manifested his intention of sustaining also the following points: (1) That Fortunato Corvaia forfeited his Italian citizenship because he left his country with no intention of returning, and (2) because he violated his neutrality.

To these exceptions the writer objects that Corvaia left his country by reason of the proscription of his family from the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, and therefore by no spontaneous act creating any juridical situation whatsoever; that he established himself in Venezuela at the age of 18, and when, by reason of his minority, he could not, either by implication or directly, decide his nationality; that the intention of returning to the mother country must be assumed as persisting in the bosom of an exiled family; that when in 1854 Corvaia not only manifested the intention of repatriating, but desired to settle with his wife and family in Naples, he was expelled by the Bourbon police, against which measure he unavailingly protested; that, finally, it is freely admitted that he who emigrates for the purposes of trade and commerce, as had been the case with the deceased, can not without further evidence be viewed as having the intention of definitely abandoning his original domicile, particularly as in the present case Corvaia had not on arriving in Venezuela any settled purpose of establishing himself therein. He came to these shores seeking health. Only the force of circumstances decided his residence here, though with frequent and long absences.

The intention not to return should exist at the time of expatriation. The non-return may be brought about by a multiplicity of causes quite independent of the will of the emigrant, and has of itself no legal value.

The Italian Commissioner observes further that it does not appear that Corvaia ever participated in the political affairs of the Republic in such a way as to constitute an infraction of neutrality, since his operations were always in behalf of the constituted government, from which alone he accepted offices. If the following of such a course toward the legal government of the country which then sheltered him were held to imply a violation of the duties of neutrality, then must the foreigner be compelled to refuse any assistance to the authorities of his abiding place and manifest both insensibility and ingratitude in not preoccupying himself with interests not identical with his own.

Fortunato Corvaia favored Venezuela to the extent of his abilities, and now, when many of his credits toward the Government remain unpaid, there is hurled against him the charge of having violated his neutrality—a charge which from every legal and moral point of view should be rejected as unsustained. Never did Corvaia participate in the political struggles of the country or associate with the revolutionists. He always remained a foreigner, and though he loved this country well enough he never consented to become Venezuelan, and Doctor Zuloaga can not produce a single act of his during his long sojourn here from which may be deduced his intention to become a citizen, and much less that he had done so.

Fortunato Corvaia was the last scion of a family that had suffered for its country. His father lived exiled from his native land; his ancestors had filled public offices in the Kingdom of Naples. For centuries the Corvaias had figured among the aristocracy of Sicily. Such a man will not readily abandon his nationality, to which he must of necessity be profoundly attached, and in him such an act can not be presumed in the face of a complete want of precise and explicit renunciation or the formal act of naturalization. Besides, the Corvaias have always considered themselves Italians, and were recognized as such, not only by the representatives in Caracas and elsewhere of the Royal Government, but by the authorities of the Republic. In proof of this there is submitted an authentic extract from the register of the notarial acts of the Royal Italian legation in this capital, from which it appears that in 1877 Enrico Corvaia caused to be legalized the diploma of the Equestrian Order of Venezuela of Bolívar, conferred upon him for services rendered to the Republic, and in the legalization referred to the royal chargé d'affaires of that period, the Chevalier Massone, styled Corvaia a royal subject.

There is likewise submitted an authentic extract of the general power of attorney conferred on the Baron Fortunato Corvaia the 30th of October, 1877, by his son of the same name, for the transaction of divers affairs in Italy. In this document, the original of which is to be found in the same register of notarial acts, the royal Italian chargé d'affaires thus declares: "Appeared before the legation the royal subject Corvaia Fortunato, of Fortunato, native of Caracas," etc.

Fortunato Corvaia, native of Caracas, was styled an Italian citizen by the royal legation in 1877, and since he was a native of Venezuela, the quality of Italian citizen could not have been attributed to him, save and except as he was the son of the Italian Baron Fortunato Corvaia.

The royal legation recognized Baron Corvaia, ex-minister of Venezuela to Paris, as an Italian citizen, and the proof of this is evident and undeniable.

It is well known that Venezuelans can not, under their laws, assume titles of nobility. Now, the deceased had not relinquished his, nor did any of his male descendants. (See certificate of birth of Giuseppe Isacco Enrico Corvaia, the certificate of decease of Lucio Corvaia, the power of attorney of Teresa Campbell, of Fortunato, and Ricardo Corvaia to the Signora Luisa, widow De Lara, and the copy of the dispatch of the Italian minister of foreign affairs, all contained in fascicle No. 2.) We might conclude from all this that never did the deceased or his descendants contemplate being local subjects. But there is more. In the same fascicle the honorable umpire will find a document emanating from the prefect of the department of Bravo, in the state of Guarico, Venezuela, under date of June 2, 1880, in which Enrico Corvaia is styled an Italian citizen.

The Signora Luisa Corvaia, widow of the Venezuelan general, Eladio Lara, was not pensioned by the Venezuelan Government, as she should have been, because she was a foreigner. It would therefore seem that the Corvias have been considered Italians, even by the authorities of the Republic, evidently because it was notorious that their father was originally Italian, and so remained to the day of his death.

The writer believes he has convinced the honorable umpire of the equity and substantial foundation of his argument. But in the event that the umpire should decide that Baron Corvaia had ceased to be Italian, he would not for that have become Venezuelan. It is not deemed necessary to enter into a long discussion in support of this proposition. The conditions by which Venezuelan nationality is acquired are tacitly indicated in the fundamental laws and codes of the Republic. The members of the Corvaia family never complied with the formalities necessary to that end. We may add that it does even appear, and until proof to the contrary is submitted by the Commissioner for Venezuela, it may be absolutely denied, that he ever took the oath of allegiance or any other toward this Government, and from this we may deduce his firm intention of remaining true to the nationality of his origin. A bond of allegiance between him and this Republic could not arise, because neither in the Venezuelan nor in the Italian legislature is such a juridical condition foreseen and contemplated. By the law of either country, one is a citizen or one is not.

The very word "allegiance" can not be exactly translated into either Spanish or Italian.

Besides, allegiance seems to be due solely to the sovereign, and the loyalty of the subject is to his king, his natural protector—a thing almost inconceivable in a country governed according to republican principles; but even were it admitted that there were such a bond between an individual born in a monarchy and a country under republican rule, there would still be required the formal and essential oath of allegiance, which we know, and as will more clearly appear further on, he never took.

Ernest Lehr (Elements of English Civil Law, par. 38), referring to this, says:

To within quite a recent period England was a country of perpetual allegiance. Whoever was born on British soil was a British subject, and could not cease to be such without the consent of the prince.

Calvo (Dictionary of Public and Private International Law, p. 35), speaking of the word "allegiance," says:

It is the name which is given in England to the obedience which every subject owes to his prince and his country. Any individual born a subject of the British Crown can never, by a mere act of his will, dissolve this obligation and break the bond of allegiance which unites him to the sovereign of Great Britain.

This doctrine of allegiance is thus summed up by Blackstone<sup>a</sup> and Stephen:

Natural allegiance is such as is due from all men born within the king's dominions immediately upon their birth. * * * An Englishman who removes to France, or to China, owes the same allegiance to the king of England there as at home, and twenty years hence as well as now. For it is a principal of universal law, that the natural-born subject of one prince can not by any act of his own, no, not by swearing allegiance to another, put off or discharge his natural allegiance to the former, for this natural allegiance was intrinsic and primitive, and antecedent to the others, and can not be devested without the concurrent act of that prince to whom it was first due.

These definitions and opinions confirm the principle that the bond of allegiance can not be conceived except as due a sovereign, and obviously that of the country of birth, not to be contracted toward another prince, and in every case with a solemn oath of fidelity.

Instead of this, we see Corvaia, in 1854, when he had already filled the post of confidential agent of Venezuela in the United States, and on the eve of accepting a mission to France, making an open act of submission and devotion to his legitimate king. Let it be noted, besides, that the first law, in the order of time, according to which employees of Venezuela were obliged to take an oath—not carried into effect, as we know from the Giordana case<sup>b</sup>—was promulgated May 29, 1865, that is, at a time considerably after Corvaia had accepted the mission referred to, which completely excludes the idea of his having taken any oath whatever.

The Italian Commissioner must therefore insist upon his position that the Corvaia claim can not in any case be held to be an originally Venezuelan claim. He believes it to be Italian, since the deceased baron must have had a nationality, if we assume with Folleville (Studies of Private International Law, p. 285) that the legal status of a person without a nationality is "a more singular and unjustifiable anomaly than would be a duality of fatherlands;" but in any conceivable hypothesis, he maintains that this claim must constitute for Venezuela an essentially foreign claim.

The honorable Doctor Zuloaga has declared to the writer that other exceptions will be submitted, and will sustain the forfeiture of the right of the Corvaia heirs to claim before this international tribunal, either because the damages upon which their claim is based were suffered by the deceased in a period long since passed, or because he does not appear among the Italians indemnified under the provisions of the protocol of La Ville-Jiménez, of October 7, 1868, or because the heirs did not have recourse to the royal Italian legation in 1894, when, under Count Roberto Magliano de Villar S. Marco as minister to Caracas, it drew up an agreement in regard to claims with the Government of the Republic. In rebuttal, the Italian Commissioner recalls, in the first place, his arguments in the Gentini case, with reference in general to the subject of prescription in international relations, and observes, in addition, that all the credits of the Corvaia heirs are of such character that the Venezuelan Government can not have ignored their existence, and that therefore, in conformity with the principles admitted by the honorable umpire in the claims of Giacomini<sup>a</sup> and Tagliaferro,<sup>b</sup> prescription could not in anywise operate against them. It appears, besides, from various documents found in the papers of the Corvaia claim, that neither the deceased baron nor his heirs ever had the least intention of abandoning the rights which to-day, under more propitious conditions as to time and tribunal, they propose to defend, which intention has, on the contrary, been repeatedly manifested by them.

The protocol of La Ville-Jiménez was subscribed for the purpose of effecting an amicable settlement of all Italian claims up to that time presented to the royal Italian legation. It contains no declaration on the part of the chargé d'affaires indicating the abandonment or exclusion of any claim not comprised among those contemplated in this international act. The words "with the addition of this sum the total amount of all the claims is 1,154,686 pesos," and "the Italian claims," on the meaning and scope of which the honorable Commissioner for Venezuela bases his argumentation, would be superfluous unless accepted as referring to the claims presented, known, or liquidated at the time the above-mentioned protocol was stipulated.

To give an unlimited interpretation to those words would be equivalent to prejudicing legitimate interests, and certainly the chargé d'affaires would never have assumed the responsibility of shutting out claims of which for obvious reasons he could have had no knowledge, without special authority from his Government, which he surely never had. If the Venezuelan Government had intended that every anterior claim should be liquidated by the above protocol, it would undoubtedly have insisted upon an explicit clause or declaration therein to that effect—something it did not do then or during the preliminary discussions.

As a matter of fact, in the report of this protocol furnished by the legation to the minister of foreign affairs at Rome, an authentic extract of which is herewith inclosed, mention is made of "the claims of royal subjects which had been recognized and admitted by the Venezuelan Government." There is no mention of all claims, and it is permitted to be implicitly but clearly understood that there existed other claims for which diplomatic action remained reserved.

In the partial settlement of claims obtained by Count Magliano in 1894 only those were examined which arose from damages and requisitions of the revolution resulting in the elevation of General Crespo to the presidency. This is established by the tabular statement of claims for indemnity of that period submitted in the original to the examination of the honorable umpire, written by Minister Magliano himself, special attention being invited to page 4 of the statement marked "B" in red, in the column of remarks, in which may be read, opposite the entry of claim of Stefano Giajer del fù Giovanni, these words:

This not being a case of damages occasioned by the civil war, but by an alleged abuse, the royal legation has decided that it can not be accepted, and the claimant should appeal for redress to competent authority, in conformity with existing law.

Therefore if the Corvaia heirs did not present their claim to the legation at that time, it was undoubtedly because it would not have been received thereby. For the rest, has not the Mixed Commission liquidated claims arising out of the war of 1892, notwithstanding the rule laid down by Count Magliano?

Claim No. 199, of Giuseppe A. Menda, accepted by the Venezuelan Commissioner himself, was for requisitions made in 1892, and others of the same nature have likewise been accepted.

Did not the Commission, notwithstanding the opposition of the Venezuelan Commissioner, settle claims of the period of 1898-1900, though not included in the ultimatum of 1902, and in the sum of 2,810,255 bolivars obtained by the protocol of Washington of February 13?

It were well to recall the claim of Massardo, Carbone & Co., which entailed a long discussion and a decision of the honorable umpire sustaining the contentions of the Italian Commissioner.

Have we not awarded indemnity in claims for damages arising in the period 1871-72, in spite of the rulings of Magliano and Riva?

The above-mentioned protocol of Washington makes no such restrictions, and admits all Italian claims without distinction to the examination of the Commission, excepting only those already liquidated and those of holders of bonds of the foreign debt.

To demonstrate how unjust and contrary to law and equity is the theory opposed to that advanced by the Italian Commissioner one example will suffice.

Recently the Italian citizen, Biagio Lamberti, presented himself before the royal legation and exhibited absolute and undeniable proof that in 1899 he supplied military musical instruments to the Venezuelan Government to the value of 1,430.55 bolivars. Lamberti, who holds an order from the war office in his favor for the sum named, signed by Gen. Diego Bautista Ferrer, on the minister of hacienda, has not, in spite of repeated efforts, been able to obtain payment. The said Lamberti, who resides in Caracas, did not want to have recourse to this Commission, and only now comes to seek the aid of the royal representative to obtain his due, delayed until now with no apparent motive. Can it be said that because Lamberti very patiently refrained from formulating a claim before the Commission, he has forfeited the right to invoke the assistance of the legation, and that it must refuse to protect him?

The Washington protocols do not peremptorily declare that claimants shall either submit their claims or forfeit them. They have simply provided for the installation of tribunals in equity, before which claims may be judged, and opened a way by which claimants may obtain speedy justice; but if any among them have not desired to avail themselves of these means, or thought it inopportune to do so, they have surely not on that account renounced any of the means of redress to which they are entitled by common law.

The conclusion to which the Italian Commissioner arrives is that while the protocols furnish a mode of liquidating claims for indemnity, in the absence of a clear and explicit declaration to the contrary, they were never intended to exclude future diplomatic action, or preclude the possibility of claimants whose cases have not been considered of having recourse to the authority of their country. Now, this clear and explicit declaration the protocol of 1868 does not contain.

The reasons why Baron Corvaia did not press his claim in that year are unknown to us, but to argue from that one fact that he no longer considered himself an Italian, while all else proves the contrary, or that he, and therefore his heirs, should have lost the right to claim, is unjust.

This abstention may be explained, rather by the affectionate regard he had for this country, or the important personal relations which always induced him to hope, even to the day of his death, that he would be able to bring about an amicable settlement of his numerous credits against the Government, or by his frequent and prolonged absences in Europe. At that time his credits did not really constitute a claim, because the measures he and those interested with him had instituted for a direct reimbursement were still pending, and besides, while other royal subjects were presenting claims, he had still so much faith in the strength of his relations with the Government that in that same year (1868) and subsequently, he continued to advance it money.

Let it be noted further that prior to 1868 Italy had never had a settlement of claims with Venezuela; that the kingdom of the Two Sicilies had never had a diplomatic representative in Venezuela, and that that of the King had only existed since 1864, with frequent interruptions; to say nothing of the fact that while other nations had secured settlements through mixed commissions, Italy had never had a commission until after the blockade, so that, generally speaking, there had been no opportunity for Italian citizens to have recourse to the justice of international tribunals.

If Baron Corvaia had formally pressed his claim through diplomatic channels he would have been charged with ingratitude. Having shown himself moderate, courteous, and forbearing he is rewarded in having heirs told that because their ancestor had made no claim (which is not strictly true) they had forfeited their right to do so.

This is a style of argumentation and judgment that does not appear to be inspired by those principles of absolute equity which should constitute a guide for the Mixed Commission.

This being premised, it is pertinent to examine, from the point of view of citizenship, the status of each of the Corvaia heirs, as much in the warranted supposition that the honorable umpire will admit that the deceased never abandoned his nationality of origin as in the scarcely probable hypothesis that this quality will be denied him, while admitting him to be no Venezuelan, it being out of the question to consider him a citizen of this Republic.

María Teresa Corvaña, first-born child of the deceased baron, married an Italian, Signor Pasquale Miccio, living, and is therefore certainly Italian.

Margherita, fourth daughter of the deceased baron, married to Baron Carlo Bottini, an Italian citizen, and therefore she, too, is an Italian.

Giuseppe Isacco Enrico, sixth son, was born in Naples. If his father is held to be Italian there can be no doubt as to the nationality of the son. If his father is held to have lost his original citizenship, Enrico should nevertheless be considered as Italian, as he was born in Italy after his father had lost his citizenship, and all the more so in that his father had not acquired another nationality. A careful study of article 5 et seq. of the Italian civil code will result in an absolute conviction that Enrico Corvaña is not and can not be other than an Italian.

He has, in any case, a true and undoubted legal status as an Italian citizen, recognized, as has heretofore been said, as well by Venezuelan authority as by the royal Italian legation. His name is inscribed in the proper register of the legation itself, to which he exhibited, not many months since, a certificate of the census of Paris, where he customarily resides, in which he declares himself Italian, and a passport of August, 1903, from the royal embassy in that city, in which he is likewise styled an Italian. What nationality would the honorable Commissioner for Venezuela ascribe to Enrico Corvaña?

Irene, deceased, born in Caracas, married Gen. François Ernest Le Plus, became French by said marriage, and left heirs who are all of French nationality.

Fortunato, third son, and Ricardo, fifth son, are Italians, according to the law of Italy, because they are the sons of a citizen. The first, it has been seen, was so considered by the royal legation up to 1877. For the honorable umpire will no doubt take into account the certificate of identity drawn up at the royal Italian embassy at Paris, from which it appears that both are recognized as royal subjects, contained in book No. 2 of the claim, as well as the circumstance that they have not since many years lived in Venezuela and had never established a domicile therein.

Lucio, eighth son of the deceased baron, was an Italian, because he was born in Paris of an Italian father. He died, leaving two children, Fortunato and María Louisa, both born at Barquisimeto, Venezuela, and a widow, also born in the Republic, now married to a Venezuelan. The two children are Italians by the laws of Italy—article 4 of the civil code. It is not denied that they were born and reside in Venezuelan territory and the former decisions of the umpire are not lost sight of, but we reserve our opinion on that point.

The Signora Luisa Carmela Corvaña, who presents the claim, widow of the Venezuelan general Eladio Lara, was born in Paris. There can be no doubt as to her Italian nationality, if the same nationality be accorded her father.

Besides, according to article 14 of the Italian civil code, the native woman who marries a foreigner becomes a foreigner, since always by the fact of matrimony she acquires the nationality of her husband.

Article 18 of the Venezuelan civil code provides that the foreign woman who marries a Venezuelan acquires all the civil rights of a Venezuelan and retains them during her husband's lifetime.

Article 17 of the same code provides that foreigners shall enjoy the same civil rights as Venezuelans.

The Signora Luisa Corvaia De Lara has not, therefore, by the fact of her marriage with a Venezuelan, acquired in fact Venezuelan citizenship, but only the civil rights proper to Venezuelans—those rights which are generally enjoyed by foreigners in Venezuela. She has not on that account lost her Italian nationality.

Even if by an interpretation too sweeping, and to our mind unwarranted, it were desired to make these rights—the civil rights referred to in article 18 of the Venezuelan civil code—equivalent to nationality, which seems absolutely contrary to Article VIII of the Venezuelan constitution, which does not number among Venezuelans the foreign women married to local subjects, this quality would have been lost to her by the fact of her widowhood, and would therefore ipse jure have resumed her former nationality, either on the principle that one can not be without citizenship, or by a logical and pacific application of article 14 of the Italian civil code, and this notwithstanding that she, having lived in Italy after the death of her husband, as shown by documents in No. 2 of the claim, had not made the requisite declaration before the proper official (not considered necessary for the reasons above set forth) of her intention of living there.

If it is not admitted that Baron Corvaia preserved his Italian citizenship, it will be somewhat difficult to establish the nationality of his daughter. It might be contended that being born in Paris she must be French.

Teresa Campbell, widow Corvaia, was born of English parents in Caracas, and married Baron Fortunato Corvaia in 1846, being now a widow, as shown by certificate above mentioned as having been recorded at the royal embassy in Paris, and having resided in Europe since the death of her husband. If the latter be considered as Italian she must likewise be so considered, since according to principles admitted by the umpire, and given her prolonged residence abroad, article 19 of the local civil code could hardly be applied to her case, whereas she might very properly invoke article 9 of the Italian civil code which provides:

The foreign woman who marries a citizen acquires citizenship and retains it even as a widow.

If, then, the deceased husband is regarded as having lost his Italian nationality, it will be for the umpire to decide whether or not his widow, under the circumstances, may appear as a claimant before this Commission.

Summing up, then, under the most favorable hypothesis, if the Italian origin of the claim of the deceased baron be admitted, all his heirs should be admitted to share in the indemnity here claimed. If this view is not to prevail, but it be recognized, as we confidently believe, that Baron Corvaia never lost his Italian citizenship, according to precedent decisions of the umpire, then only the heirs of Lucio, the only ones born and living in Venezuela, and the heirs of General Le Plus, who are French, would be excluded from participating in the award.

Under the most unfavorable hypothesis (we will not even suppose that the baron will be considered as being Venezuelan) in which the deceased will be judged to have lost his Italian citizenship, there would always remain, as undeniably Italian, Giuseppe Isacco Enrico Corvaia, Maria Teresa Corvaia Miccio, and Margherita Corvaia Bottini. These three descendants could not in any case be shut out from participating as Italian subjects in the liquidation of a claim which was foreign from its very origin.

The Italian Commissioner expects from the umpire a decision founded on the highest rules of justice and equity; and in calling attention, with regret, to the steps taken by the interested parties, with no practical results, for a direct settlement with the Government, he urges that in rejecting the claims of such of the heirs as may not be deemed recognizable before this Commission, it be without prejudice to their interests before any other tribunal, as, for instance, before the local courts, and in the case of the heirs of General Le Plus, and possibly of the Signora Luisa Carmela, widow Lara, through the intermediary of the French legation in Caracas.

ZULOAGA, Commissioner:

The heirs of Mr. Fortunato Corvaña claim the sum of 16,438,661.23 bolivars, which they say the Government of Venezuela owes them for various negotiations which their predecessor in interest Corvaña had with the Government, and for interest accruing upon the sums owed. The claims are until now generally unsubstantiated, or they have informal proofs; but the preliminary question of the nationality of Corvaña arises, and even the question of the nationality of the claimants themselves, and these are the questions which are now submitted to the honorable umpire.

Mr. Fortunato Corvaña, as appears from the biography presented by the claimants, came to Venezuela in the year 1838, immigrating with the intention of establishing himself in the gold mining regions of Guayana. He did not come to Guayana, but remained in Puerto Cabello, where he was for three or four years, and afterwards removed to Caracas, where he established himself as a printer and engaged in other business. In the year 1846 he married, in Caracas, Miss Teresa Campbell, a Venezuelan, and on the 24th of January, 1848 (which is a celebrated day in the political history of Venezuela, because of the coup d'état, which upon that day the chief of the Government performed), the biography to which we refer says that Corvaña was in Congress, performing the duties of political and literary reporter; that there he discovered the plot against the life of General Monagas, and that, exposing his own life, he went out to give notice of it to the wife of the President of the Republic. (This really has never been known in Venezuela, or was there any such plot.) In the same year, 1848, Gen. Hosea Antonio Páez, representative of the so-called conservative party, and who already had been twice President of the Republic, took up arms against Monagas by virtue of the events of the 24th of January, and Corvaña left for the United States of America to seek armament and ships of war for General Monagas, leader of the liberal party.

In the following year, 1849, the Government named Corvaña in order that he might confidentially negotiate with the minister of the United States of America, with the object of strengthening relations with the American nation. In June, 1850, it appointed him confidential agent to said Republic. In January, 1851, the minister of foreign relations of Venezuela addressed himself to the Secretary of State of the United States to tell him—that the President of the Republic, after receiving notice that Páez and his partisans were attempting to form an exploitation in the United States, in order to renew their attempts against the institutions and the legitimate government of this country, has seen fit to send there a diplomatic agent, who, observing the conduct of the Venezuelans expatriated because of their political crimes, might give opportune notice of this monstrosity of their plans, and prevent their being put into effect; that with these objects and that of promoting the friendly relations which exist between both countries, has accredited Mr. Corvaña in the character of chargé d'affaires to the United States.

A little later Mr. Corvaña goes to Europe with various missions, and among others a mission to the Holy See. In March, 1855, the Government appointed Corvaña confidential agent to various courts of Europe, with the object of promoting immigration, and in March, 1856, he was appointed envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Venezuela to several courts of Europe, the consuls in said countries, in conformity with the law of 1824, being, therefore, under his supervision, and he was minister until June 1, 1858, when he ceased to hold this office because of the revolution which had triumphed in March of that year.

In the year 1860 Corvaña goes to Venezuela and is put in jail. At that time Gen. Hosea Antonio Páez was dictator; he ruled the conservative party, and the imprisonment of Corvaña was only the political imprisonment of the constant servant of Monagas against the conservative party. In 1863 the liberal party again triumphed, and Corvaña again goes to Venezuela and enters anew into favor, and negotiates with the Government. If he had not returned since 1858, it was as he himself says, in a note of December, 1866, which is found in Record I, "by reason of said revolution," because of the fear of persecution by his political opponents. In this same record (I) a statement of Corvaña of his services as minister appears. He enumerates them thus:

I believe that I can assert without fear of contradiction that my assiduous efforts and labor have brought advantageous results. Among these the recognition of the nation by the Russian and Ottoman empires, by the * * * of the Two Sicilies and Portugal, especially in the capitals and important cities of Europe; * * * I negotiated treaties of friendship, commerce, and navigation with Prussia and the other states of the "Zollverein;" I concluded another with Sardinia, * * * the present Government of your excellency (1863), ratified the second of these treaties, and have signed with Italy, which is the same one as has just been published as a law of the Republic, in which there were established two principles of the greatest importance for this country: 1. That which designated the only sort of damages and injuries for which both parties would be liable in case of revolution; that is to say, those caused by the legitimate authorities, excluding, therefore, those arising from any other sources. 2. That which makes arbitration obligatory as to the disputes which arise between the two countries. On the other hand, I succeeded in obtaining a very advantageous adjustment of the claims of the French Government on account of the efforts of the law of suspension, and almost paid what was owed by this Government. I did the same thing with the English Government in the matter of the claim of Fitzgerald, and in all these negotiations I have only borne in mind the good name of the nation. * * * Finally, upon giving up my diplomatic functions on account of the events of 1858, I was honored by Ecuador. * * *

Corvaña from the time of his return to Venezuela remained in the country, and died in 1886 in the village of Maiquetia, situated on the coast very near La Guaira.

This is the life of Corvaña, as appears from the proofs presented by the claimants. From it, it appears in a clear manner that Corvaña constantly intervened in the political affairs of Venezuela; that he was a high official of state from 1848 to 1858; that in 1848 he sought arms for Monagas, and later was a secret agent of the liberal party to watch the acts of Páez, leader of the conservative party; that in all the liberal administrations he enjoyed very special favors, and carried on lucrative negotiations with the Government; that during the administration of the conservative party he was persecuted as a political enemy, and that in order to avoid this he remained abroad during this period. That these facts established it follows: 1. That the heirs of Corvaña can not claim before this Commission, because it is a national recognition, and under the principles of national law diplomatic protection is not accorded to individuals who mix in the political affairs of another nation. 2. That Corvaña, born in the Two Sicilies in 1820, has lost his nationality, since in the Two Sicilies the Napoleonic law, with very few modifications, was in force, and among the articles referring to the loss of nationality there were articles 17 and 18 of the Napoleon code, which provides his loss of nationality by the fact of absenting himself in another country without the intention of returning, and also by accepting public employment from a foreign government. As is seen, these two circumstances apply to Corvaïa, the first because it is evident that a man who as he did came to Venezuela in his youth and without resources, married there, made his fortune there (almost entirely by political negotiations), who there raised his family, who was there honored by distinctions, and there died, had considered Venezuela his true country, without the intention of returning to his native land, to which nothing called him.

Because of the code of Napoleon, which in the premises is in accord with the Italian code, and provides for the loss of nationality by one accepting public employment from a foreign government, there is no stronger case in which to apply it than in that of Corvaïa, who was for the space of ten years the confidential agent, chargé d'affaires, and minister plenipotentiary of Venezuela; who had been received in this capacity in the country which it is now attempted to claim as his fatherland, and had obtained from the Governments of the Two Sicilies and of Sardinia political advantages of paramount importance.

The question as to the loss of nationality was discussed in this Commission in the case of Giordana,<sup>a</sup> but he was an assistant engineer in the service of the minister of public works, and the honorable umpire of this Commission was of opinion, bearing in mind the humble character of the employment, that it might be considered that he had not lost his nationality; but he said that he reserved his opinion with respect to a case in which the employment was of more importance. After the office of the President of the Republic, I do not see what authority can be higher or more important than that which Corvaïa for many years exercised, as representative of the Republic in the United States and the courts of Europe, entering into agreements, and having the consuls subordinate to him.

The theory of the loss of nationality by the acceptance of employment does not admit of any exception, according to the commentators on the code of Napoleon, and it is applied rigidly. The excuses which may have been made can not influence a matter now of fifty years ago. In this question of the loss of sovereignty I do not see how discussion is possible. The law of the Two Sicilies is definite in declaring that Corvaïa was not a Sicilian, and it is not to be supposed that a state claims from another state for the benefit of anyone whom its own laws declare is not a citizen. This is a matter of strict right and as to which the Commission ought to strictly apply the law of the case. The citation of authorities which the honorable Italian Commissioner makes are therefore out of place, since they refer to personal opinions and assumptions, more or less founded for the solution of the conflict of nationalities. Besides, some of the citations of my honorable colleague might be considered as opposed to his opinion, and I might cite paragraphs of Fiore which are. Based, therefore, on the three reasons mentioned, that Corvaïa had taken part in the affairs of the country, had lost his nationality by establishing himself in Venezuela without the purpose of returning to the Two Sicilies, and because he accepted public positions in Venezuela, he claims the Corvaïa claim is inadmissible. With respect to Corvaïa, moreover, there is a very serious circumstance, and it is that he, when the Two Sicilies were annexed to Italy, was not a Sicilian, nor was he domiciled in the Two Sicilies, an indispensable requisite in order that the annexation might affect his nationality. The Hon. Mr. Agnoli, Commissioner for Italy, has insinuated that although Corvaia had lost his nationality (had never been a subject of the King of Italy), this does not hinder his heirs from claiming internationally. This would be an absurdity in law. No one can transmit to another more than what he has, and if Corvaia could not have claimed the protection of a foreign nation against the Government of Venezuela, it is not possible that his heirs should have that right. I am not aware that the Hon. Mr. Ralston would give a contrary opinion, as my honorable colleague asserts. It is to be observed that Corvaia never thought of asking protection from the Government of Italy for any claim. The fragment of a copy of a letter which is presented in order to show that Corvaia believed he had the right to a claim has reference to a French claim.

Since Corvaia was not an Italian, this is sufficient to exclude the claim, and it is useless to enter into a study as to the nationality of the actual claimants. Nevertheless, these are not Italians.

Teresa Campbell, widow of Corvaia, is a Venezuelan, born in Caracas in 1831, and if by the fact of her marriage she may have changed her nationality, as a widow, she recovered her original citizenship. The case would already have been decided in that of the widow Brignone,<sup>a</sup> but in the present case it is my opinion that the wife of Corvaia never has been an Italian.

Irene Corvaia, deceased, married Gen. Francis Le Plus, and was born in Caracas; she was, therefore, never an Italian, and her heirs are French.

Fortunato Corvaia was born in Caracas in 1849. He lived in Venezuela for many years, and to-day resides in Paris. He is, therefore, an Italian.

Ricardo Corvaia was born in Caracas in 1851, lived in Venezuela for many years, and to-day resides in Paris. He is therefore a Venezuelan. It is to be noted that the fact of residence in France does not even give the character of residence to those who live there.

Henrique Corvaia was born in Naples in 1853. He has always lived in Venezuela, and he has a wife and children here, and at the time of his birth, it appears that Corvaia was acting in the capacity of confidential agent of Venezuela. At the time of the birth of Henrique Corvaia his father had lost his nationality, and he could not, therefore, be claimed by Italy as a national. (See art. 11, Italian code.) It is to be borne in mind that these claimants who call themselves Italians have never shown by any direct or legal proof that they desire to be Italians, and it does not appear that they have rendered military services in Italy.

Luisa Corvaia, widow of Lara, was born in Paris in the year 1857, her father being minister plenipotentiary of Venezuela. She was born in the legation; she is the widow of a Venezuelan general, and has always lived in Venezuela. She is therefore a Venezuelan. Italy can not claim her as an Italian. Margarita was born in Caracas, married in 1879 Carlos Bottini, a Frenchman. Her husband was naturalized an Italian in 1888, and if this naturalization had any influence, in no case could it give her the right to appear as an Italian claimant, because of an act long preceding the naturalization. Moreover, Margarita Corvaia, French, because of the nationality of her husband, did not acquire Italian nationality by his naturalization, since, according to the French rule, naturalization is personal. (Fiore, Droit International Privé, p. 379.)

Teresa Corvaia was born in Caracas in 1847; married Pasquale Miccio, an Italian; legally separated from her husband in 1873, and resides in London. If she preserved the Italian nationality by virtue of the citizenship of her husband, in reality very weak ties bind her to her country.

An order of expulsion from the Two Sicilies has been made use of as proof that Corvaia retained his nationality. I do not see why. This order might also have been made against a stranger or a man like Corvaia who could not rely upon the nationality of the Two Sicilies. Nothing in these documents leads us to suppose that Corvaia had thought that he preserved his nationality. Besides, we do not know the antecedents of this matter. The fact that Corvaia or his family were not friends of Bourbons and therefore had to ask permission to hold a public office in Venezuela, since it would have been denied it, is an argument adduced which is turned against the claimants, since it leads us to believe that Corvaia was appointed against the desire of the Government of the Two Sicilies.

For the reasons set forth, I am of opinion that, without entering into the merits of the case, the claim of the heirs of Corvaia should be rejected.

On this occasion only the nationality as a previous question has been considered. Every other question, including that of prescription, I shall consider upon their merits.

In order to answer the last paragraph of his honorable colleague the undersigned has to say that, from information which he has obtained in various public offices, it appears that at no time have the heirs of Corvaia taken any sort of action, or made any sort of claim, and that the first notice which has reached the Government of Venezuela of the existence of the claim came to it when it was made known that it would be presented to this Commission.

AGNOLI, Commissioner (additional opinion):

The Italian Commissioner takes cognizance of the abandonment on the part of the Commissioner for Venezuela of the prejudicial exceptions previously formulated by him relative to the forfeiture of the right of the Corvaia heirs to defend their interests before this Mixed Commission, these exceptions being based on the circumstance that neither the deceased Baron Fortunato, in 1868, at the time of the stipulation of the protocol of De la Ville-Jiménez, nor the heirs themselves subsequently, prosecuted their claim against the Government of the Republic through the intermediation of the royal Italian legation.

Therefore the undersigned holds it as useless now to submit to the umpire a list of the claims for indemnity which had occupied the attention of the Italian minister, Count Magliano, and mentioned in my memorial of the 12th instant, on page 19.<sup>a</sup>

The objections raised by the Commissioner for Venezuela in this Commission can therefore affect but one point—that of nationality. The Italian Commissioner presents, as complementary to the arguments used by him in sustentation of his opinion concerning the acceptability of the present claim, and in reply to the objections of the Venezuelan Commissioner, the following observations:

1. It is not established that Baron Corvaia ever went to Naples as minister for Venezuela, that he presented his credentials, or that, finally, his appointment as a diplomatic representative of this Republic to the Bourbon court exceeded the limits of a simple designation not followed by an effective accomplishment of plenipotentiary duties.

There is, on the contrary, a strong presumption that Corvaia never did actually perform them officially, given his status as a Neapolitan subject, descendant of political exiles, and himself expelled from the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies.

There is in fact a proposed treaty with the Two Sicilies, but this document is simply a project—it bears neither date nor signature, does not give the names of the negotiators, and is not in the writing of the deceased baron. It need not even have been submitted to the Commission, and from it one proof alone can be drawn—that of the utter sincerity of the claimants.

2. The letter addressed under date of June 26, 1885, by Baron Fortunato Corvaia to the minister of the King of Naples at Paris, Marquis Antonini, concerns a simple exchange of publications. At that time the baron was not minister, and was not considered as a member of the diplomatic corps; as a matter of fact, the reply of Marquis Antonini is addressed to Signor F. Corvaia, without official qualification whatsoever.

3. Concerning the acknowledgment of the Republic of Venezuela on the part of the Neapolitan Government, the credit for which was claimed by Corvaia in a document, the importance and authenticity of which will be hereafter referred to in this paper, it is to be understood as resulting from his private negotiations, and nowhere does it appear that it was brought about officially. We do not even know at what time this transaction took place.

4. The document contained in book I, a letter of the deceased to the President of the Republic, dated January 14, 1863, in which he requested payment of some of his credits, is not in the handwriting of the deceased, but is a copy, and it is not known whether the original was ever sent. In it the deceased relates his services to the Venezuelan Government, and with all due respect to his memory be it said, appears to indulge in momentary exaggeration. As a matter of fact there has never been, so far as can be learned from a research of the old Italian treaties, a treaty between the Kingdom of Sardinia and the Republic of Venezuela, and Corvaia had never been a subject of the King of Sardinia, and his relations with that Government, whatever they may have been, could have had no influence on the nationality of the deceased.

As regards the treaty between Italy and Venezuela of June, 1861, it may be admitted that the deceased baron had privately collaborated in its preparation. I say, "it may be admitted," because there is nothing definite with regard thereto. It can not be denied, though, that this international agreement was stipulated nearly three years after he ceased his functions as minister plenipotentiary for Venezuela; that it was signed in Madrid, where it does not appear that he was present officially or otherwise; that the representatives of the two countries were Mr. Fermín Toro for Venezuela, and Baron Romualdo Tesco for Italy, both being ministers plenipotentiary at the court of the Queen of Spain. The name Corvaia does not appear therein.

5. The right, so far as regards the Italian heirs, of a person who had, for instance, lost this nationality without acquiring that of Venezuela, to claim before this Commission is certainly not absurd, since the claim would, in such case, be of foreign origin. The umpire has already so decided.

The undersigned holds that the foreign holders of claims against Venezuela, coming to them by inheritance and not purchased with a view to prosecuting them, have a right in law and in equity to have recourse to diplomatic aid in the prosecution of their claim even though it had originally been the property of a local subject, and that therefore this Commission would be competent to pass upon such cases.

This principle has been recognized as just in prior Mixed Commissions as well as by the council of the contentious diplomat in session at Rome.

6. The letter written by Corvaia to his daughter Luisa, dated February 18, 1885, expresses the hope that the diplomatic convention then concluded between France and Venezuela would facilitate the settlement of his claim. I can not see that it would be possible to deduce from the copy of this document that has been shown us anything but the intention on the part of the deceased to avail himself of diplomatic means in securing a recognition of his rights. It is out of the question to argue that it was his intention at the opportune moment to appeal to any legation other than the Italian, since he was not born French, neither had he acquired that nationality.

7. The honorable Commissioner for Venezuela affirms that Corvaia was not a Neapolitan subject at the time of the annexation of the southern provinces to the rest of Italy, and calling attention to the fact that he was not then living in the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, concludes that the deceased could not have acquired Italian citizenship.

In regard to this it is worthy of note that the question as to whether or not Baron Corvaia was a Neapolitan citizen in 1860 is precisely the point at issue, and that therefore the assertion of the honorable Commissioner would seem to imply a begging of the issue; now with regard to the effect, so far as the citizenship of Neapolitan emigrants is concerned, of the annexation of the Kingdom of Naples to the other Italian provinces, taken from the Monarchy of Savoy, it is well to remember that there was no cession of a part of the territory of said State, but an incorporation of the whole Kingdom of the Two Sicilies with that of Italy; the Bourbon dynasty was deposed, and the Neapolitan State, as a political autonomy, ceased to exist.

It is not possible to admit that all the Neapolitans who, in 1860, were residing abroad should either have been at once deprived of all citizenship or preserved their original one, to form a nationality without government or territory. It must therefore be evident that they became without distinction Italian citizens.

8. The honorable Venezuelan Commissioner thinks the Baroness Margherita Bottini should be considered as without right to claim before this Commission, in that having become French by her marriage she must have remained so, notwithstanding the fact that her husband has for the last sixteen years been a naturalized Italian citizen. The Commissioner for Venezuela has here raised a very nice question, one that might have considerable value and importance were we called to decide French-Venezuelan claims instead of Italian-Venezuelan. Such a question can not come before this arbitral tribunal.

The French code in nowise provides for such a case; but the undersigned recognizes that French jurisprudence has adopted the maxim that a change of nationality on the part of the husband does not affect the status of the wife.

The Italian Civil Code, however, provides (last paragraph of art. 10) that—the wife and minor children of the foreigner who acquires citizenship become citizens, provided they, too, have fixed their residence in the Kingdom, and by the same article the option of citizenship is granted to the children, but not to the wife.

Now, the Bottinis have for many years resided in Italy, and it is notorious that the Baron Carlo Bottini exercises important functions in Italian railway administration.

There is no real issue between the French and the Italian law on the point under discussion, because so far as regards the former it is in the last analysis a question of interpretation, and the latter has a provision clearly and distinctly conferring citizenship on the wife of the naturalized foreigner. But even if there were a conflict, given the fact of the continued residence of the Bottinis in Italy, the honorable umpire, in conformity with principles by him laid down in other cases and with the general principles of law, should recognize the wife as having Italian citizenship to the exclusion of any other. The fact that this lady has acquired (or reassumed, because the writer holds she was born Italian) Italian citizenship, at a time subsequent to the events upon which this claim is based, does not appear to be a motive for debarring her from the right to prosecute her interests before this Commission against the Republic of Venezuela. It suffices that the claim be Italian at the time it is presented to the Commission, and it would be out of reason to insist upon its never having had another nationality. The Bottinis did not assume Italian citizenship in view of the present Corvaia claim.

Concluding, the Italian Commissioner deems it opportune to remark to the honorable umpire that, in expressing the opinion that the fundamental exceptions with regard to the nationality of the deceased Corvaia and of several of his heirs at present exclusively submitted to his judgment should be set aside, he reserves his opinion concerning the admissibility of the specific proofs so far adopted by the claimants as to the eight points on which is based their demand for indemnity in the sum of 16,438,661 bolivars. These proofs will be taken up one at a time at the proper moment and discussed with moderation and according to equity, as well in regard to their intrinsic merit as in the calculation of the interest on the amount claimed, which must be reduced in accordance with prior decisions of the umpire and with precedents established by this Commission in analogous cases.

RALSTON, Umpire:

The above-styled reclamation is referred to the umpire upon differences of opinion between the honorable Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela as to certain preliminary questions, among others, that of the citizenship of Fortunato Corvaia; the honorable Italian Commissioner contending that he was a citizen of Italy within the meaning of the protocol between the two countries, and as such entitled to present the reclamation had an opportunity offered during his lifetime, and the honorable Commissioner for Venezuela denying such citizenship. It will not be necessary to discuss at the present time the remaining questions.

The references contained in the protocols, in so far as this Commission is concerned, to the character of the claims submitted to it are as follows:

Referring to the protocol of February 13, 1903, the preamble speaks of "Italian claims." Article I refers to "claims * * * preferred * * * on behalf of Italian subjects." Article III mentions twice "Italian claims." Article IV speaks of "Italian claims."

The preamble of the protocol of May 7, 1903, refers to "Italian claims against the Government of Venezuela," but gives no other specific characterization.

The only question which will now be considered by the umpire is as to whether the claim submitted was Italian as far as its original owner was concerned, waiving consideration for the moment of the further question, whether a claim before the Commission must be both Italian in origin and Italian at the time of presentation.

Many documents are presented to the umpire bearing upon the life history of Fortunato Corvaia, and from their examination one learns that he was born at Calascivetta, Sicily, in 1820, being the son of Guiseppe José Corvaia. At the age of 18 years, being in infirm health, he voyaged to Venezuela, leaving his mother in Paris; his father, who had been expelled from Sicily as a revolutionist, living from time to time in Malta, London, Paris, Brussels, and elsewhere. Corvaia arrived at Puerto Cabello, intending to go to the gold mines of Guayana, but, being urged to commence business at the point of debarkation, he did so. Some time afterwards he started a printing office on a considerable scale, thereafter translating into Spanish and publishing many of the works of the more noted French authors. In 1846, he married a girl of 14 years, by the name of Teresa Campbell, a child of English parents, who had come to Venezuela at the time of the war of independence. He interested himself in the public and social affairs of Caracas, forming a musical society, which finally constructed the Caracas theater. In January, 1848, he was occupied in the National Congress as a reporter for his politico-literary publications, and it is said had the good fortune to discover a plot against the life of General Monagas. The same year he went to the United States and brought back a complete supply of munitions of war and one or two vessels, fully armed and equipped, arriving at a fortunate time for the Government, which thereafter successfully opposed the then revolution.

Corvaia's fortune went on increasing, his business relations with the Government in 1850 demonstrating this fact. In 1850 and 1851 he represented the Government as its confidential agent in the United States, and in the latter year again brought to Venezuelan waters two completely armed vessels of war. A little later, pursuant to his initiative, there was established the cemetery of foreigners in Caracas. In 1854, he, with some friends, established a packet boat communication between La Guaira and Puerto Cabello; and between 1855 and 1858 instituted the banking establishment known as the "Compañía de Accionistas." With friends, he secured the concession for and installed the electric telegraph throughout the Republic.

After seventeen years of absence from Italy he embarked with his family for Naples, where his mother then lived, with the desire, as it is said, of residing at her side. He was, however, in Naples, we are told, subjected to an insufferable system of espionage, the royal police finally stopping a ball given in his family house to celebrate his return, alleging that such reunions became gatherings of conspirators. He then spent some time visiting various cities of Sicily, presenting his wife to his relatives, who desired him to again inhabit his father's house. The petitioner in this case tells us, however, that notwithstanding the insistence of his Italian relatives, it was not possible for him, with his activity of character, to remain tranquilly in the old peninsula, above all, when he knew that his father was prohibited from entering the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, and he therefore installed himself in Paris.

We have already learned that in 1850 and 1851, Corvaia represented the Government of Venezuela in the United States. It further appears that in 1853, 1854, 1855, and 1856 he was charged by the Government of Venezuela with arranging, in the best manner possible, questions pending between the Governments of England and Venezuela relating to its public debts, loans made since the year 1840, etc.

In the spring of 1856 he was appointed diplomatic agent to Europe, charged particularly with the duty of fostering immigration to Venezuela, and at his suggestion, in the early part of 1857, he was named envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Venezuela to various of the courts of Europe, and he continued in this employment certainly as late as the year 1859. In the year last named he presented his letters of recall, but about the same time was charged with the duty of representing Ecuador "ad honorem," in Paris as well as other European capitals, some months later receiving a more formal appointment. He appears to have remained in Paris at least the most of the time until about the 1st of July, 1862, when he returned to Venezuela. It is said that in 1864 and 1865 he aided the Government in connection with the making of a loan. Meeting, however, with losses, he opened a house for the sale of letters of exchange. Later he subscribed to a local loan, and on repeated occasions, as we are again informed, he aided the Government by advancements of money. In 1876 and 1877 he went back to Italy to be present at the death of his mother in Naples; his father having died in the year 1860. At that time Corvaia's mother left to the city of Castrogiovanni an income of 6,000 bolivars annually to aid its poor students. He died in August, 1886, at Maiquetia, Venezuela.

In view of the foregoing history, was Corvaia so far an Italian citizen that he personally, during his lifetime, could have successfully maintained before an international commission, controlled, as this must be by the protocols mentioned, a claim for advancements made to or damages suffered from the Government of Venezuela?

Corvaia was a Sicilian by birth, the land of his nativity—the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies—not having been merged into the Italian union until at least October 21, 1860, when the Two Sicilies joined Sardinia, the first Parliament of united Italy assembling in February, 1861. The determination of his nationality must largely, if not altogether, depend upon the code of the Two Sicilies, and invoking one printed in 1842 and at the disposal of the umpire, he finds that in treating of the deprivation of civil rights by the loss of the conditions of citizenship, it (sec. 1, art. 20), provides:

The condition as a national is lost—

1. By naturalization acquired in a foreign country.
2. By the acceptance, not authorized by the Government, of a public employment conferred by a foreign government.
3. Finally, by establishing himself in a foreign country with the intention of never returning.

Entering into commercial business can never be considered as done without the intention of returning.<sup>a</sup>

As a matter of historical interest, although perhaps not of great importance in the determination of this question, there is added in a footnote the Italian code on the same subject, as it existed down to about three years ago.<sup>b</sup>

It appears from the statement of fact above given that Corvaia was in Venezuela diplomatic service as early as 1850, when he was sent to the United States; that in 1853, 1854, and 1855 he occupied confidential and intimate relations with the Government in the adjustment of its financial obligations to foreign powers; that while he doubtless went to Italy in 1855, it was with no settled intention of remaining there, as is manifest from the statement that his activities could find no proper outlet in the old peninsula; that in 1856 he reentered the Venezuelan public service as the direct and immediate representative and mouthpiece of the Government, under credentials which in terms accredited him to the French Emperor, who, as we further learn, was to give "entire credit to the words of the envoy, whether spoken or written, as the organ of the Government of Venezuela," and so far did he consider himself and his fortune bound up with Venezuela that we find among his papers the draft of a proposed treaty of commerce between Venezuela and the Two Sicilies, which draft, it seems fair to presume, was prepared by himself as the representative of a nation other than that of his nativity. We note in June, 1862, an exchange of letters between Corvaia and the Italian ambassador in Paris concerning a loan which he desired Italy to guarantee for Venezuela on the security of Venezuelan custom-houses. It is true that the letters to and from Corvaia with relation to the latter affair do not recite any representative capacity, but the inference is very strong that at the period named he did represent the Venezuelan Government.

<sup>a</sup> La qualità di nazionale si perde:

1. Per la naturalizzazione acquistata in paese straniero.
2. Per l'accettazione non autorizzata dal Governo di pubblici impieghi conferiti da un Governo straniero.
3. Finalmente qualunque stabilimento eretto in paese straniero con animo di non più ritornare.

Gli stabilimenti di commercio non potranno giammai considerarsi come formati senza animo di ritornare.

1. By him who renounces it by means of a declaration made before the custodian of a civil register, followed by the change of his residence to a foreign country.
2. By him who may have taken up the citizenship of a foreign country.
3. By him who, without authorization of the Government, may have accepted employment or entered into the military service of a foreign power. The wife and minor children of those who have lost their citizenship shall become foreigners, except in the case of having continued to reside in the Kingdom.

They shall be able, nevertheless, to recover their citizenship in the case and by means of the forms indicated in Article XIV with respect to the wife, and Article VI with respect to the children.

It seems therefore absolutely clear that he lost his Sicilian citizenship long before the union of the Two Sicilies with Sardinia, provided the conduct recited came within the denunciation of the law as constituting acceptance of "public employments" (publici impieghi) conferred by a foreign country.

Upon this point we may refer briefly to the opinions of text writers.

Alauzet in "De la Qualité de Français et de la Naturalization," section 35, indicates that by French law acceptance of any public function, administrative or judicial, involves loss of citizenship. (It is to be borne in mind that the corresponding language of the French code is "Fonctions publiques.")

Folleville, in his work entitled "La Naturalization," sections 449 and 450, takes the position that a Frenchman can not accept diplomatic functions without losing citizenship, but would permit him to accept a position as consul, as such a position is not a "fonction diplomatique" for "*ils ne représentent point le pouvoir exécutif du pays étranger; * * * ils sont en un mot de simple mandataires dans l'intérêt du commerce.*"

Folleville, in section 453, says that in the case of a French physician put by a foreign government at the head of a hospital, the controversy is sharp as to whether he is furnished with a public character, receiving government pay.

One of the final criteria, as given by Folleville, section 454, to be used to arrive at a proper conclusion, is stated as follows:

Le juge doit rechercher de quelle nature, politique ou non, est le lien de subordination qui rattache un Français à un gouvernement étranger.

Contuzzi in "Il Codice Civile nel Rapporti Diritto Internazionale," on page 61, note, says:

An Italian who, without the permission of the Government, accepts employment of a foreign government or enters into the military service of a foreign power, loses his Italian citizenship (Civil Code, Art. XI, No. 3), but if contemporaneously he does not acquire the citizenship of a foreign state from the government of which he has accepted the employment, or under which he may have entered into the military service, he finds himself without a country.<sup>a</sup>

It seems, therefore, perfectly clear by the French code, by the Italian code as it existed up to three years ago (a change having been made recently), and by the code of Sicily as it existed up to the time of the unification of Italy, that the man who accepted public employment of a diplomatic character lost his ancient citizenship, unless by some affirmative act he thereafter regained it.

As has further appeared from the Sicilian code, the national who has departed without intent to return (save in a certain case in no respect resembling the present) loses his citizenship.

Meanwhile, it is worthy of note that very eminent authorities have reached substantially the conclusions embodied in the Sicilian Civil

Code, above referred to, and this without the aid of statutes. In 1873 the President referred certain questions on the subject of citizenship to the Hon. George H. Williams, Attorney-General, whose reply is found in 14 Opinions Attorneys-General, page 295. To the question, "Can an election of expatriation be shown or presumed by an acquisition of domicile in another country with an avowed purpose not to return?" the Attorney-General responded:

Residence in a foreign country and an intent not to return are essential elements of expatriation, but to show complete expatriation as the law now stands it is necessary to show something more than these. Attorney-General Black says (9 Opin., 359) that expatriation includes not only emigration out of one's native country, but naturalization in the country adopted as a future residence.

My opinion, however, is that, in addition to domicile and intent to remain, such expressions or acts as amount to a renunciation of United States citizenship and a willingness to submit to or adopt the obligations of the country in which the person resides, such as accepting public employment, engaging in military services, etc., may be treated by this Government as expatriation without actual naturalization. Naturalization is without doubt the highest but not the only evidence of expatriation.

In the answer to another question touching the intent to return, the Attorney-General said:

When a person avows his purpose to change his residence and acts accordingly, his declarations upon the subject are generally received as satisfactory evidence of his intent, but in the absence of such evidence, the sale of his property and the settling up of his business before emigration or removal of his family, if he has one, arrangements for a continuing place of abode, acquisition of property after removal, the formation of durable business relations, and the lapse of a long period under such circumstances are among the leading considerations from which the intent to make a permanent change of domicile is inferred.

Referring further to the question of abandonment of citizenship by permanent residence abroad, we learn from Moore's Arbitrations (p. 2565) that by the decision of the Spanish-American Commission of 1871 a citizen of the United States who, being of lawful age, leaves the United States and establishes himself in a foreign country without any definite intention to return to the United States is to be considered as having expatriated himself. (For other references similar in character see Van Dyne on Citizenship, pp. 275-278.) The references to American authorities are the stronger since no laws of the United States provide expressly for expatriation.

It will be noted that nearly all of the criteria held to evidence abandonment of original citizenship existed in the Corvaia case. Save when absent in the United States or Europe on official business for Venezuela, or for a period of two or three years for Ecuador, Corvaia appears to have passed forty-eight years of his life in Venezuela, and his last twenty-four years seem to have been uninterruptedly spent in Venezuela, except for a very brief stay in Italy occasioned by his mother's death.<sup>a</sup> The umpire, under the testimony before him, is unable to refer this long residence in Venezuela to any sufficient considerations of ill health or poverty, and he can not ignore the fact that, despite the protests of his family, Corvaia declined the less active life of the Italian peninsula for Venezuela and her service thirty-one years before he died, then passing perhaps only a month or two under the Italian sun.

A further point should not be omitted. We may believe Venezuela knew, as she might well have known, that when Corvaia entered her diplomatic service he abandoned all right to call himself a Sicilian. The Government might properly have hesitated or refused to receive into one of its most important employments a man who would be recognized by his original government as still attached to its interests.

Italy is, therefore, now estopped to claim Corvaia as her citizen, standing in this respect as did the Two Sicilies, and may not say that her laws are made to be broken and have no binding force when assumed interests dictate their disregard.

Another consideration: The umpire is disposed to believe that the man who accepts, without the express permission of his own government and against the positive inhibitions of her laws, public and confidential employment from another nation is himself estopped from reverting to his prior condition to the prejudice of the country whose interests he has adopted.

The umpire does not ignore the conclusion reached in the Giordana case, which recognized as still an Italian a poor man who had spent but a few years in Venezuela, and who had for a year or so occupied an extremely minor position, not connected with the administration of the laws of Venezuela or being in any way representative. The umpire in that case was disposed to go as far as was permitted to him, and perhaps too far, considering the fuller examination of authorities now possible, to sustain the equitable claim of this man, who in a political sense was not more important to the government than a day laborer, virtually following the suggestion of Folleville, section 454, above cited, that—and he found no political bond of subordination.

Did Corvaia ever regain the Sicilian citizenship lost by him by virtue of his public employment in Venezuela? The Sicilian law provided that:

The national who has lost his status as a citizen can always regain it by entering into the Kingdom, with the approval of the Government, and declaring that he has returned to establish himself there, and by renouncing whatever position may be contrary to the law of the Kingdom.<sup>a</sup>

The Italian code is quite similar in character and provides as follows:

ART. XIII. The citizen who may have lost his right by any one of the causes set forth in Article XI may recover them:

1. By his return to Italy, with the special permission of the Government.
2. By renouncing the citizenship or civil or military employment which he may have accepted in a foreign country.
3. By the declaration made before the custodian of the civil register to fix his domicile within the Kingdom, provided always that he carry out this intention within the term of one year.<sup>b</sup>

Contuzzi treats these three provisions of the Italian code as cumu-

<sup>a</sup> Il nazionale che abbia perduto la qualità di nazionale potrà sempre ricuperarla rientrando nel regno coll'approvazione del Governo, e dichiarando di volersivi stabilire e di rinunciare a qualunque distinzione contraria alla legge del regno.

<sup>b</sup> ART. XIII. Il cittadino che ha perduto la cittadinanza per alcuno dei motivi espressi nell' articolo 11, la ricupera purchè:

1. Rientri nel regno con permissione speciale del governo;
2. Rinunzi alla cittadinanza straniera all' impiego od al servizio militare accettati in paese estero;
3. Dichiarì davanti l'uffiziale dello stato civile di fissare e fissi realmente entro l'anno il suo domicilio nel regno.

lative, as they plainly are under the Sicilian code, and there is nothing before this Commission to show either:

(a) That Corvaia returned to Italy with the special permission of the Government.

(b) That he renounced the foreign citizenship. (He held foreign office, both before and after his visit to Italy in 1858, and his renunciation does not appear to have been of the voluntary character apparently contemplated by the section.)

(c) That he declared before the custodian of the civil register that he was about to take up his residence or that he did in reality establish his domicile in the Kingdom within one year.

We have therefore the case of a man who had definitely lost and who never regained his citizenship.

The umpire can not believe, therefore, that Fortunato Corvaia during his lifetime could have presented this reclamation as an Italian subject.

A second exception presented by the honorable Commissioner for Venezuela relates to the citizenship of some of the heirs of Corvaia, who are said to be Italians, and it is contended that as the claim is not Italian in origin the Commission does not possess jurisdiction over it, even admitting that some of the heirs are now Italian.

On the other hand, it is earnestly insisted that the language of the protocols, referring as it does to "Italian" claims and claims of "Italian subjects," is sufficiently broad to confer the needed jurisdiction upon the Commission.

If the proposition now presented were one of first impression the umpire would approach its study with a strong disposition to recognize the jurisdiction of the Commission over claims which had by regular course of inheritance now become vested in Italian citizens, for he would recognize that to refuse, to illustrate, jurisdiction in a French commission because a claim, although French in origin, was now owned by Italian citizens, and to refuse jurisdiction over the same claim in the Italian Commission because, although now Italian in ownership, it was French in origin, would be to perpetrate an injustice. The umpire does not, however, find himself free. A long course of arbitral decisions has emphasized the fact that the claim must be both Italian in origin and Italian in ownership before it can be recognized by an Italian Commission.<sup>a</sup> (See Moore's Arbitrations, pp. 1353, 2254, 2753, 2757.)

Knowledge of this condition induced the signers of the American protocol to arrange its language to the end that certain claims, British in origin but now American in ownership, might be presented before the American Commission.<sup>b</sup>

In the discussion of this case it was urged upon the umpire that the presence of the "most-favored-nation" clause contained in article VIII of the protocol should be so construed as to give to Italy all the advantages which might be claimed by American citizens under the American protocol. The umpire discussed so fully in the Sambiaggio case<sup>c</sup> the effect of the favored-nation clause as contained in the protocol, pointing out that it was plainly designed to refer to claims thereafter to originate, that he is unable to accept the suggestion now under consideration.

The exception, therefore, of jurisdiction of this Commission over the claims of those who are now Italian citizens must be sustained, but without prejudice to the rights of any of the claimants to claim against Venezuela before any court or commission which may have suitable jurisdiction, or to take such other action as they may be advised.

DE CARO CASE.

(By the Umpire:)

A paper blockade or blockade by proclamation is illegal, and a country declaring it accepts the legal consequences.

Damages refused for acts of unsuccessful revolutionists (following Sambiaggio case).<sup>a</sup> Under Venezuelan law duties can not be collected on exportations of Venezuelan products.

Commission can not correct abuse of process in judicial proceedings which have been closed and in which the claimant might have directly applied to the court for relief, but did not.

AGNOLI, Commissioner (claim referred to umpire):

Daniele De Caro, an Italian citizen and wealthy merchant of Barcelona, claims:

1. For interruption of his import trade by the ineffective blockade of the port of Guanta decreed by the Venezuelan Government, 47,719.30 bolivars.

2. For interruption of his export trade under identical circumstances, 13,807.03 bolivars.

3. For duties on exportations illegally collected by the authorities of the State of Barcelona, 10,595.47 bolivars.

4. For forced loans exacted of the claimant by Gen. Paolo Guzmán, of the "Libertadora" revolution, and Giuseppe Antonio Velutini, of the Government, 19,766.40 bolivars, plus interest on same, 2,371.96 bolivars.

5. For damages arising from the seizure of 5,000 hides ready for shipment, 12,972 bolivars, including the expenses for obtaining the release of said hides.

6. For interest paid and interest lost on the amounts of 40,000 and 140,000, at 6 per cent for one year, 10,800 bolivars.

The claimant therefore considers himself entitled in all to an indemnity of 118,032.16 bolivars.

Let us examine in detail if and to what extent this claim may be received under its various heads as presented.

As a rule, damages which appear to be the direct consequences of an unlawful measure should be indemnified.

Such was, in the opinion of the writer because contrary to the principles of international law, the blockade of the port of Guanta and of other ports of the Republic decreed by the Venezuelan Government, but not effective—a fact well known and which is established by a document annexed to the claim. (See the certificate of February 10, 1903, of the chief officer of that port and locality.)

The illegality and nullity of a blockade decreed but not enforced, even in the case of civil war, is a question that has often been discussed and that has been decided in previous cases in the sense here affirmed. (See Wharton's Digest of Intern. Law, par. 361; Lawrence in a note on Wheaton, Part IV, chap. 3, Moore on Arbitration, pp. 3404-3406; idem., 3790-3793.)

In the particular case of this claimant it might at first seem that there is a contradiction of fact, because while, on the one hand, he declares and proves that the blockade of the port of Guanta was not effective, he, on the other, seeks to recover because he was prevented from receiving or shipping goods during the same period. But it will be seen that the contradiction is only apparent when it is considered that the hindrance was caused by the execution of an order given to the consuls of the Republic at New York and Amsterdam not to permit the certification of bills of lading of goods for said port of Guanta, which, of course, rendered their shipment impossible and interfered with the regular stoppages of steamers formerly calling there, thus bringing business to a standstill.

There remains, however, to be determined whether the amount claimed by De Caro, because of his not having been able to import merchandise during the period from August 10, 1902, to April 12, 1903, 47,719.30 bolivars, may properly be allowed.

The claimant establishes his account on the following basis: In the first seven months of 1902 he imported goods from abroad on which he paid 87,590.71 bolivars of custom-house, maritime, and territorial duties. This assertion is proved by the list which appears on page 22 of the claim, authenticated by the declaration of the chief customs officer of the port of Guanta, dated April 30, 1903. In order to exclude any doubt that might arise as to the connection between these two documents, the honorable umpire will deign to note that the sum of 19,835.44 bolivars, indicated by the above-mentioned customs officer, is produced by the addition of 15,868.35 bolivars paid by the claimant on August 2, 1902, on goods imported per steamer Prins Willem I, and 25 per cent thereof collected as "territorial duty."

The claimant affirms, besides, that the customs duties represent approximately one-half the value of the goods, and that the presumptive gain of the merchant is 12 per cent gross on the amount of value of goods imported.

As to the second of these assertions, it may be considered correct, inasmuch as a gain of 12 per cent gross on imported goods is not excessive. With regard to the first assertion, its accuracy may be determined by comparing the sum of duties collected by the custom-house at Guanta on the goods received by the claimant per steamers Prins Frederik Hendrik, Prins Willem V, and Prins Willem III, on February 18, March 1, and April 16, respectively, from New York and Hamburg, i. e., 16,876.86 bolivars, with the amount of the value of the goods themselves (see doc. "M," pp. 7-8, and doc. "N," both legalized), which is 32,257.04 bolivars.

On this basis the claimant, who paid in the first seven months of 1902 for goods from abroad 87,590.71 bolivars, found himself in possession of foreign products to the amount of triple the value of the sum named, or 262,762.13 bolivars.

The profits would have been, according to the calculation 31,532.12 bolivars, or 4,504.66 bolivars per month. He the ineffective blockade lasted about eleven months, and the loss in consequence is estimated by him at 49,551.28 bolivars, from which sum must be subtracted 1,831.98 bolivars profit on a small quantity of merchandise which it was possible to land in the second half of December at Guanta from the steamers Prins Willem IV and Prins Willem V, which had been compelled, from August of the same year, to deposit them (the goods) at Curaçao and Trinidad, afterwards availing themselves of the ineffectual condition of the blockade to reship them to their actual destination.

It is to be observed that these goods had been passed upon by the Venezuelan consulate in Amsterdam before the declaration of the blockade. The calculations made by the claimant seem to the writer to be susceptible of modification as to fact, but acceptable as to principle.

If, on the one hand, an indemnity is due the claimant, on the other we can not take into account the period of duration of the blockade of the allied powers, nor of other brief periods, as he has done, during which commercial traffic was impossible, either because of the notice of the raising of the blockade not having been published abroad, or because of lack of sufficient time for the sailing of steamers from Europe or North America, and the port remaining inactive.

Assuming that the duration of the ineffective Venezuelan blockade was five months, which seems correct, and deducting 1,831.98 bolivars of profit on goods received in December, 1902, it results that the indemnity under this head may be reduced to 20,691.33 bolivars.

Let us now take up the question of damages on account of stoppage of exportation.

In so far as the principle is concerned, the case is identical with the preceding, and it would be useless to indulge in a repetition of the arguments.

In order to justify his demand for an indemnity of 13,707.03 bolivars the claimant bases himself on these facts, to wit: That during the first four months of 1902 (see certificate of United States consular agent in Barcelona, of April 3, 1903) he exported goods to the value of 46,023.70 bolivars, and affirms that he realized a profit of 10 per cent, or 4,602.37 bolivars—a monthly profit of 1,150.59 bolivars. Assuming that this estimate is moderate and fair, the Italian Commissioner must observe that the claimant had full liberty to export his goods, and especially hides, in which he dealt largely, up to the day of the declaration of the blockade, that is to say, to about August 10, 1902, and that therefore his profit of 4,602.37 bolivars should be divided into about eight months instead of four, which would reduce the monthly profit to 575.74 bolivars. On this basis the sum to which he would justly be entitled under this head would not exceed 2,878.70 bolivars for the given period of five months of Venezuelan blockade.

Concerning export duties illegally collected by the governmental authorities, who were Messrs. Briceño Martin (p. 42), Pedro José Adrian (pp. 46 and 48), J. Bello Rodriguez (pp. 110 and 111), H. Calcaño (p. 112), and F. Lopez Baguero (p. 113), for the State of Barcelona, these are amply documented and their illegality is unexceptionally demonstrated by the circular of Gen. José Antonio Velutini (p. 50), Venezuelan ex-minister for the interior. The order therein contained was not made effective by the Government of the Republic, which was aware of the abuses complained of by the claimant, but took no to abate them, and therefore and thereby assumed full responsibility for their existence. Under this head is claimed the sum of 10,001.05 bolivars, which admits of no reduction, and interest thereon 594.42 bolivars. This interest is calculated at 1 per cent per month, but should be stated at one-fourth or 148.60 bolivars, according to the rule governing interest in this Commission.

The forced loans were imposed by Gen. Paolo Guzmán, of the "Libertadora" revolution, in the sum of 18,779.40 bolivars, and by Generals Velutini and Bravo, of the Government, in the sum of 2,000 bolivars; but the receipt of these latter to the amount of 1,013 bolivars was accepted in payment of export duties, the reimbursement of which forms another part of this claim. Therefore setting aside, and with reservation (accepted by the Italian Commissioner), of the right to recover the amount represented by General Guzmán's receipt, and hence of forced loans imposed by the revolutionists, the claimant asks under this head an indemnity of 987 bolivars.

Let us pass now to the seizure of the 5,000 hides.

The claimant was indebted to the custom-house at Guanta for imports received August 2, 1902, in the sum of 19,835.34 bolivars (see certificate of chief customs officer, pp. 21 and 21 bis). According to the custom rules then in force he had seven days in which to pay this amount. Just at that time, however, both Guanta and Barcelona fell into the hands of the revolutionists, who imposed upon claimant the forced loan of the amount above mentioned.

After November 25, 1902, and the recapture of Guanta and Barcelona by the federal troops, the Governmental authorities insisted that claimant pay again the sum indicated for duty on imports, which he refused to do. Thereupon the judge of hacienda ordered as a guarantee of payment the seizure of the 5,000 hides in question and which were in his storehouses in Barcelona. Claimant states their value to have been in Guanta or New York 120,000 bolivars. He subsequently obtained the release of the hides by a "resolution" of the minister of hacienda (p. 105) of December 22, 1902, giving satisfactory guarantee for the payment of the sum claimed, but afterwards compromising with the Government on payment of 9,917.72 bolivars—i. e., half the sum originally claimed.

This transaction took place before the honorable umpire ordered, by his decision in the Guastini case, the refundment of duty collected by the Government after the same had already been collected by the authorities of the revolution. But the claimant does not ask the repayment to him of said duties in view of the intervening transaction (see doc. "O" and particularly the marginal note in red ink), which, however prejudicial to his interests, he will respect. The Italian Commissioner has here given this detailed statement solely to clear up the antecedents of the claim for the seizure of the hides. According to Venezuelan commercial laws actually in force, a judge may not, for the purpose of securing the payment of any given sum, confiscate goods in excess of said sum, plus the requisite judicial costs.

It is customary that the goods seized shall not exceed double the amount sought, the excess to this extent being considered sufficient to cover the costs mentioned.

In this case the judge of hacienda, to insure a payment of 19,835.44 bolivars, ordered the seizure of 5,000 hides, worth, according to estimate of the claimant, more than six times the sum claimed, and therefore three times more than he was allowed by law and custom to seize. The measure was consequently illegal in a double sense, in that the claimant was required to pay the same duties a second time, and in that the judge had largely exceeded the proper amount of the seizure.

It is true that on December 22, 1902, the hides were released, but on account of the closing of the port of Guanta they could not be exported until after the raising of the blockade, or next April, whereas had the judge kept within the legal limits in his seizure, the claimant might have been able to ship a part of his goods on the steamers Prins Willem IV and Prins Willem V, which touched at Guanta from the 17th to the 30th of December, 1902.

It will be observed that the notice of the release of the hides on the condition of furnishing a guarantee could not reach Barcelona until a considerable time after the close of the year, on account of the interruption of all telegraphic and postal communications, which explains why the guarantee was not furnished until April 20. (See doc. O.)

Now, it being well known that hides which are not shipped at the proper time lose in weight, and that they are sold by weight, it follows that they lose in value. This loss is by the claimant put at 6,992 bolivars. It is to be noted, also, that on the hides remaining unshipped an increase of duty was laid under the guise of a "war tax," which may be considered a further result of the illegal act of the judge above referred to, as was also the expense incurred in sending one of his employees, one Antonio Vestri, as ascertained by the writer, to Caracas for the purpose of obtaining an order for the release of the hides mentioned. This it required a month to accomplish; but in consequence of the then disturbed condition of the country, three months elapsed before Vestri could safely return to Barcelona. Summing up, the claimant, from these various losses in connection with the seizure of his hides, considers himself entitled to an indemnity of 12,972 bolivars; but the Italian Commissioner, while admitting the equity of the principle involved in the demand for such indemnity, holds that it should be reduced, as shown in the following considerations:

The value of the hides as stated by the claimant seems exaggerated; according to impartial and exact information this should not exceed 100,000 bolivars. The action of the judge of hacienda can not be called into question except in so far as it exceeded law and custom in going beyond the limits of two-fifths of the goods seized. The indemnity claimed under this head should be reduced to three-fifths, or 7,783.50 bolivars.

The last motive for demand of indemnity by the claimant is based on the fact that, not having been able to sell his 5,000 hides at an opportune moment, he was, in the first place, not able to meet certain obligations toward his correspondents (in proof of which see his account current, pp. 96-100), and thereby was charged for sums of accrued interest; and in the second place was prevented from profiting by the sale of the hides valued by him at 120,000 bolivars, and by another sum of 20,000 bolivars for a certain lot of hides which he affirms he was prevented from exporting on account of the blockade.

The Italian Commissioner holds the first of these demands justified, but considers the second deficient in proof. He therefore believes that under this head there should be awarded an indemnity of 2,400 bolivars.

Recapitulating, while having in view the decisions of the honorable umpire, and reserving the right of the claimant to indemnity for injuries inflicted by the revolutionists, the Italian Commissioner is of opinion that the present claim should be allowed in the aggregate amount of 42,490.18 bolivars, with interest thereon from the date of the introduction of the claim to the Commission to the 31st of December of the year last past.

ZULOAGA, Commissioner:

This individual claims certain amounts for injuries which he says he suffered, because in accordance with the decree of the Government blockading the port of Guanta, which according to his statement was not effective, he could not carry on exporting and importing. The time referred to is from August 3 to November 25, during which the revolutionists occupied Guanta, and later, from February 16, 1903, to April 12, 1903, when they were also occupying it. The claimant also makes demand for the time of the blockade of the allied powers, but the Italian legation does not support this part of the claim. The time fixed, therefore, is about five months.

The damages asked are the unrealized profits in mercantile operations which he imagined or satisfied himself he could have made, in accordance with calculations based on the former course of his business. From these calculations it will at once be seen that they attempt to compare a period of tranquillity and peace with another completely disturbed, during which a revolutionary government was in force, which in accordance with the statement of the claimant himself was one of violence and arbitrariness of every kind; that from the 5th to the 10th of August, 1902, in the city of Barcelona, a disastrous and fatal struggle took place, by virtue of which almost all the inhabitants were ruined; that under these conditions it is not credible that Caro could have thought of making extensive importations, nor could he have had anything to export; that if Caro suffered because of the suspension of his business during this period of disturbances, on the other hand, the legitimate authorities having been reestablished, the subsequent importations and exportations must have been greater because of this suspension and the one thing compensated the other.

This with respect to the amount of the claim, since with respect to its juridic validity, it is my opinion that the Government of Venezuela had a right to prohibit commerce with these revolutionary ports, especially when the vessels that carried on the commerce also touched at other Venezuelan ports; that the observation to the effect that the Government, not holding actual sovereignty over these places in revolution, it could not oppose commerce with them, is not conclusive as to this claim, since, if it could treat them like the enemy's country, I do not see why the inhabitants of that territory could not have taken direct action against it because of this treatment.

I reject this portion of the claim, not only in fact but also in law.

De Caro claims 8,876 bolivars (p. 38) for duties on exportation paid for hides and pelts, according to a receipt which he presents (pp. 42, 46, 48), which could not be collected, because they were unconstitutional, and he demands, moreover, interest on these sums. It is true that the collections of these duties is unconstitutional, but the law gives a right to the citizens to go before the court and denounce as unconstitutional the decree which levies them, in order that it may not continue in force. Besides, in reality, in the course of the transaction the merchant computes the duty in his calculations and it does not fall on him, either because the article (the hides in this case) are bought cheaper from the producer, or because they are sold at a higher price. There is, therefore, no direct damage. I reject this claim.

De Caro, moreover, claims 19,766.40 bolivars for loans to the revolution and the Government. They are not recoverable, except those made to the officers of the Government amounting to 987 bolivars, besides interest from the 24th of October, the date of the presentation of the claim.

He claims 12,972 bolivars more for the expenses of an injunction proceeding, which the judge of the hacienda brought against him, in a suit which he prosecuted through the government attorney, for failure to pay certain export duties, the claimant maintaining that the attachment was illegal. The affair terminated, as appears, by an agreement between the government attorney and De Caro. It is, therefore, a completed transaction, and it is not for this Commission to review the provisional decisions which the judge may have rendered in the suit. The statement of De Caro that it was not possible to lay an attachment on his hides, the value of which was much more than twice the amount claimed (which does not appear), is not true either. The judge could have issued the attachment, and he, proving the value of the goods attached, could demand that it be limited to double the value of the amount claimed. I reject the claim.

M. De Caro wishes that there be paid him interest on the sums which he owed his creditors. I reject the claim.

RALSTON, Umpire:

The above entitled claim was duly referred to the umpire upon difference of opinion between the honorable Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela.

It appears from the expediente in this case that for many years past the claimant, De Caro, a subject of Italy, has resided in Barcelona, Venezuela.

His first demand is for the sum of 47,719.30 bolivars, for injury to his business consequent upon the paper blockade of Guanta (the port of Barcelona), proclaimed in August, 1902, Guanta then being in the possession of revolutionists. The amount of this claim is, by the honorable Commissioner for Italy, for various reasons not necessary to the discussion, reduced to 20,691.33 bolivars. The claim evidently is only supported by proof of the fact that in October, 1902, the claimant ordered from Neuss, Heslein & Co., of New York, a cargo of kerosene, rice, flour, etc., the value of which is not stated, but which the firm in question refused to forward, assigning as the reason that the consul-general of Venezuela at New York would not authenticate invoices for Guanta; the firm, however, promising that as soon as affairs should take a favorable turn and the port be opened, it would forward cargoes. In exchange for the goods above referred to, the claimant proposed to ship 6,000 hides and 150 packages of skins.

Some proof is offered for the purpose of showing the amount paid in the shape of duties upon importations made by De Caro during the seven preceding months, as well as the value of such importations, and the probable profit thereon is calculated at the rate of 12 per cent; the Commission being asked to accept the theory that but for the blockade, De Caro's importations would have been, during the months it lasted, of the same average amount, with the profits calculated as indicated.

A further branch of the claim, which is for the interruption of the claimant's export trade because of the paper blockade, and for which he asks 13,807.03 bolivars (this amount being reached by a similar course of reasoning), may be considered in this connection.

That a noneffective or paper blockade is illegal, and can not constitute the foundation of rights on the part of the government declaring it, but may create liabilities against such government, is well established; many of the authorities demonstrating this position being collected in the opinion of Plumley, umpire of the British-Venezuelan Mixed Claims Commission in the case of Compagnie Générale des Asphaltes de France.<sup>a</sup>

Illustrations of this doctrine in principle, suggestive of the one now under consideration, will be found in the cases of the Boyne and the Monmouth, cited in Moore's Arbitrations, page 3923, and it remains only for the umpire to apply it.

The umpire can not accept the idea that the claimant is entitled to average business profits for the months of the blockade, reckoned upon possible importations and exportations and based upon the imports and exports for any preceding period, as he would be compelled to ignore the fact that during a large part of the time of the noneffective blockade there was continuous fighting in and about Guanta and Barcelona. Historically, he notes that on the night of August 9, 1902, Barcelona was taken from the Government by troops of the revolution and new civil authorities named by them; that on November 26, 1902, Barcelona was reoccupied by the Government; that on February 17, 1903, the governmental forces retired, and on February 19, 1903, the revolutionists took possession of the town, retaining such possession until after a bloody conflict, lasting from April 5 to 10, they were ejected. The above account takes no note of frequent skirmishes. To assume business profits for such a period at all analogous to those obtained during the time of business quiet would be to grossly violate the probabilities of the situation. It is not to be supposed that during a period of destitution, plundering, and destruction of all sorts De Caro would have successfully carried on any business whatsoever.

The umpire, therefore, finds it impossible to accord to the claimant any profits, even upon the goods he ordered from Neuss, Heslein & Co., and these are the only goods that the proof shows were ordered at all by De Caro from abroad during the time in question. He would find difficulty in awarding, even under favorable circumstances, speculative profits upon goods which had never been forwarded to or received by the claimant.

The situation as to the 6,000 hides and 150 packages of pelts proposed by De Caro to be exchanged for the goods in question, is somewhat different. He was entitled to sell or exchange these goods without interference and he had the opportunity of doing so. This opportunity was lost and he was not able to sell or exchange them until many months after. He is entitled to the difference, as nearly as it can be estimated, between the value of the goods in October, 1902, and their value at the time of the final sale, plus charges for taking care of them in the meanwhile. The amount of this difference and of these charges is not clearly proved in the testimony submitted, but by reference to the testimony connected with a later item of De Caro's claim it may be approximately ascertained. By calculation we find that the probable loss in value of the hides were 8,390.40 bolivars, and there was paid out by him on account of interest, which we may regard as a carrying charge, 2,400 bolivars, making a total of 10,790.40 bolivars.

Another head of plaintiff's claim relates to certain forced loans executed by the revolutionary and governmental generals. For reasons sufficiently discussed in the Sambiaggio<sup>a</sup> and other cases, the Government can not be held responsible for loans exacted by revolutionists, but is responsible for loans required by General Velutini, and this exaction, deducting for "vales" duly received and accepted by the Government, amounted to the net sum of 987 bolivars, for which an award must be made.

A further head of the claim is for taxes on exportations. This tax was exacted in direct violation of the provisions of the constitution of Venezuela, which in the second title "Bases de la Unión," article 6, reads as follows:

ART. 6°. Los Estados que forman la Unión Venezolana son autónomos é iguales en entidad política, y se obligan: * * *

ART. 11°. A no imponer contribuciones sobre los productos nacionales destinados á la exportación.

A full allowance must therefore be made for taxes so collected, and these amount to 8,876.17 bolivars.

An additional claim arises from the seizure of 5,000 hides (apparently the larger part of the hides whose exportation was prevented as above described), and the circumstances with relation thereto may be detailed as follows:

Claimant was indebted on August 2, 1902, to the custom-house at Guanta in the sum of 19,835.34 bolivars, and had seven days within which to pay this amount. By the 10th of the month Guanta and Barcelona both fell into the hands of the revolutionists, and the claimant was required to pay this sum to them. After the capture of Guanta and Barcelona by the Government, its authorities insisted that the claimant should again pay the sum indicated for duty on imports, which he refused to do. The judge of hacienda thereupon directed the seizure of 5,000 hides as a guarantee of its payment. These hides were said to have been of the value of 120,000 bolivars. Subsequently, upon his giving satisfactory security, the hides were released and at a later time the Government compromised with the claimant, he paying 9,917.72 bolivars, being one-half the sum originally claimed. It is now contended on behalf of the claimant that even if the action of the Government had been entirely legal, the judge should not have directed the seizure of property in excess of twice the amount of the Government's claim, and that, having directed the seizure of property, worth five or six times the amount of the claim, the Government should be held responsible for any loss attendant upon the embargo of the excess amount, and it is also contended by the claimant that he was compelled, because of the seizure of the property, to borrow money at a high rate of interest, which borrowing would not have been necessary had the judge of hacienda acted within the usual limits of his authority. Furthermore, it is said that the hides, because of the delay, became less valuable, and the Government should be charged with the difference in value consequent upon the delay.

The umpire has already sufficiently indicated in the Guastini case<sup>a</sup> his strong conviction that when taxes had been once collected by a de facto government, the government de jure could not enforce a second payment, and but for the compromise between the Government and De Caro, which compromise antedated his decision in the case referred to, he would have no difficulty in awarding to the claimant any sum he might have paid on this behalf, but, as is admitted by the honorable Commissioner for Italy, it is now impossible for him to reopen this matter. He feels compelled to regard the compromise as a complete and final settlement of any issue growing out of the acts to which the compromise related, whether such issue had reference to the original dispute or the proceedings taken to enforce the original claim. He can not recognize that De Caro accepted the benefit of the compromise of the original claim and at the same time reserved a right of action for steps taken to enforce it.

While the terms of the compromise entered into between De Caro and the Government do not appear at length in the record, we may believe that both parties considered that the dispute, with all the attendant consequences, was at an end when 50 per cent of the original claim was paid by De Caro.

The claim for moneys necessarily borrowed has apparently been allowed under another head, and as the hides were only detained from December 1 to December 22, 1902, it would under this heading call for little attention. Besides, if De Caro believed that the judge of hacienda had directed the seizure of an excessive amount of property, he had the right under the code of civil procedure of Venezuela to appeal to the court for the release of the excess, in this respect enjoying the remedy to which he would be entitled under similar circumstances in a common-law country. It does not appear that he availed himself of his rights, and it is not within the power of this umpire to grant damages to a claimant who, by a seasonable reliance upon his rights in a case in court, might have suitably protected himself. Certainly before he can appeal to an international tribunal, the suit in court having long since terminated, he should be prepared to show some actual denial of justice with relation to the subject-matter of his appeal.

A sentence will therefore be ordered in favor of De Caro in the sum of 21,788.62 bolivars, with two months' interest to December 31, 1903, at the rate of 3 per cent per annum.

MARTINI CASE.

(By the Umpire):

The right of the sovereign power to submit all claims of its citizens to a mixed commission is superior to any attempt on the part of a subject or citizen to contract away such right in advance.

This Commission is, as between Venezuela and Italy, substituted for all national forums which, with or without contract, might have had jurisdiction over the subject-matter.<sup>b</sup>

Venezuela is responsible for attempts to enlist in her armies, in violation of her contract, Venezuelans employed by the claimant, and also for interference with foreign workmen employed by the claimant.

Venezuela is responsible for profits which claimant might have obtained had she not broken her contract where such profits are not uncertain or remote, or where it may reasonably be presumed they were within the intent and understanding of the parties when it was entered into.

Where the damage is continuous in its nature, an award may be made covering the loss up to the date of such award, although, under other circumstances, it seems damages after August 9, 1903, the last date for the presentation of claims, would not be recoverable.

A contract is to be interpreted in the light of the surrounding circumstances, and the port of Guanta being open to foreign commerce at the time the contract was signed, and such condition being a material element in the value of the contract, the government is responsible for damage incident to its subsequent closure by executive order.

AGNOLI, Commissioner (claim referred to umpire):

In the memorial presented by the firm, at page 68, are enumerated the various items that the claim is composed of, and it is here proper to explain and sum them up.

(a) Thefts. Detailed at pages 72 and 73, and they amount to 9,104 bolivars. The proofs are to be found at fascicle B.

The firm call attention to the fact that it has not been possible to furnish proofs for some of these, because at the time of the taking the station master at Guanta, Marsilio Catelli had gone to Italy (December, 1902), but the more important amount of 8,334 bolivars is supported by the testimony of witnesses. It is to be noted at the outset that the firm relinquish their right to the sum of 750 bolivars because of the possibility that this sum may have formed a portion of the indemnity awarded to A. Bonnon by the French Commission, which granted his claim in the sum of 6,000 bolivars for damages caused for the most part by revolutionists.

(b) Requisitions. At page 72 of the memorial is indicated the total amount requisitioned in different ways by General Marcano, of the Government, to the sum of 60,600, and the corresponding documents are in fascicle C. The firm, however, renounce all right to the repayment of this money, as they have explicitly declared to the writer, since the same is included in the account between the Venezuelan Government and the firm in compensation of the annual payment due the former by the latter. On this point it will be well to forestall a possible objection. From original documents shown by the honorable Commissioner for Venezuela, copies of some of which had already been presented by the firm (see fascicle N), it appears that Engineer Lanzoni, in the name of the firm, declared, under date of September 6, 1900, that in view of certain concessions obtained from the President of the Republic the firm renounced whatsoever claim they might have at that time against the Government. But on examining the previous correspondence, and especially the firm's letter of May 23, 1900, the original of which might be produced by the Government, it appears that among said claims therein enumerated in detail Lanzoni had not included the recovery of the requisitions of Marcano, which at that time did not possess the character of a claim, and the interested parties could not therefore regard it as such, since it was their intention to include it in the account with the Government, as was, in fact, done.

Such inclusion was foreseen, agreed to, and, so to speak, authorized by Marcano himself, as may be seen by the sentence in his own hand, contained in the receipts dated September 30 and October 15, 1899, which states that dicha suma será pagada con las pensiones que deben satisfacer dichos señores al Gobierno Nacional por arrendamiento de la Empresa ya mencionada.

It is clear, therefore, that not only had the firm no interest in making this credit the subject of a claim, but that they were exercising an already recognized right when they inscribed it in the account current as a part of the rent for the mines.

On the other hand it could not be explained why Lanzoni, Martini & Co. were induced to abandon a credit of 60,600 bolivars for a compensation of 52,000 bolivars, which sum represented the reduction to one-half of the yearly rent, while this advantage, which the Government was according, finds a sufficient raison d'être in the renunciation of the other items mentioned in said letter.

From all this it appears that the credit on account of requisitions or loans enforced by Marcano, although anterior to September 6, 1900, was not an object of the transaction, and it is therefore equitable that it should figure as a partial discharge of the annual obligation owed by the firm to the Venezuelan Government.

It is moreover just that the sum of these credits be taken into account, since they are all supported by documents in the most unexceptionable manner, and caused, in part, by forced loans exacted for the support of the army, in part by requisitions for animals, and in part for repairs of arms of the troops; that is, for various and distinct items.

A somewhat ambiguous phrase in the Martini memorial—the one which terminates page 71 and begins page 72—may have induced the honorable Commissioner for Venezuela to doubt that the “vales” had been given as an equivalent of the amount of the invoices (“fatture”) signed by Marcano. This doubt, however, will appear wholly unwarranted when it is considered, first, that the word “vale” was also used by the firm (see p. 72, line 5) to indicate “fatture” or invoices; and second, that the “vales” are of a date prior to that of the “fatture” themselves. Thus is explained the ambiguity of the phrase mentioned, and therefore of the one which reads, “to render his extortions legal, Marcano left receipt with us,” and thus is excluded absolutely the idea that “vales” and “fatture” should mean one and the same thing.

(c) Destruction of 5,697 tons of coal stored at Guanta. The details of this fact are found at page 74 et seq. of the memorial, and the corresponding loss is fixed at 256,365 bolivars.

Before entering upon a consideration of this item the Italian Commissioner is in duty bound to call the attention of the honorable umpire to the fact that the Martini Company have acknowledged in effect (as has been stated by Gen. Pablo Guzmán) that 150 tons were excluded from this destruction and were used for and in the service of the railway. The value thereof, 6,750 bolivars, being necessarily subtracted from the previous amount, the firm have reduced this item to 249,615 bolivars. This destruction was ordered by the revolutionary general, and therefore, according to the rules laid down by the honorable umpire, would not in principle be susceptible to indemnity. But it must be observed that had it not been for the ineffective blockade of the port of Guanta the coal which was afterward destroyed might well have been sold, because at that time the strike in the United States had considerably increased both the price and demand (a fact which explains why the firm had fixed the price at 45 bolivars, per ton), as will appear from two orders, which are found in fascicle F, and which it was impossible to fill, without adding that, given the agreement made between the firm and Del Buono, the coal could have been consigned to the latter and realized upon at an opportune moment, if the blockade had not prevented.

It must hence be admitted that if the Venezuelan Government had not resorted to this unlawful and, so far as the general interests of business in that section were concerned, injurious measure, and one particularly harsh with regard to the firm, which by reason of their contracts had special rights, the said firm would not have suffered the injury of which they now justly complain.

With regard to this destruction, the Venezuelan Government has submitted written evidence from which it appears that it took place in the presence and with the consent of Engineer Antonio Martini; that the order therefor was issued by Dr. Manuel Rodriguez Armas, formerly the attorney for the firm, and that in order to hasten and facilitate the destruction there were employed tins of petroleum brought there for the purpose by the same train which brought the revolutionary troops thither from Barcelona, as also it is said of Martini, who, it is further alleged, superintended the partial tearing up of the wharf to expedite the dumping of the coal into the sea.

From the evidence adduced it would seem as though the Government were endeavoring to create the impression that the destruction of the coal was the result of a tenebrous and dishonest collusion between General Guzmán and the firm, with the object on the part of the latter of either establishing the basis of a claim for an exaggerated loss, or of disposing at a high price of a quantity of coal of little value, and of culm not otherwise merchantable.

Assuming that the coal was equal to that extracted from the mines—that is to say, good—and that the culm which the firm had accumulated in Guanta for the supply of its compressing plant (which reduces the culm to blocks) was not burned, since it could not have been used by the Government vessels, but remained there awaiting more favorable conditions, and was therefore not included in the account of 5,697 tons really destroyed, an examination of the correspondence had between General Guzmán, then governor of Barcelona, and the firm proves beyond question that the latter not only was not in connivance with the enemy, but sought by all the means at hand to avoid a fact which could not but have most seriously prejudiced it, and which amounted to a disaster, given the very difficult situation to which it had already been reduced.

On being questioned by the writer as to the reasons for his (Martini) being present at the destruction, and as to the accuracy of the evidence submitted by the Government, the claimant furnished such explanations as to establish beyond doubt the inacceptability and the puerility of the counterproof. The Italian Commissioner sums up these explanations in his own words:

The firm has charge, according to its contract, of all the movable and immovable property of the concession, which it is bound to preserve, and which it must render an account of and restore in good condition at the expiration of its term. Having received the order for the destruction of the coal, and exhausted to no purpose all efforts to have same countermanded, the claimant thought very properly that his presence might be useful to the interests of the firm and of the Government as well, since while directing the operations the destruction of the wharf upon which a part of the coal had been deposited might be avoided, as well as of the station, the custom-house, the warehouses and the compressing plant, about which was piled the larger part of the coal, and this sufficiently accounts for his presence there. In order to obviate the complete destruction of the wharf he caused openings to be made in the flooring thereof that the coal might the more readily be thrown therefrom into the water, and in order that this might be done in the least injurious manner he furnished the troops with the necessary tools from the company's own stock—a circumstance which he fully explains, while the evidence furnished by the Government makes no mention of it. In order to secure from the troops a certain amount of good will and obedience he offered them rum, and this detail is likewise passed over in silence. The claimant admits that, generally speaking, the narration of events in that document is correct, but calls attention to the fact that they have been set forth in a somewhat disingenuous and biased manner. Judging from the attempt to impute a false and absurd meaning to the presence of Martini at the destruction mentioned, it may be noted that while it is true that De Armas had been the attorney for the firm he certainly was not aiding them at this time, when, as secretary-general of the State of Barcelona, and therefore of the existing Government, he was transmitting the order for the destruction of the coal. This would seem to fully account for his presence at the place and time of this unfortunate occurrence.

It is not true that Martini arrived at Guanta with the troops and on the same train, because on being informed of the order by telephone he took a trolley in all haste from Barcelona and arrived fully an hour after the troops had reached the scene of operations. He does not, however, attach any importance to the assertion that he came on the same train with the troops; it might have been better had he been able to do so, for then some of the damage might have been prevented.

The reasons for his presence in Guanta are so obvious that had he remained in Barcelona he might properly be charged with having been negligent. With regard to the coal oil, the evidence seems to imply that it was furnished by the firm, because it came on the train with the troops, and as alleged, with the claimant. This is not true. The oil was not supplied by Martini & Co. But suppose it had been; what then? Since the order had been issued and could not be rescinded the sooner the destruction was accomplished, and the less dangerous the points at which the fire was applied, the better for the surrounding buildings. But what he does explicitly deny is that his presence should have been due to wrong motives, or that he was so inexperienced as to burn his property in the hope of subsequently obtaining an indemnity therefor, which, had it not been for the blockade of the powers, there was not the slightest chance of his getting, and which, based as it is in part on the question of revolutionary damages, may possibly not be agreed to in this Commission, notwithstanding the blockade and the provisions of the Washington protocol.

(d) Damages to shops and materials. The particulars in regard to this item are found at pages 79 et seq., and the amount of indemnity claimed therefor is 1,500 bolivars. The corresponding documents are in fascicle B, and are substantiated by the evidence of witnesses. In consideration of the small sum involved it is not deemed necessary to enter into a more detailed exposition.

(e) For violence and offenses to persons, amply set forth at pages 84 et seq. of the memorial and established by testimony and various documents, an indemnity of 500,000 bolivars is claimed.

It seems to the writer more appropriate that any indemnity allowed under this head be included in the sum total awarded by the honorable umpire to the firm. The firm of Martini & Co. claim, as reparation for the violence and offenses above referred to and as an indemnity for damages occasioned by the nonobservance by the Venezuelan Government of the agreements made with the firm—collected under three heads, according to the principles sanctioned by the Italian law in matters of renting (see arts. 1575 and 1579 of the civil code) and analogous to those admitted by the Venezuelan civil code, which are:

I. Change in the thing rented and failure to preserve same to the use for which it was intended.

II. Nonobservance of the special obligations of the contract.

III. Nonobservance of the guaranty of the pacific enjoyment of the thing located—an indemnity amounting in all to 8,737,396.34 bolivars, which is believed to correspond to the sum of resulting damages, comprising those occasioned by the suit of Del Buono and the loss of future profits; that is, of those which the concessions of the mines and their operation would have enabled the firm to realize if their activity had been allowed free and peaceful development.

Before discussing this question of demand for indemnity it would be well to point out the value of two documents submitted by the Venezuelan Government to the examination of this Commission, to wit, the report of the consul of the Republic at Genoa, of August 13, 1903, and the partial account rendered by the custom-house authorities at Guanta of the coal exported by the firm during a period of ten months.

From the first of these two documents we learn that the functionary by whom it was compiled acknowledges that Mr. Pilade Del Buono, the moneyed partner of the firm, "an intelligent, active man with great ideas," has invested "large sums in the exploitation of the mines," and that this affair may be the "source of riches, not only for the contractors, but for the country as well," and that the firm, "by reason of the war, were compelled to suspend their operations and discharge their workmen."

This is precisely what Martini & Co. affirm, and these data enumerated by the consul figure among those on which the claim is based, at least in part. But the conclusions drawn by him from these premises are certainly illogical. He says that it is evident that Del Buono has not sufficient capital, even with the aid of his partner, Tonietti, to "undertake such an enterprise as that of the mines, of the railway, and of the port of Guanta."

Whence does he draw this information? If Del Buono, an adept in mining matters, since he had advantageously superintended those of the island of Elba, is an intelligent man, how could he, without giving evidence of a lack of perspicacity, have dared to undertake an enterprise too great for him?

If he invested a large capital in Guanta, and if to procure other large sums (these are the words of the consular report succinctly) he mortgaged his property, and if he has a partner whose financial resources are unknown to us and presumably to this confidential agent of the Government of the Republic, how can the consul allege the foregoing?

It would appear that the consul's reasoning is not altogether consistent, and we may properly infer instead that Del Buono ceased to advance funds when he became aware that on account of the obstacles confronting him, it would have been sheer folly to continue doing so. This is probably why he no longer had recourse to that credit which, given his competency, his energy, and his economic position, would certainly not have been denied him.

The consul has long sought, and perhaps may still be seeking, the firm's headquarters in Italy. Consulting la Gazetta Ufficiale del Regno, No. 167 of 1901, he would have found it, and Del Buono, in bringing his suit against the firm, knew very well where to send the summons. Did the consul suppose that the firm, paralyzed in their operations for nearly two years, were maintaining at Rome and at Partoperraio an office with numerous employees awaiting the resumption of the work in the mines, suspended for reasons already stated? He accuses the firm of an intention to speculate on the Government of Venezuela. If he refers to the future, it is an hypothesis or worse which is not worth discussing. If he refers to the past, it suffices to observe that the firm have so far lost time, money, and labor. "Speculation," in so far as regards the firm, may be excluded from consideration.

Lastly, the oft-quoted functionary formulates this query: "On what do these gentlemen base their claim? On the reimbursement of that which they hoped to realize, but so far have not realized?"

Exactly; when a contracting party, failing, as in this case, to fulfill the stipulated agreements, arrests or neutralizes the activities of an enterprise to its serious prejudice, the other injured party has a right to demand, not merely an indemnity for the damage actually suffered, and the reimbursement of lost capital, but also the payment of profits which it might justly have realized on the basis of the contract itself.

If the consul had consulted either the Italian or the Venezuelan civil code, he would have seen formulated the principles invoked by the firm and admitted by all tribunals.

Without going further, it must be evident that the report of the consul is only a tissue of puerilities and contradictions.

We come now to the other document, the object of which would be to demonstrate that the firm had produced very little coal, since, dividing the total tonnage of 1,765 into the time during which this amount was exported, the work of extraction appears utterly insignificant. But the document expressly refers to coal exported, not to coal mined, which changes the conditions of the question.

Let us begin by noting that the firm, precisely on account of the disastrous state of the mines at the time of consignment, were compelled (as appears in the memorial of the firm) to spend much time in the reorganization of the shops, etc., foregoing the work of extraction, and that said firm had made no contracts for the delivery of coal until about the last of their dealings with Del Buono, and just at a time when operations were suspended on account of disorders.

What is complained of by the firm is that they were hindered in the manner set forth in the claim from exploiting the mines, as it was to their main interest to do. It is alleged that in the brief period of peace and activity the firm spent more time in the preparation of the mines and the uncovering of new veins than in extracting coal for commercial purposes. This latter had not more than begun when all operations were paralyzed. So much for a general statement. Let us now come to details and figures.

The firm, by an account current, have reported a total extraction of 14,771 tons, on which a royalty of 7,385.50 bolivars was paid to the Government.

We see how all this agrees perfectly and with all the statements of the firm, as well as with that of the Government.

	Tons.		Tons.
Total production from the beginning of operations to July 12, 1902, date of suspension of operations, a period of two years and nine months .....	14,771	Exported, as per custom-house report, Guanta, to September, 10, 1902.....	1,765
		Sold and consumed by workshops and Barcelona-Guanta railway from September, 1901, to July, 1902.....	2,735
		Destroyed by the revolutionists in Guanta.....	5,547
		Total .....	10,047
		Difference .....	4,724
Total .....	14,771	Total .....	14,771

Of these 4,724 tons there are, as culm, partly at Guanta and partly at Naricual, 3,562 tons, more or less, because, after exposure to the elements for two years, a part must have been destroyed by wind and rain, there remains to be accounted for 1,162 tons, as follows:

1. The amount used by the railway and shops since the suspension of operations, i. e., from July, 1902, to the present time.

2. The total consumption of the mining machines during two years and nine months' work, as follows: One boiler for the ventilating apparatus, one hoisting engine, a pump for supplying the village of Naricual, and the 120-horsepower boilers used in the compressing plant.

All this is shown by the few documents saved from destruction by troops and included in the papers of the claim, and the depositions of witness (see question No. 6). The firm would agree to submit these statements to any expert in such matters who would visit the spot in order to establish their truth.

The true value of the two documents submitted by the Government being thus determined, let us sum up the reasons in general upon which is based the firm's demand for an indemnity, in order that we may ascertain if and to what extent such demand may be received.

Lanzoni, Martini & Co. at first, and subsequently Martini & Co., invested considerable capital in the mines, as well as their personal energy for nearly five years and their credit—a fundamental element in all enterprises, whether industrial or commercial. The contrary proofs brought before the Commission are not based on severe and dispassionate criticism. The "justificativo" drawn up at the instance of Vittorio Cotta, a presumably not very impartial individual, as he had been employed by the firm but was discharged in 1891, can not only have no value as a counterproof, but should be totally rejected on account of its having been made in the absence of one of the interested parties. But in any case what does it seek to prove? That the firm had some accounts unsettled, and that the members thereof have individual debts—as for instance, one of them owes a bread bill; that the firm sold some cement and a few utensils—for the purpose of morally discrediting the management.

As regards the sales, it is to be observed, as has already been stated, that if these took place, even in the small amounts mentioned in the document referred to, they were in the nature of a necessity created by the disastrous conditions confronting the firm. As regards the debts, either of the firm or the members thereof, they are not only specifically denied, but constitute in this circumstance an additional support for their claim, and it is well to note that the unsettled accounts to which the document refers are of the period in which every commercial and industrial activity of the firm was paralyzed. Martini & Co. admit having other debts than those mentioned by their ex-employee; were their condition flourishing they would not be counted among the Italian claimants.

A greater importance has, at first sight, the fact that the bill of John Davis was not paid in 1901, as well as the invoice of John Davis & Son; but this is but an isolated instance which it would seem more equitable to attribute to an irregularity arising out of a change in the administration of the company occurring shortly after that time and within the same year, rather than to a lack of funds ever since, or, worse still, to a lack of good faith—things clearly contradicted by numerous circumstances established from the documents of the claim.

Is it possible that a firm which paid in cash, or otherwise compensated for its annual royalty of more than 100,000 bolivars to the local government by equivalent services which it could not have furnished without undergoing heavy expenses; that settled its account with Marciano, amounting to 60,600 bolivars; that promptly met its checks on the house of De Caro, of Barcelona, for more than 400,000 bolivars; that purchased a steamer at a cost of 567,000 bolivars, including the necessary repairs, etc.; that had through the Bank of Venezuela (as it could readily prove were it not that that institution had again and again delayed the rendition of the account) deposited and subsequently employed in the works several hundred thousand bolivars; that had engaged in Europe and transported to Venezuela numerous detachments of workmen; that according to the agreement of March 22, 1902, was indebted to its partner, Del Buono, over 2,000,000 bolivars, evidently employed in the mines, and that by a document found in fascicle O is shown to have expended more than that in the works themselves—that such a firm, we repeat, could have gravely and intentionally jeopardized their credit for the petty sum of £155 sterling? Is it not much more consistent to suppose it to have been due to an oversight as above suggested?

This supposition seems natural enough, even when it is considered that though the firm have a heavy indebtedness of recent contraction, which is the result of the financial disaster into which they have been thrown, they have no known debts whose origin antedates the beginning of their claim to this Commission. It may be observed, incidentally, that the Lanzoni management did not settle with the other partners, in favor of which he withdrew in 1901.

It may be urged that the agreement between Del Buono and the firm, in virtue of which the loan of 2,000,000 bolivars was negotiated was not recorded, and that this fact diminished its value from the point of view of the proofs which have been sought to be deduced therefrom. This objection can not well be raised by the Venezuelan Government, which not only had knowledge of said agreement but agreed to the clauses therein regarding the delivery of coal. In fact, while up to April 12, 1902, the date when the agreement was made known to the Government, the receipts from coal supplies were credited to the firm, those of subsequent deliveries were credited to Del Buono.

The importance of this agreement is besides shown by the citation before the civil tribunal of Rome (see fascicle I), by which Del Buono summoned the firm in order to obtain a judgment against them for the sums borrowed of him and a settlement of damages. The citation was regularly served upon the firm's office in Rome through Sig. Giuseppe Tarabella, upon the special agent for the representative of the firm, the Hon. Francesco Fazi, whose domicile is near that of his attorney, Felice Gualdi, at the Circo Agonale, No. 14.

It is here opportune to note that the amounts stated by Del Buono in his citation are not those employed by him in the working of the mines, but those which he advanced the firm as silent partner and banker. This observation should be given due weight, in order that the data resulting from the citation itself may not be stigmatized as contradictory with regard to those arising out of the agreement between Del Buono and the firm concerning the supply of coal (fascicle L).

In the citation it is explicitly stated that for the acceptances alone, Del Buono's credit amounted to nearly 800,000 bolivars.

Before proceeding farther with the examination of the claim, it would be well to state that on August 31 of the past year, as appears by documents in fascicle O, the balance between royalties due the Government by the firm and the sums paid in cash or by coal, services, and otherwise, showed a credit in favor of the firm amounting to 15,185.64 bolivars. From that date to the present time there have been no more settlements, either because the claim was already submitted, or because, with the exception of a partial operation of the railway, the firm had been reduced to entire inactivity.

This form of settlement between the firm and the Government was the result of a tacit understanding by which convenience and economy was secured to both parties, since it obviated the forwarding of funds often prevented by the conditions of the country, without taking into account that any other form of settlement would have been difficult, because of the refusal to examine the books during the war, as established by documents in fascicle M. It would, therefore, be contrary to equity to object against the firm that the amount of the royalty had not actually been paid to the Venezuelan Government, and raise an objection before this tribunal which said Government had not previously deemed possible.

It will be said, perhaps, that the firm took credit for services rendered the revolution, but when it is considered that the revolution was the government de facto, it would seem that the same rules that were adopted in the Commission in regard to the double payment of duties

(see the Guastini claim<sup>a</sup>) should apply here, and that the firm have kept within due limits of right in including those amounts likewise, in every way acting therein in good faith. Besides, the amount charged for services to the revolution being 32,286 bolivars, and its credit on August 31, 1903, being 15,185 bolivars, the difference would at most be only 17,091 bolivars—a relatively negligible quantity.

Let us pass now to the consideration of other fundamental reasons, as a whole and interlinked, which operate in favor of Martini & Co. Such an examination would demonstrate that the action of the contracting government was the principal, if not the sole cause, of the ruin of the company, and how from this fact arises the right of the firm to an indemnity.

From the evidence of witnesses presented by Martini & Co., it seems clear that the revolution, as well as the Government, but mainly the latter (see especially the deposition of the witness Riva Verni and documents contained in fascicle B), by manifest infractions of contractual agreements, recruited at various times the native workmen of the company, and principally those assigned to the railway service, which could not well suffer interruptions and obstacles of any sort. General Marcano, president of the State, insisted upon having the complete list of the workmen, declaring publicly that he considered them as being wholly at his disposal. (See fascicle B.) It may here be objected that these recruitings in various instances did not go beyond mere attempts and threats; but the effects of these acts were otherwise injurious to the firm in that the workmen, not being able to foresee to just what extent these acts might proceed, fled and hid themselves to avoid any possible danger. Now, when we reflect that the work of the mines and of the railway must proceed in unison, and that their regular function depended entirely upon the harmonious collaboration of the two services, it must be admitted that the failure of one necessarily entailed the failure of the other, so that, for example, whenever the laboring element was lacking the technical or mechanical department of the enterprise remained in whole or in part useless. It is hence clear that a general disorder followed, involving grave damages to the firm, which was still compelled to pay and subsist the foreign element thus forcibly condemned to inactivity in the factories.

To this state of affairs and to other causes fully set forth in the Martini memorial, must be attributed the abandonment of the railway, shops, and factories in satisfaction of which the firm claim equitable indemnity, and which might erroneously be charged to the nonobservance on the part of the firm of its contractual obligations toward the Government.

The aggressions, arbitrary orders, stoppage of trains, seizing of goods, damages to real property, forced requisitions—in short, all the violence of which the firm complain, and which reduced their affairs to such a state that they were finally compelled, at a time when all communications were interrupted, to sell at a ruinous price materials imported from Italy, for their individual use, not for profit, seeing their exemption from import duties, but to procure means of subsistence, and to accept in charity from the Italian war vessel Elba gifts of flour and biscuit to satisfy the hunger of the operatives—were, indeed, partly the work of revolutionists; but from the documents submitted it is equally clear that the Government was pursuing a similar course, and this attitude on its part was doubly vexatious, since setting aside the actual damage to the firm, it induced in the rebels a conviction that everything was permissible against Martini & Co., the contract with whom was now practically a dead letter.

It is therefore not against the unavoidable consequences of war that claim is made, but against that accumulation of wrongs that under cover of this abnormal state were for so long a period unnecessarily perpetrated against them.

Most grave, in view of its consequences, was the aggression suffered at the siege of Naricual, in May, 1902, by General Mejia, of the Government. The circumstances thereof, which have been wrongfully sought to be excused under the plea of military necessity, are set forth in detail in the Martini memorial and in the testimony of the witnesses. The effects were truly disastrous because the foreign workmen, stricken with fear and convinced of the danger to their lives, since no protection was to be expected even from the Government authorities, became clamorous and demanded of the firm that they be sent back home. This completed the interruption of the work, and the enterprise, henceforth completely demoralized, was driven to new and serious pecuniary sacrifices, among which may be included the payment of 631 francs to each operative, to which the firm was compelled by the arbitral sentence contained in fascicle T.

The sacking of the station and warehouses at Guanta, the destruction of movables, and the aggression of General Mejia at Naricual, all of which are proved in the testimony, are events due entirely to the Government, and their moral effects, particularly, have an exceptional importance. It was then that occurred the destruction and dispersion of documents, registers, and accounts, the loss of which fully explains the incompleteness of the claim in certain respects.

The ineffective blockade of the port of Guanta must be included among the measures which damaged the firm, not merely from a commercial point of view, in so far as it prevented exportation and the collection of duties at the port, but also from an industrial one, since it rendered impossible the replacing of the lost operatives by others, whether native or foreign. The duration of the blockade is shown from documents contained in fascicle P, in which is the decree of the governor of Trinidad, declaring that measure null and void from the beginning. As to its illegality the Italian Commissioner refers to his argument in the De Caro claim, No. 50,<sup>a</sup> which contains quotations from writers on international law and other authoritative opinions. He believes it opportune to add here that the question was discussed in the German-Venezuelan Commission,<sup>b</sup> which decided that, admitting the illegality of the noneffective blockade, damages should be awarded a claimant who based his demand for indemnity on damages produced thereby.

Among other culpable omissions of the Government there is that of not having stopped the abuse of power by the State authorities in imposing, contrary to provisions of section 11 of article 6 of the constitution of Venezuela, a duty on goods intended for exportation. This illegal exaction hinders commerce and drives it from the port of Guanta, necessarily prejudicing the firm by the consequent diminution of the port and railway rights, according to its concession.

By the decree of May 27, 1903, the Venezuelan Government violated its contractual concession by reducing the port of Guanta to a coast-trade port, thereby at once changing the very object of the concession. Aside from the direct damages arising from the reduction of the general export and import trade of that port, and the resulting diminution of railway business, it is clearly proved in the memorial above named that the exploitation of the mines is wholly impossible without perfect freedom of export from Guanta, because the transfer of goods to an authorized international port would impose a burden of 24 bolivars on each ton of coal, as shown by documents in fascicle S. Now, this measure can not be justified by an appeal to the faculty which the Government has of changing the character of a port for reasons of its own, because, so far as the port of Guanta is concerned, the contract made with the firm implies a renunciation on the part of the Government of the exercise of this very right. This measure was revoked, however, perhaps in consequence of the protest of the firm's home office in Italy, a copy of which was furnished the Mixed Commission by note of the royal Italian legation in Caracas of November 14, 1903. This tardy act of reparation of the local Government having been of no avail to the firm, now permanently incapacitated from resuming its labors, cannot constitute a guaranty of peace for the future.

The fact that the firm may suffer similar risks and the direct evils flowing therefrom seriously prejudices the enterprise from another point of view, as the concession is in fact negotiable, as shown by article 15 of that instrument. Now, what capitalist would think of investing in such a contract, in the face of a precedent which demonstrates the absolute instability of its relations with the Government and the looseness of the agreements in its behalf? It may be argued that the transfer of a concession is subject to the consent of the Government, but it can not in equity be held that the Government should have agreed to this clause with the preconceived idea of refusing such a transfer in the event of the future holder of the concession being a person of consideration and means.

In short, the closure of the port shows that the Government in its relations with Martini & Co. may at any moment withdraw from its contractual obligations. Following this order of ideas, the firm call attention to the monopoly granted to one Feo of the shipment of cattle from Guanta. Feo is a Venezuelan, and either for this reason or because vessels flying the Venezuelan flag enjoy a reduction of 50 per cent on port duties, he finds it to his interest to sail his ships under the national colors; moreover Feo was bound by the Government to not cede his concession to foreign companies or individuals. Thus one of the principal resources of the port was for the firm reduced one-half.

The Italian Commissioner observes that it is here a question of a recent fact, and the firm recognize it as such in not making it the subject of special indemnity, but it merits being recorded as a proof of the hostility of the Government toward them, the more so in that the Feo concession constitutes an infraction of the provisions of article 9 of the Italian-Venezuelan treaty of 1861, still in force.

If such is the conduct of the Venezuelan Government toward the firm, it is no wonder that the revolutionists, following its example, cooperated in the work of destruction by which the company find themselves reduced to their present deplorable state. The Commission has adopted, against the opinion of the writer, the rule that no indemnity can be awarded for revolutionary damages; but this rule is counteracted by the other, which holds that when the Government has been guilty of apparent negligence damages should be considered as susceptible of indemnity. In the present instance the diligence of the Government appears to have been highly problematical. Its interventions not only have never been of assistance to the company or of a protective character, but, on the contrary, were pernicious to their interests. It is beyond doubt that the firm would have suffered much less from the revolutionists had these latter been permitted to operate undisturbed in the State of Barcelona during the last years. It is not believed that a single instance can be given where the Government adopted a protective measure in behalf of the firm, and even General Mejia, he who had captured the shops at Naricual, remained in his functions up to the time of his imprisonment by the revolutionists and held himself overbearingly and threateningly at the interrogatories of the witnesses, a transcript of which is submitted by Martini & Co.

It would therefore seem beyond question that the Government never exhibited the least desire to protect the interests of the company, and when it is considered that, in addition to its general obligations toward citizens and foreigners residing in Venezuela, there was incumbent upon it the further duties of a contracting party, and that it was recreant thereto, it must be evident that such negligence rightfully imposes upon it the payment of the indemnity claimed by the firm.

It has several times been pointed out in this Commission that if the firm not only failed to reap the benefits expected from the concession, but actually sunk their capital in the enterprise, this should not be charged to a nonobservance of the stipulations on the part of the Government or to damages suffered, but to the fact that the enterprise was essentially a nonprofitable one. Were this statement correct, it would follow that little faith could be placed on the Venezuelan reports, official in their nature, which magnify the productiveness of the mines and the quantity and quality of the coal. The firm will hold the Government blameless as to this, as before undertaking this enterprise they had fully investigated the conditions, as amply set forth in their memorial at pages 2 et seq., and their reports accord substantially with that of Venezuela, the correctness of which they recognize and which the Government should not and can not deny.

The coal at Guanta and in the portions of the mines not yet developed is in sufficient quantity to supply the Caribbean Sea market for a great many years to come. As to its quality, the attention of the honorable umpire is invited to the dispatch of the minister of foreign affairs of Italy of December 1, 1899, and to other documents contained in fascicle R.

It has also been asserted that the Guanta coal is liable to spontaneous combustion, and testimony has been adduced to prove this, but where is the coal which will not under given conditions of weather or storage show similar tendencies? The coals of Pennsylvania and Cardiff are subject to like danger, as are all others. Are not fires on board steamers of frequent occurrence from this very cause, even where using coal other than that of Guanta? Is it likely that the Italian Government, as indicated in the above-mentioned dispatch, after the experiment of the Naricual coal, would have ordered the Etruria of the royal navy to fill its bunkers with said coal if it had been more dangerous in this respect than other varieties? Besides this, Venezuela has herself used it on her ships in recent years without thought of possible accident therefrom.

The Italian Commissioner flatters himself that he has in the foregoing summed up the chief reasons militating in favor of Martini & Co., and to enter into further details would be simply repeating what has been already well set forth in the memorial and what appears fully in the documentation of the claim. The demand for indemnity should be considered in its entirety, while holding in view the fundamental elements, to wit, the capital employed, a credit seriously compromised if not wholly lost, the energy spent by the members of the company, the impediments and injuries suffered as much from the Government as from the revolutionists, the nonobservance of agreements, the constant apathy manifested in preventing or obviating obstacles of various kinds, opposing the peaceful development of the enterprise, and the special nature of the relations and obligations existing between the lessors and lessees.

To judge this case upon the restricted and narrow ground of direct and material damages suffered by Martini would be illogical and unjust. The ruin of the company is palpably the result of an abnormal state of affairs, justifying the demand for indemnity here presented, because it has been abundantly proved that one of the contracting parties was not diligent in the performance of his duties.

The firm, taking into account the deductions from the original demand mentioned in the course of this paper, claim a total of 8,997,441.34 bolivars, including the judicial expenses indicated in fascicle Q. This demand is undoubtedly susceptible of further reduction, but between the extremes of the total claimed and the complete rejection of all demands, which the Venezuelan Commissioner hopes to obtain, the honorable umpire will doubtless find a mean which will satisfy the requirements of that equity which should control the conduct of the Commission, according such an amount to the firm as will compensate its direct and indirect losses, while alleviating the disastrous consequences arising therefrom, and providing a means of renewing its activities in the near future, and renew an important but now paralyzed industry, with manifest advantage not only to the company but also to the Republic.

ZULOAGA, Commissioner:

The Italian company Lanzoni, Martini & Co. leased from the Government of Venezuela, on December 28, 1898, the Guanta Railroad and the coal mines called Naricual, Capiricual, and Tocaropo, situated in the State of Bermudez, for the annual rent of 104,000 bolivars, besides 50 centimos for each ton of coal extracted. This contract was approved by Congress on May 4, 1899, and ran for a term of fifteen years counting from that date. In order to carry out the contract the company Lanzoni, Martini & Co. was organized, which had a capital of 125,000 bolivars, Pilades Del Buono being a silent partner therein to the extent of 70,000 bolivars. (The latter seems to have furnished the cash capital for the company.) On July 19, 1899, the corporation augmented its capital on behalf of Del Buono to the extent of 375,000 bolivars. On July 7, 1901, Antonio Lanzoni withdrew from the company, which continued under the name of Martini & Co. Del Buono was not only the only partner who had money, but he was the only capitalist who gave credit to the corporation. By order and for the account of the company it appears that Del Buono purchased the steamer Alejandro, but this latter remained mortgaged for a portion of the sum advanced. Del Buono also paid some drafts drawn by Martini & Co., although with some difficulty. By February, 1901, the company was in such a state of insolvency and disrepute that, having given an order to the English firm of John Davis & Son for £155.14 of oil these gentlemen, fearing that it would not be paid, sent the goods to Messrs. Dominici & Sons, of Barcelona.

The employees of the custom-house at Barcelona appear because of an error or because of the petition of Martini & Co. to have delivered them the goods, and the English house lost the value of them, since they sought in vain at Rome and Barcelona to obtain payment from their debtors. (The English firm made a claim against the Government of Venezuela because the custom-house had delivered the goods to Martini & Co.)

In May, 1900, Lanzoni, Martini & Co. had addressed themselves to the Government of Venezuela, petitioning it to declare the mines exploited and insinuating that having suffered because of the war they would ask that the annual rent which they should pay should be reduced. The Government answered them on September 5, 1900, agreeing to declare that the mines were in operation; and to reduce to one-half the yearly rent which was due from June, 1900; that the rent for the months of May and June should be paid completely, and that Lanzoni, Martini & Co., upon accepting these propositions, should declare "that they had no claim against the Government of Venezuela by virtue of the contract nor any other reason." The cessionaries answered this note on September 6, "gratefully accepting the concessions which the supreme chief of the Republic had made them" and "any claims which they might hold against the Government being considered as satisfied." The development company has only paid the Government on account of the lease the sum of 21,666.25 bolivars in September, 1900, which was the rent for the months of July and August of that year (as will be seen from the account in file O). Martini & Co. have presented their account with the National Government until August 31, 1903. In the account they charge sums owed by the Government which they say the latter owed by reason of railroad, harbor, and other charges, and 60,600 bolivars which they said they delivered to Gen. Martín Marciano prior to May 1, 1900, for various reasons, according to the account which appears in the file called extortion by Martín Marciano. But it will be observed, first, that these extortions of Marciano are prior to the declaration of Martini & Co. of September 6, 1900, that they held no claim against the Government on any account; and consequently if they occurred in reality they were released by the claimants in consideration of the concessions which the Government made them, and Martini & Co. so understood it, as has been said in September, 1900, that they paid a draft against the Credit Lyonnais; second, that 32,286 bolivars appeared to be charged to the Government during the period from the 10th of August to the 25th of November, 1902, and during this time the government of Barcelona was a revolutionary government, and third, that none of the other sums charged to the Government are accompanied by any proof. Martini & Co. are therefore debtors to the Government for rent due for the mines from September, 1900, and they have paid nothing for the coal extracted; that by February, 1901, they had neither capital nor credit sufficient even to pay for a shipment of oil to the value of £155.14, and nevertheless, according as they themselves say in their petition, page 13, in order to realize their plans it was necessary to spend at least £2,000,000 in the first two years.

Martini & Co., lessees of the mines of Naricual claim from the Government of Venezuela the sum of 9,064,965.42 bolivars, which they compute in their memorial at page 166, in the following manner:

Material injuries and moral offenses, damages, requisitions, confiscation of moneys and other things.....	Bolivars.
Direct damages to the quarries and implements .....	326, 069. 00
Violences and offenses against the foreigners who compose the firm ..	1, 000. 00
Failure to perform obligations of the lessor:	500, 000. 00
Changes in the property leased and neglect to preserve it.....
Failure to perform the special obligations of the contract of lease ..	1, 027, 440. 00
Failure to maintain the lessee in peaceful possession.....	696, 288. 75
	8, 513, 667. 58
Total .....	9, 064, 965. 42

In the 326,069 bolivars there are included the 60,600 bolivars of the so-called "extortions of Martín Marciano," which, as we have already said, were not demandable; but it is to be noted moreover that this is composed of two receipts of Martín Marciano for the value of 12,000 bolivars, each dated September 30, 1899, and October 15, 1899, and of various accounts admitted by Marciano as compensation for the sale of certain cattle and stacks of arms. The receipts of Marciano appear to be the amount of these accounts, since Marciano himself confesses when he says at folio 71 of the petition "that Marciano in compensation, and in order to give legal form to his extortions, signed these receipts." Martini, therefore, seeks to recover twice the quantity one time on the accounts and the other time upon the receipts. Besides, the total amount of these 60,600 bolivars on the one hand are credited as against the payment of rent, and on the other hand they are sought to be recovered as damages. Martini & Co. therefore seek to recover four times the amount of the supposed extortions of Marciano. The other damages which make up the 326,069 bolivars are attributable to revolutionists, and this is sufficient reason for their disallowance, but it is worthy of note that special reference is made to the value of some tons of coal which the revolutionary leader, Pablo Guzmán, ordered to be burnt at the custom-house of Guanta.

The agent of the Government of Venezuela has presented a deposition from which it is clearly proved that the destruction of this coal was with the consent of Martini; that he personally directed the operation, ordering that a part of it be burnt by making use of cans of coal oil, and that another portion of it be thrown into the sea; that it was known by all that the operation was gotten up by the lawyer of the company, and that the greater portion of the coal thrown into the sea was of a very poor quality, since it was only dust; that all the coal was not destroyed, and that Martini & Co. had since disposed of a portion of it for the use of the railroad and by selling it to individuals. By the destruction of the coal the cessionaries thought, as would appear, to carry out a profitable undertaking, collecting from the treasury of Venezuela for coal that was not marketable.

Martini & Co. seek to recover 500,000 bolivars for violence inflicted upon the persons of those who constitute the firm, and these persons are Martini & Fazi, since Del Buono is not in Venezuela.

In the allegations which Martini & Co. make with respect to this point there are many injurious imputations cast upon the Government of Venezuela and upon the country; but nothing concrete and to the point. In the charge alone which treats of the supposition that an official of the Government by the name of Carmen Mejias entered into Naricual committing assaults upon the foreigners appears to be discredited by all the witnesses who are presented, who affirm exactly the contrary of what Martini says. The witness Casimiro Pinelli says—that the soldiers committed some wrongs, and that they themselves said that the Italians were no good, but that these latter suffered no personal injuries.

The witness Juan Caprara says—that with respect to the recruiting of workmen, the troops took one Venezuelan laborer that he had under his charge, but that they did not recruit any Italians, nor did they interfere with them.

The witness Nicolás Amore says—that the soldiers of Mejias took the horses of the company, but that he and other persons having spoken with Mejias, the latter decided that the animals should be returned, as was in fact done.

The witness Bartolo Tononi says—that an attempt was made to recruit Venezuelans from the works of Martini & Co., but that this was given up by the mere friendly intervention of the engineers, Antonio Martini and Francisco Fazi; that they took a saddle horse from Mr. Martini, but that they returned it to him afterwards.

Martini & Co. seek to recover 1,027,440 bolivars for injury to their credit by reason of a decree of the Government of Venezuela, dated May 27, 1903, in which by virtue of its powers, in accordance with article 10, law 14, of the code of the hacienda, it temporarily suppressed the custom-house of Guanta. Those who had no credit in 1903 could hardly suffer therein—they were bankrupt since 1901. The partners were in that state of penury that the partner Fazi was not able, about September, 1902, to pay his baker an account of 165.45 bolivars, for which he made Martini & Co. responsible, and which they did not pay, either (p. 3 of the deposition of Victor Cotta).

The decree of the Government of Venezuela is perfectly lawful.

Martini & Co. seek to recover 696,288.76 bolivars under the name of "failure to perform special obligations of the contract of lease," because the Government recruited the Venezuelan laborers, violating article 13 of the contract; and thereby they seek to secure the return of the amount of rent from April, 1902, to May, 1903, amounting to 120,155 bolivars, or, say, the return of a sum which they themselves have not paid; and second, the delivery of imaginary sums which they say were necessitated to repair the railway to the mines, which, according to Martini & Co., is in the most deplorable state, since no repairs have been made. The repairing and improvement of the line were by an express stipulation of the contract to be at the cost of Martini & Co. If they have not fulfilled this obligation, as they declare, they have fundamentally failed to perform the contract, and it is a singular idea to seek to recover a sum which in any case they themselves owe.

The last item of the claim of Martini & Co. is 6,513,667.58 bolivars for "the failure to carry out the guarantee of peaceful possession of the property leased." The items which make this up are as inconsistent and absurd as those already considered, and it appears useless to make any specific observation upon them, since they are in truth the same as those already considered and rejected.

The examination of this claim shows, moreover, that the alleged failure in this covenant, with respect to Martini & Co., is false, and that, on the contrary, the authorities have always protected them as far as was compatible with the disturbed state of the country. It moreover appears that Martini & Co. have not fulfilled the obligations which were imposed upon them by the contract; that they have not paid the rent; that they have not only not preserved the property leased to them, but they have allowed it to deteriorate for the want of the most simple repairs; that they have committed fraud against the Government of Venezuela, selling the Roman cement and other goods which they introduced free of duty for the use of the enterprise; that they have sold things belonging to the railroad, which is the property of the Government.

The claim should be totally disallowed.

Every claim arising out of the contract ought to be prosecuted before the courts of Venezuela. Martini can not claim before the Mixed Commission for supposed breaches of the contract, since the Government can oppose thereto objections arising out of the contract.

RAILSTON, Umpire:

The foregoing reclamation has been referred to the umpire upon difference of opinion between the honorable Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela. Briefly stated, the facts are as follows:

On December 28, 1898, by contract approved by the Federal Congress on May 29, 1899, the Venezuelan Government granted to Lanzoni, Martini & Co., of whom the claimants are the successors, for the term of fifteen years from the date of the approval of the contract by Congress, a national enterprise known as Ferrocarril de Guanta y Minas de Carbón, denominadas Naricual, Capiricual y Tocopopo, situate in the Bolívar district of the State of Bermudez, including in the lease wharf for the embarkation of coal, warehouse, workshops, railways between Guanta and the mines, with rolling stock, material on hand, bridges, the said mines and the other rights and the actions belonging to the National Government in the said enterprise.

The territory so rented embraced 810 kilometers superficial area, and the railroad from Naricual to Barcelona was some 17 miles long, and from Barcelona to Guanta some 19 miles.

In consideration of the foregoing lease the company undertook to pay annually to the National Government in cash the sum of 104,000 bolívares, which was to be delivered in monthly quotas of 8,666 bolívares, 66 centimos. The company was further to deliver to the Government in lieu of other taxes 50 céntimos for each ton of carbon exploited.

The company was to have the right to charge the then existing tariff for passengers and freight and wharf rates, without the right to augment them in any case; the Government undertaking to preserve closed the port of El Rincón, or Guzmán Blanco, except for vegetables and certain small articles.

The National Government was to enjoy a reduction of upon the tariff ordinarily charged for its employees on business and for freight upon goods consigned to the Government.

The company was obliged at its own cost to make all improvements, repairs, and enlargements which were necessary for exploitation on a large scale, as well as to perfect the railway and rolling stock; all of which work was to be commenced within four months after the approval of the contract by the National Congress, and to be terminated eight months after such date, which might, however, be extended for four months more in case of force majeure.

The company undertook to give preference in employment to the laborers of Venezuela over foreigners.

If the company had fulfilled its contracts for the term of the lease, the Government was obliged to extend its concession for ten years more, at the end of which time the lessees obliged themselves to deliver to the National Government, under inventory and in perfect state of preservation, and without any right of indemnity therefor, all the stock given by the Government, with its improvements. The Government was obliged, even in case of war, to exempt from all military service the personnel employed in the mines, railways, or service of the enterprise.

It was further provided that the doubts and controversies which might arise upon the meaning or execution of the contract should be decided by Venezuelan tribunals in conformity with the laws of the Republic, without it being possible that they should be made in any case ground for international reclamation.

Inventories were had of the property leased the company, which inventories were accepted by Lanzoni, Martini & Co., September 9, 1899, and the work under the contract was officially declared commenced September 18, 1899. We may at this point remark that some of the complaints of the company are addressed to the fact that the property delivered to it was in much worse condition than it had expected at the time the contract was originally entered into, but the company having accepted the inventory, one is compelled to disregard all that is now said upon this point.

The company complains of various grievances occurring in the years 1899 and 1900, but these also must be dismissed with a word, because by its letter of May 23, 1900, the company applied to the Government for a rebate of rent on account of the injuries referred to, and under date of September 3, 1900, in response to this application, the company was notified that its annual rent would be reduced one-half for the year from July 29, 1900, to the same day in 1901, provided the company in accepting this concession should declare that it had no claim against the Government by virtue of the provisions of its contract, or for any other reason, and upon the following day (September 6) the company accepted gratefully the concessions made to it by the Chief of the Republic, recognizing as satisfied whatever claim it might have against the Government under the contract on account of the events in question. It is not, however, the opinion of the umpire that this settlement extended to the claims of the company under "vales" to the amount of 60,600 bolivars, issued by President Marcano, of the State of Bermudez.

Historically, it may be noted that on the night of August 9, 1902, Barcelona was taken from the Government by troops of the revolution, and the civil authorities were named by them; that on November 26, 1902, Barcelona was reoccupied by the Government; that on February 17, 1903, the governmental forces retired; and on February 19, 1903, the revolutionists took possession of the town, retaining such possession until after a bloody conflict, lasting from April 5 to 10, when they were ejected. In addition, there were many skirmishes in and about Barcelona within the dates mentioned, and the history of Guanta was much like that of Barcelona.

A paper blockade of the port of Guanta was proclaimed in August, 1902, Guanta then being in the possession of the revolutionists, and this blockade continued during all the time of the revolutionary possession. It is to be noted that for about two months, in December and January, 1902, and February, 1903, Great Britain, Germany, and Italy maintained a blockade by force. In addition, it may be remarked that on May 27, 1903, the Government reduced the port of Guanta to the third category, so that thereafter, and until February 1, 1904, it was not open to foreign commerce.

We may now enumerate the various heads of claims as set out in the memorial, as follows:

Material injuries and moral offenses:	Bolivars.
1. Injuries, requisitions, appropriations of money, etc.....	328, 069. 00
2. Direct damages to its quarries and implements.....	1, 500. 00
3. Injuries and offenses against foreigners composing the under-taking .....	500, 000. 00
Failure under the obligations of the lessor:
4. Impairment of the thing rented and lack of its preservation, including return of rent and lost gains.....	1, 027, 440. 00
5. Lack of performance of the special obligations of the contract of rent, including lost profits.....	696, 288. 76
6. Failure in the guarantee of the pacific enjoyment of the thing rented .....	6, 513, 667. 58
Total .....	9, 064, 965. 34

It is manifest from the above statement that the same items have been repeated several times, and that properly analyzed the claim should amount to about one-third of the above.

Before proceeding to study more in detail the various headings of the claim, we must bear in mind that the claimants are still in possession of the property rented to them, and that if the Venezuelan Government had fixed its rent upon the basis of a return of 5 per cent upon the value of the thing rented, the entire valuation of the subject-matter would be but 2,080,000 bolivars. It will also be borne in mind, before commencing a detailed examination, that as early as July, 1901, the company, through its offices, either in Venezuela or in Italy, was unable to meet the claim of John Davis & Son, of Derby, England, for the sum of £155, and besides was indebted to various individuals in different amounts, and in March, 1902, owed its limited partner, Del Buono, some 2,000,000 bolivars, with outstanding acceptances estimated at 800,000 bolivars.

Let us make a succinct summary of the various injuries of which the company complains, eliminating offenses committed by revolutionists and trivial offenses, such as personal insults to employees, and limiting ourselves as to the rest to proven offenses.

Early in the morning of May 29, 1902, the revolutionary troops passed through the town of Naricual, where were located mines and shops of the claimant. Two hours later Government troops, under the command of General Mejias, reached Naricual and fired several volleys into the town from different points, the shots piercing the habitations and injuring or destroying property, no lives being lost. At this time the general referred to attempted to carry off workmen, but after Martini's intervention recruited but one man.

The following day the Government troops returned and again attempted to recruit Venezuelans in the employ of the company, who, however, fled with one or two exceptions. The forces took some food and small articles. It is further stated that at various times Venezuelans were recruited even from the quarries of the company. As a consequence the Venezuelan laboring force was completely disorganized and its members terrified and dispersed. On many occasions Naricual was occupied by governmental troupes who took hens, hogs, etc.

During the war the towns between Barcelona and Naricual abandoned care of the roads, and as a consequence the railway line was used as a means of transportation by men and animals and railway traffic was abandoned.

On September 16 and 17, 1902, the revolutionists threw into the sea or set on fire, to prevent national vessels from using it, some 5,697 tons of coal, worth from 25 to 30 bolivars a ton, and it is said that the Government was responsible therefor, because, having closed the port of Guanta and prevented its exportation, it necessarily fell later into the hands of revolutionists.

It is further stated that during fights between revolutionists and the Government workmen were compelled to give up repairing the wharf, and the train officials were insulted and interfered with in their management of the trains.

On November 28, 1902, Venezuelan vessels of war fired on the Guanta custom-house and station. The proof upon this point is not uniform; some witnesses saying that there were 70 revolutionists who commenced the firing, and others fixing their number at 25, and some witnesses placing the responsibility for the beginning of the firing upon the Government. According to part of the testimony, both custom-house and station were occupied by the revolutionists. When the Government troops landed, it is said that they entered the custom-house and station and destroyed much property of the company, including all their books of account, and also destroyed the cattle corals and injured the wharf.

We further find that on June 6, 1902, workmen were recruited and others could not be obtained, while President Marcano prevented the delivery of merchandise for eight or ten days in the same month. In many cases the consul at Barcelona sought a release of Venezuelans who had been recruited, often successfully and again unsuccessfully, while President Marcano at all times maintained his right to recruit them.

In the counter proof it is shown, among other things, that the company sold part and used another part of the coal said to have been burned by revolutionists, and it is contended that the company is heavily indebted on its account of rent to the Government, having only paid 21,666.65 bolivars.

The honorable Commissioner for Venezuela submits, as a preliminary question, objection to the jurisdiction, based upon article 16 of the contract, which reads as follows:

Las dudas ó contraversias que puedan suscitarse en la inteligencia y ejecución del presente contrato, serán resueltas por los Tribunales de la República, conforme á sus leyes, y en ningún caso serán motivo de reclamaciones internacionales.

Even if the dispute now presented to the umpire could be considered as embraced within the terms "Las dudas ó contraversias que puedan suscitarse en la inteligencia y ejecución del presente contrato," in the judgment of the umpire the objection may be disposed of by reference to a single consideration.

Italy and Venezuela, by their respective Governments, have agreed to submit to the determination of this Mixed Commission the claims of Italian citizens against Venezuela. The right of a sovereign power to enter into an agreement of this kind is entirely superior to that of the subject to contract it away. It was, in the judgment of the umpire, entirely beyond the power of an Italian subject to extinguish the superior right of his nation, and it is not to be presumed that Venezuela understood that he had done so. But aside from this, Venezuela and Italy have agreed that there shall be substituted for national forums, which, with or without contract between the parties, may have had jurisdiction over the subject-matter, an international forum, to whose determination they fully agree to bow. To say now that this claim must be rejected for lack of jurisdiction in the Mixed Commission would be equivalent to claiming that not all Italian claims were referred to it, but only such Italian claims as have not been contracted about previously, and in this manner and to this extent only the protocol could be maintained. The umpire can not accept an interpretation that by indirection would change the plain language of the protocol under which he acts and cause him to reject claims legally well founded.<sup>a</sup>

Let us now consider the various branches of the contentions, which, for convenience, may be divided as follows:

1. Assaults upon Italian workmen and interference with Venezuelan laborers employed by the claimant.
2. Interference with the contract rights of the claimant arising out of the paper blockade and the closing of the port of Guanta.
3. Various injuries to claimant's properties.

The first two grounds of the claim are so far interwoven with respect to the damages consequent upon the events complained of that it will be convenient to discuss them together.

Let us first consider for a moment in this discussion the assaults upon Italian workmen and interference with Venezuelan laborers employed by claimant.

As appears from the foregoing, on May 29 and 30, habitations of workmen at Naricual were fired upon ruthlessly by the Government troops, and as a consequence Italian laborers to the number of 54 protested before the Italian consul at Barcelona, and afterwards demanded their immediate repatriation, being in fact sent back to Italy on July 12. Fifty of these laborers afterwards submitted to arbitrators their claim against the company, and the arbitrators in their judgment dated September 3, 1903, said that:

The political situation of the country, troubled for many years by constant and ceaseless civil wars, rendered it impossible to carry on peacefully the work of the mines. * * * Things got worse around May, 1902, so that the mining properties, the employees, and even the owners were exposed to very great dangers and threats by the Government troops without any cause or justification. * * * The jury finds, moreover, that on May 29, 1902, the regular troops of Venezuela, without any justification, invaded the mines of Las Minas near Naricual, firing on the mining properties, factories, offices, and buildings and railroad stations, all belonging to the firm. Some of the Italian laborers ran the risk of being killed. The houses of some others were looted. Even Mr. Martini was in grave danger, while some of the native laborers were forced into the army in open violation of contract. These events caused a panic among the workmen, inducing them to what was described "a justifiable decision to leave Venezuela" in the protest filed by the firm with the minister of Italy at Caracas on July 10, 1902.

The members of the firm spared no care in defending their countrymen and employees, as was their duty as defendants of the men they had engaged, but the political situation was getting rapidly worse, as appears by the above-mentioned consular document; food was scarce and supplies were not to be had; banking transactions were impossible even on usurious terms; the native laborers all around Naricual caught by the panic fled, so that railroad service was severely crippled, and the work incidental to mining entirely stopped. Next the sanitary service, which the firm had been organizing, ceased operating; wages which theretofore for the same cause had been paid irregularly were now entirely suspended, and the transmission of money by the laborers to their families in Italy became rare and difficult. The workmen, who two days after May 29, after the actual panic had passed, had resumed their work found themselves face to face with the situation which the jury agrees with the complaints made by the firm in terming unbearable. This was rendered even worse and more painful by the letters received by the laborers from their families in Italy, setting forth the suffering at home from lack of the support they had been used to receive.

It further appears from the arbitral decision that not until September 1 were the complaining laborers paid for work actually done at Naricual up to and including July 9, they sailing for Italy from La Guaira on July 17.

As the result of this arbitration the claimants were held liable for—lack of the clear foresight regarding the work offered which is obligatory upon every employer of laborers, and especially upon one seeking men for work in places far from the mother country and which takes them away from the material comforts and moral comforts which are found in the bosom of the family and in the protection of the mother country.

The arbitrators allowed a total of 631 liras, equivalent to the same number of bolivars, to each one of the fifty complainants.

The umpire is disposed to accept the view that Venezuela is, to an extent, which he will endeavor hereafter to fix, responsible for assaults committed upon Italian laborers—assaults of such a nature as might well have deterred any others from taking their places—and is also responsible for the repeated acts of its military authorities in attempting to enlist in its armies Venezuelans employed by the company—acts which were in express derogation of the terms of the contract of rental hereinbefore recited.

Let us now, before considering the measure of damages, turn to the matter of the paper blockade and the closing of the port of Guanta by governmental order.

From about August 10, 1902, until April 10, 1903, save during the period of actual blockade by the allied powers, and the time of its possession by the Government, Guanta was blockaded by proclamation. No naval force, however, was maintained in the vicinity to enforce the blockade, and such blockade was therefore illegal under the authorities referred to in the case of De Caro<sup>a</sup> already decided.<sup>b</sup>

4. Les blocus, pour être obligatoires, doivent être effectifs, c'est-à-dire maintenus par une force suffisante pour interdire réellement l'accès du territoire ennemi. (Revue de Droit International, p. 157.)

Shortly after the termination of the paper blockade, and on May 27, 1903, the Government reduced the port of Guanta to what is known as the third category of ports, and in so doing cut off its foreign commerce, and this condition lasted until the port was reopened by Executive order, dated February 1, 1904. In the opinion of the umpire, this closure, while entirely legal and within the power of the Government as against the world at large, rendered the Government liable to an extent hereafter to be discussed, under its original contract with claimant's predecessors. It will be borne in mind that by that contract, claimant's predecessors received possession of the wharf of Guanta, with the right to charge and collect port duties. It must be assumed that this right was obtained, and that the whole contract was signed upon the theory that the port of Guanta was to be maintained as a port of at least the same degree of importance it then possessed. The contract is to be interpreted in the light of the surrounding circumstances, and one of the most significant of them was the importance of Guanta as a port of entry. It is not to be supposed that Lanzoni, Martini & Co. received the contract with the idea that the Government retained the power the following or any subsequent day to change its provisions, destroying or impairing the usefulness of the points of ingress and egress to and from the railways and mines. To allow the existence of such a power in the Government as a contracting party would be to give one of the parties to the contract the right to destroy all the interest of the other party in it.

We arrive, then, at the very important question as to the measure of damages for which the Government is responsible because of these several acts—that is to say, interference with the foreign workmen, with the native workmen, with the port by paper blockade, and with the rights of the contracting party by closure of the port.

As has already been demonstrated, the Government materially interfered with the labor of the foreign workmen, the natural result of its action being to prevent the employment of others. It interfered with the native workmen by a system of repeatedly attempted recruitings in plain violation of the contract. It (by paper) blockaded the port, and consequently diminished the value of the railroad concession for about five months, and it almost completely paralyzed operations under the concession by closing the port for a period of eight months.

It appears in proof that at the time the habitations of the foreign workmen were fired upon in May, 1902, the mine was capable of a daily production of 150 tons of the usual value of 25 bolivars per ton, upon which the company might ordinarily have expected a profit of about one-half, and the first question arising is whether the Government should be held responsible for this loss of profit during the period of twenty months from about the 1st of June, 1902, to the 1st of February, 1904.

It is the opinion of the umpire, several times expressed, that Venezuela is not to be held responsible for speculative profits, but the profits in the present case are not entirely speculative. In a question of contract presented to the Supreme Court of the United States, in Howard v. Stillwell, etc., Manufacturing Company, 139 U. S., page 199, it was said:

It is equally well settled that the profits which would have been realized had the contract been performed, and which have been prevented by its breach, are included in the damages to be recovered in every case where such profits are not open to the objection of uncertainty or of remoteness; or where, from the express or implied terms of the contract itself, or the special circumstances under which it was made, it may be reasonably presumed that they were within the intent and mutual understanding of both parties at the time it was entered into.

While this language is not absolutely in point, it indicates that if a clear measure of damages exists with relation to future business, it may be invoked.

We find that by a contract entered into between Del Buono and his associates in March, 1902, the company agreed to furnish coal to Del Buono for the first year thereafter at the rate of 30,000 tons, and for the second year 50,000 tons, with an additional amount in subsequent years, which, however, does not concern us. To this extent the company had an assured market, with a reasonably well-established profit on its business. We are informed that this contract was notified to the Government April 12, 1902.

Bearing in mind the proven capacity of the mine, this amount of coal could have been furnished—that is to say, from June 1, 1902 (about the time the troubles of the workmen commenced), to April 1, 1903, 25,000 tons; and from April 1, 1903, to February 1, 1904, 41,666.66 tons; or a total of 66,666.66 tons for the twenty months. From this may fairly be deducted for the two months of blockade of the allied powers 5,000 tons, leaving a net total of 61,666.66 tons, upon which it could have made an average profit at the rate of 12½ bolivars per ton, or 770,833.25 bolivars.

It would, however, be manifestly unfair to hold the Government responsible for this amount, because a very large part of the difficulty in working the mines was due to the direct action of revolutionists, with whom the Government was at war, and another considerable percentage must be attributed to the fact that the mines could not have been worked with thorough success even had the Government properly performed its duties, because of the existence of a state of warfare in the neighborhood of the mines and railway, as well as at the port of Guanta, a condition for which the Government can not be held to contractual or other responsibility. The umpire, therefore, feels that he would be performing his full duty in solving this very troublesome question if he were to allow in favor of the company one-third of the amount it could have gained under the Del Buono contract, or the sum of 256,944.42 bolivars.

The umpire does not ignore the fact that the mine might have sold its coal to others than Del Buono, but he attaches little importance to possible sales of this character, because, as appears in the proof, from the opening of the concession to the 20th of February, 1901, only 7,271 tons had been extracted, and from the last date up to July 12, 1902, including about a month's work of the Italian laborers, only 7,500 tons additional were supplied, making a total from September 18, 1899, to July 12, 1902, of 14,771 tons, or a daily average of about 18 tons.

In the foregoing calculation, and in another to be subsequently made, the umpire estimates damages in favor of the claimant up to February 1, 1904, not ignoring, however, the fact that the last date upon which claims could have been presented before the Commission, and therefore, in his opinion, the last possible date to which, under ordinary circumstances, damages could be claimed, was August 9, 1903, but he is influenced by the legal principle stated in the American and English Encyclopædia of Law, 2d edition, volume 21, page 732, and expressed as follows:

When a court of equity grants relief by injunction for the abatement of a nuisance, it may award damages also if prayed and proved. In such case the usual practice is to assess the damages up to the rendition of the decree, in order to prevent further litigation.

To the above proposition many American and English cases are cited, and the damage in question, being continuous in its nature, is believed to fall within its clear reason.

By reason of the paper blockade and the closure of the port of Guanta, as well as interference with laborers, Italian and Venezuelan, the contract was broken by the Government, as hereinbefore set forth, and this breakage of contract forms an element of damage quite distinct from that involved in interference with the working of the mines. For if gangs of workmen employed in the maintenance of the railway were driven off and freight of all kinds could not longer be received at Guanta from abroad or carried to that port for exportation, then to perhaps an absolute point the concession became valueless. Such was the case, as we have seen, during the five months of paper blockade and eight months of closure of port, the interference with laborers bringing up the total time during which the contract was affected by governmental acts to twenty months. The rent due by the firm to Venezuela for this period would be 173,333.33 bolivars.

The umpire finds by the statement of account between the company and the Government presented by the company, made to September 1, 1903, that allowing the "vales" of General Marcano for 60,600 bolivars, which seem not properly embraced in the settlement of September, 1900, the Government was indebted to the company in the sum of 15,185.74 bolivars. In this account, however, credit is asked for 33,957 bolivars for services rendered the revolution. This must be rejected, leaving the company indebted to the Government on September 1, 1903, 18,771.26 bolivars. The account may, therefore, be stated as follows:

CREDIT.

This award must be made, however, without prejudice to the rights of the company to recover in other tribunals for services rendered after September 1, 1903.

Let us now refer to the third head of damages, to wit, the various material injuries to claimant's properties.

The most important of these is stated to be the throwing into the sea or the burning up by the revolutionists of 5,697 tons of coal on September 16 and 17, 1902. Responsibility is charged on the Government for this loss, the theory being that the Government, by its paper blockade of the port of Guanta, had prevented the exportation of the coal, thereby permitting its loss at the hands of the revolutionists. On the other hand, it is argued that at least 150 tons were sold to private parties or burned by the company itself, while it is suggested that much of the coal was doubtless worthless through long exposure prior to the blockade.

The umpire believes that the Government is responsible for the loss of the coal, having prevented its exportation, but he can not ignore the fact that some of it was used as stated, and that much of it in all probability, because of exposure, had slight value. He believes he will do full justice if he allows for the destruction of 2,500 tons, at 25 bolivars a ton, or a total of 62,500 bolivars.

Other damages than those above enumerated (including thefts) may be referred to, but although dwelt upon at length in the memorial, the proof does not show that the material loss involved was great. The umpire believes that for them an allowance of 10,000 bolivars will be ample.

No account is taken of the injury to the railroad track, consequent upon its being turned into a passageway for animals, the authorities being pecuniarily unable during the war to keep up the roads. This was an unfortunate consequence of war for which the company can claim no personal indemnity.

Many of the other claims for damage rest upon the existence of war, for which Venezuela can not be specially charged, however regrettable the facts in themselves may be.

It is strongly urged upon the umpire that large damages should be awarded under the head of lack of pacific enjoyment of the thing rented, and aid is invoked of the principle embodied in section 1575 of the Italian, and section 1529 of the Venezuelan Civil Code, making it the duty under any contract of the owner renting property to maintain the lessee in the peaceful enjoyment of the thing rented during the time of the contract. This simply means that such enjoyment shall be preserved as against the owner and others claiming title, but is no covenant against the action of trespassers. As far, therefore, as the Government may thus be legally responsible, the umpire has, in this opinion, sought to hold it to such responsibility.

An award will therefore be signed for 439,673.16 bolivars, with interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum from October 30, 1903, to December 31, 1903, without prejudice to the claimant to demand payment from the Government in any forum having jurisdiction for services rendered after September 1, 1903.

POGGIOLI CASE.

(By the Umpire:)

The widow and children of an aggrieved Italian, who were all born in Venezuela and have always lived in that country, can not claim as Italian subjects before this Commission (affirming Brignone and Miliari cases).<sup>a</sup>

Venezuela is responsible for damages inflicted upon the property of a foreigner where she has allowed serious offenses to be committed against him personally and the offenders, although known, to go unpunished, and where the authorities, in conjunction with such offenders and with others, have depredated his property and driven off his employees, and no relief been afforded, although frequent complaints were made.<sup>b</sup>

A general claim for loss of credit is too indefinite and uncertain to be taken into consideration.

It was shown that on January 14, 1868, the inhabitants of Motupe invaded the claimant's plantation of Errepon and burned the buildings and fences; that on February 14, 1868, Ruden appealed to the executive power and demanded an indemnity, at the same time charging guilty omission on the part of the authorities; that the executive power two weeks later asked the prefect of the department for a report, and that the prefect ordered the subprefect to make one; and that the latter, on May 22, 1868, reported that Errepon had been burned, but that he could not then go to the plantation and ascertain the value of the property burned, as the roads were bad. No further steps were taken by the authorities till, three months afterwards, the prefect, urged on by Ruden, directed the subprefect to make another report; but in reply to this order the first report, which was deficient and passionate, was merely repeated. In July, 1868, the executive power, without having come to any decision, sent the papers to one of the government attorneys. A third petition of Ruden met the same fate, having been held without action for fourteen months. The facts were not investigated, nor were the guilty parties prosecuted. An order was indeed given for an investigation, but it was avoided. The judicial authorities, when appealed to for an investigation of Ruden's claim, refused to entertain it, on the ground that an executive order had forbidden the trial of suits against the treasury. And while justice was thus denied, it was charged that the local authorities were concerned in the attack on the plantation. A report of the consular body, drawn up at the place, declared that the burning of estates, both native and foreign, at the time and place in question, was committed by armed forces under the command of officers. On all these grounds the umpire held Peru liable for the burning.

The case of Johnson (Moore, 1656-1657) was similar to the Poggioli case in many respects, it being borne in mind that the laws of Venezuela only recognize responsibility for the acts of officials working in a public capacity. In the case now referred to the claimant's property was destroyed, and he was personally and permanently injured by armed bands, headed by the governors of adjacent towns, instigated by the superior authorities of the province, who were dependent upon and immediately represented the supreme government. The supreme government issued a decree to the effect that the injuries should be redressed, but nothing substantial was done, nor were any of the malefactors punished. The Peruvian Commissioner had contended that it was necessary that Johnson should have had recourse to the courts and have been denied justice. But it was known that the judges of the province of Lambayeque were menaced and controlled by the mob, and, if not in sympathy with them, in a panic; and that it would have been useless to appeal to them. Mr. Elmore (the umpire) declared, however, that there had been an actual denial of justice. By the circular of the minister of justice of Peru of September 13, 1853, the judges were forbidden to receive expedientes affecting the law of December 25, 1851, closing the consolidation of the public debt. By that circular the courts were closed against the sufferers at Lambayeque. Mr. Elmore cited two cases of the actual denial of petitions of persons injured in Lambayeque on the ground of the circular referred to. One of these was the case of Ruden & Co., who applied April 2, 1868, to the judge of Lambayeque and were denied a remedy on that ground. The claimants were thus without hope. If they applied to the courts they were told they had no remedy. If they applied to the commission they were told that they must apply to the courts. Mr. Elmore therefore awarded the claimant the sum of 11,480 Peruvian silver soles.

The fundamental principles affecting the responsibility of the respondent are discussed by Commissioner Little, of the American-Venezuelan Commission of 1890, who held in the de Hammer case (Moore, 2968) that—

Venezuela's responsibility and liability in the matter are to be determined and measured by her conduct in ascertaining and bringing to justice the guilty parties. If she did all that could be reasonably required in that behalf, she is to be held blameless; otherwise not. Without entering upon a discussion of the investigation instituted and conducted by her, it seems there was fault in not causing the leaders, at least, of this lawless band to be arrested. It was notorious who they were. It does not seem that any attempt was made before any local authority to bring them or any of the band to justice.

In the same case Commissioner Findlay held (Moore, 2969) that—a state, however, is liable for wrongs inflicted upon the citizens of another state in any case where the offender is permitted to go at large without being called to account or punished for his offense or some honest endeavor made for his arrest and punishment. (Opinions of American-Venezuelan Commission of 1890, p. 486.)

No allowance will be made for the closure of a port, whatever reasons may have induced it, when no contract relations between the government and the claimant are in question.<sup>a</sup>

Allowances will be made for loss and destruction of crops consequent upon violence and depredations inflicted by agents of the government, together with unpunished malefactors.

AGNOLI, Commissioner (claim referred to umpire):

The claim which Silvio Poggioli, for himself and the heirs of his deceased brother, has submitted to this Commission, excels in accuracy and efficiency of proof. The writer supports it warmly, and by way of preamble will cite the opinion of Fiore (Treatise on Public International Law, Vol. I, sec. 651), on which he bases his own, regarding the responsibility of the Venezuelan Government toward the claimants. Here are the words of the eminent jurist:

Let us suppose that, having examined the circumstances, it is found that the public officials who by their own act injured the interests of foreigners while operating with a common intent in such a manner as to justify the assumption that they were under the orders of higher authority; or let us imagine that a government has neglected to take timely steps to avert certain acts, or that it has directly or indirectly approved the doings of its officers. In these and all similar instances justice and equity require that the state be held diplomatically responsible therefor, and be obliged to repair the damage.

Before entering into a detailed examination of the claim the Italian Commissioner deems it proper to observe that, in accordance with the views expressed by him in former claims, he holds in this, that the widow, no more than the children of the deceased Poggioli, can be excluded from a share in whatever indemnity may be awarded. To the juridical reasons which he has in this regard expressed on previous occasions he desires to add arguments based on equity.

Americo Poggioli was, presumably, murdered by one of the men who, as will appear in the sequel, had attempted the life of his brother Silvio, and who were arbitrarily liberated by Gen. Diego Bautista Ferrer. However this may have been, he was the victim of an act committed on Venezuelan soil, and the perpetrators remained unpunished. Under these circumstances the writer finds another reason why the heirs of the victim should not be denied the right to apply to this tribunal for redress. Should the foregoing contention not find acceptance with the honorable umpire, it will certainly not escape his diligent examination of the case that Silvio Poggioli was, before as well as after the death of his brother, the sole manager and responsible agent of the commercial affairs of both. From the contract drawn up between them in March, 1892, it appears, further, that the assets of the firm were, on December 31 of the preceding year, 2,803,524 bolí-

The rule laid down by Bluntschli in Le Droit International Codifié (sec. 380) seems in point:

L'état a le droit et le devoir de protéger ses ressortissants à l'étranger par tous les moyens autorisés par le droit international. * * *

(b) Lorsque les mauvais traitements ou dommages subis par un de ses ressortissants ne sont pas directement le fait de l'état étranger, mais que celui-ci n'a rien fait pour s'y opposer.

We may add as follows:

The responsibility of the state results from its neglect or inability to control the conduct of its subjects, or its neglect or inability to punish the offenses and crimes which they commit. (Halleck, International Law, Ch. XI, sec. 6, citing Vattel, Droit des Gens, liv. 2, ch. 6, secs. 71, 72; Phillimore, International Law, Vol. I, sec. 218; Rutherford's Institutes, b. 2, ch. 9, sec. 12; De Felice, Droit de la Nat., tome 2, sec. 15; Burlamaqui, Droit de la Nat. et des Gens, tome 4, pt. 3, ch. 2.

vars, and the liabilities 1,234,729 bolivars, including 72,000 bolivars due Manuela Rosales; that therefore the net balance amounted to 1,568,795 bolivars; that the personal share of Silvio was 501,703 bolivars, the common share 1,067,092 bolivars, and that consequently the total amount of Silvio's interest, 1,035,249 bolivars, constitutes 65.99 per cent of the whole, and even under the most unfavorable estimate he would be entitled to a proportionate share of the indemnity on the basis of this calculation.

Should the honorable Commissioner for Venezuela raise a question of principle and deny the right of the Poggiolis to appeal to this Commission, on the ground that they were not included among the Italian claimants for indemnity for the war of 1892, whose claims were subsequently quieted by the representations of the royal minister, Count Roberto Magliano, to the Venezuelan Government, the undersigned would hasten to reply that in his opinion such an exception should not be sustained, for the reasons set forth in his memorial anent the claim of Constantino Murzi.<sup>a</sup>

With these premises laid down, he will now proceed to a detailed study of the circumstances and motives of the present claim.

The Poggiolis asked for indemnity for five kinds of damages, to wit:

1. Requisitions of animals and merchandise and destruction of crops and property.
2. Arbitrary closure of the port of Buena Vista.
3. Personal insults, threats, and imprisonments.
4. Forcible separation from their property, and consequent abandon-

<sup>a</sup>No opinion was filed by Doctor Zuloaga in this case, and it never reached the umpire. Mr. Agnoli's opinion is as follows:

The honorable Commissioner for Venezuela rejects the above claim on a question of principle—that is, he holds that the claimant has forfeited every right to demand indemnity before this Commission, because his claims go back to and have their origin in the civil war of 1892, after which the Italian Government had settled with the Government of Venezuela on account of other claims arising from the same war.

The Italian Commissioner, without reiterating the reasons given by him on former occasions why, in general, the opinion of his honorable colleague should not be accepted as establishing the forfeiture of the right of Italian citizens to urge their claims before this arbitral tribunal for damages occurring prior to wars of the last five years, observes that this special objection, as regards the claims of 1892, is singularly inconsistent, since various claims of that period, and particularly that of Giuseppe Menda, No. 199, and that of Giuseppe Lasala, No. 6, have been discussed and favorably received.

Doctor Zuloaga's objection seems to be based on the fact that Count Magliano, formerly Italian minister in Caracas, in his private note of August 30, 1894, addressed to the Venezuelan minister of hacienda, referred to a "final settlement of all claims arising out of the revolution of 1892."

The phrase employed in the aforementioned note has led the Commissioner for Venezuela to the conclusion that that settlement of indemnities was general and comprehensive.

Against this conclusion the Italian Commissioner, proceeding from the consideration that the word "suridas" may not be applied to other claims than those the demand for settlement of which was pending before the Italian diplomatic representation, believes it opportune to call attention to the fact that the last phrase of the letter of the Venezuelan Government, to which the above-mentioned note of Count Magliano was an answer, proves beyond question that reference was made to some, not all, of the claims arising from Crespo's revolution, since by it there was asked the exoneration of Venezuela from every ulterior responsibility toward the Italian Government and toward claimants "for all such claims for indemnity as were by that agreement forever extinguished."

There remained, however, undetermined the rights of those whose claims had not been examined.

In any case this exoneration of Venezuela from all responsibility the Italian Government is not willing to accord, even with regard to the claims then settled, in the name and on account of which it refused, as appears in the letter of Minister Pirrone of December 14, 1894, to make any declaration whatsoever, "inasmuch as," says the letter, "to the understood agreement there had been given the character of a decision by reasons of equity adopted by the junta of public credit within the sphere of its competency."

This note of Pirrone, as well as the others concerning the negotiations in question, is special in its nature and proves once more the official and limited character of those acts by which neither one party nor the other assumes a more extended obligation than that which constitutes the explicit object of the stipulated agreement.

Among the claims then examined that of Constantino Murzi did not appear, nor did those of Menda and Lasala, above referred to, and others now pending, and the first-named, as well as any other dating from that period, would be wrongfully excluded by this Commission on the exception so tardily raised by the Commissioner for Venezuela.

On questions of fact in this claim it does not seem probable that disagreement may arise between the Commissioners. They are nevertheless respectfully submitted to the decision of the honorable umpire.

ment of their business from daily annoyances; total lack of protection and safety, with resulting economic loss.

5. Judicial and other expenses connected with the preparation of their claim.

A separate examination of these five heads is now in order for the purpose of establishing the amount of indemnity due thereunder.

(a) Requisition of 95 mules, at 520 bolivars each, equal 49,400 bolivars.

It is well known that the price of cattle in the State of Andes is somewhat higher than it is in Caracas. At all events, the witnesses have asserted that the sum mentioned was the value of these mules, and it is well to note that the witnesses summoned by Poggioli to prove the damages suffered by him have been selected from among the best known and most respected persons in that State. Among those whose names appear in the "guistificativo" No. 2, which refers to this requisition and other damages, are Gen. Ramón Rueda, who was governor of Trujillo; Dr. José Antonio Hernandez, a noted physician who is favorably known in Caracas; Col. Juan de la Paz Peña, and Col. Carlo Hernandez, wealthy and esteemed merchants and landowners; Adolfo M. Sanchez, ex-public register and now district judge of Escuque; Luis F. Carrasquero, repeatedly jefe civil and president of the municipal council of said district; Jesús Contreras, highly esteemed merchant and proprietor of the neighborhood, and other respectable persons.

The testimony of such witnesses should be accepted without the slightest hesitation or reserve.

It is true that in the contract with Mr. Ribero (Document I) a part of the mules had been valued at 400 per head in 1890, but the increase in price is easily accounted for when it is understood that the animals were taken at a time when both the Government and the "Legalista" revolution (which culminated in the advent of General Crespo to the Presidency of the Republic) were greatly in need of draft and pack animals, as well as cattle, for their respective armies.

For these reasons it is just that the amount claimed for the mules should be allowed, and for similar reasons the estimate of 200 bolivars per head of cattle should not be deemed exorbitant, although the cattle contracted for by Ribero was in part valued at 150 bolivars per head, the total under this item being 20,000 bolivars.

The sacking of the store at San José de Palmira is proved by the testimony set forth in fascicle 2, both as regards the fact itself and the quantity of the goods taken. The importance of that business house is shown by documents contained in fascicle II—that is, by the contracts with Mr. Barone, administrator of the same, and by the relative accounts and invoices. It is consequently equitable to concede an indemnity of 32,000 bolivars for this item.

The requisition of merchandise made upon the highway between Arapuez and Monte Carmelo is established by the declarations of Martinez and Nieto. The testimony of Martinez includes in general all the facts referred to in that document. The other is apparently restricted as to quantity, but taken as a whole the testimony is to the effect that all the merchandise en route was levied upon, and Silvio Poggioli declares most positively and is willing to swear that none of those goods ever reached him. Therefore, while giving due respect to any appraisement the honorable umpire may see fit to make of this loss the Italian Commissioner holds that an indemnity of 4,800 bolivars should be allowed therefor.

The damages caused by the Government's agents in burnings at the port of Buena Vista, and by the destruction of five bridges on the road leading to said port, are estimated at 24,000 bolivars (see fascicle 2), which should be granted without prejudice to the indemnity for other damages following as the immediate and necessary consequence of said destruction and of the arbitrary closing of the port, which will be referred to further on.

We should now consider a series of damages suffered by the Poggiolis at the hands of four individuals, namely, Rudecindo Hernandez, Carlos Solarte, Rafael M. Trejo, and Faustino Suares, who wounded Silvio Poggioli. While these persons were on trial they were arbitrarily liberated by Gen. D. B. Ferrer. The records in the case were spirited away. Notwithstanding the accusations of the claimants and orders received from the central Government at Caracas, which, however, took no steps to insure their execution, as will be more fully explained in the course of this paper, the authorities of Monte Carmelo, and generally those of the State, not only allowed them to remain undisturbed, but actually used them as instruments in persecuting the Poggiolis. The negligence and malice of the authorities toward these latter, as clearly shown by all the documents exhibited to us, had one of its clearest manifestations in the passive attitude toward and encouragement of these four malefactors, and constitutes one phase in the system of persecutions which has led to the ruin of the Poggiolis.

Wherefore the Italian Commissioner insists that there was an implied responsibility on the part of the Government in these events, even if only a part of them were executed by its agents, because all were by them at least suggested or tolerated.

Let us proceed to the specification of these damages:

1. Burning of house and stores at St. Rafael (fascicle 19, question 2), valued at 4,000 bolivars.
2. Renewed destruction by fire of the same buildings (fascicle 19, question 3), valued at 4,875 bolivars.
3. Burning of 10 hectares of sugar cane ready for the mill (it would scarcely have burned green; fascicle 19, question 4). The sum of 1,600 bolivars claimed for this loss represents the cost of planting and cultivating the cane, which would have produced for ten years or more with ordinary attention.
4. Loss of sugar from the cane for the first year, 1893 (fascicle 19, question 3), 12,000 bolivars.
5. Loss, by destruction, of coffee and banana plantations on the St. Emigdio property (fascicle 19, question 6), which occasioned a damage estimated at 12,800 bolivars.
6. Destruction of a coffee-cleaning mill on the same property (fascicle 19, question 6), 500 bolivars.
7. Destruction of 5,000 banana trees on the Miraflores property (fascicle 19, question 7), 800 bolivars.
8. Burning of a house, by a Government official, on the Pescado property (fascicle 19, question 8), 1,000 bolivars.
9. Destruction, by Government officials, of two coffee-cleaning mills on same property (fascicle 19, question 9), 7,200 bolivars.

10. Killing and maiming of animals on San Emigdio place (fascicle 19, question 10), 1,728 bolivars.

The total of clearly established damages, which have been moderately appraised by Messrs. Poggioli, therefore amounts to 176,703 bolivars, and this loss, occasioned either by the direct acts of the authorities or by the connivance or apathy of the same, should be indemnified.

Let us now consider the damages coming under item 2, referred to in the beginning of this opinion, i. e., the unwarranted closure of the port of Buena Vista, a measure easily understood and accounted for by the animosity displayed against the brothers Poggioli, as seen in documents contained in fascicle 35.

The authorities attempted to attenuate the arbitrariness of this measure by declaring the port closed through reasons of public order and to prevent the revolutionists from procuring arms and munitions of war. But that this was a mere pretext is demonstrated by the fact that at the same time the port of La Dificultad, 1,200 meters away, was permitted to remain open, though just as liable to be used for contraband purposes as the other.

At No. 13 of fascicle 2 it is shown that during the first year of the closure the damages resulting therefrom to the brothers amounted to 24,000 bolivars, that port serving not only their purposes, but being used likewise by a number of importers and exporters of Monte Carmelo and surrounding neighborhood, for the exchange of produce with Maracaibo, by paying the appropriate duties. It is true that some three months after the closure the port was reopened, but this reparation was too tardy to be of avail so far as the Poggioli interests were concerned, either because the port buildings and bridges leading thereto had been destroyed, or because the Poggiolis could not, menaced and persecuted as they had been, return and restore these things to working order with neither money nor credit. And inasmuch as their enforced absence from Monte Carmelo lasted three years, it seems to the Italian Commissioner that the indemnity under this head should be at the rate of 24,000 bolivars per year, or 72,000 bolivars.

We come now to the third class of damages. From all the papers in the case it appears that General Ferrer instituted against the claimants an absurd suit for alleged introduction of arms for the revolutionists. Before the beginning of the suit they were thrown into prison, having been taken from Monte Carmelo to Valera, where they remained from April 29 to June 9, 1892, just at the time when coffee was to be gathered. Both brothers were subsequently again imprisoned, Silvio for fifteen days from September 26 of the same year and Americo for five days in January, 1893.

All these details, as well as the declaration of the superior court of Trujillo establishing the innocence of the brothers, appear from the documents of the claim. In fascicle 15 the court of first instance, referring to the imprisonment and trial of the claimants, acknowledges as "fully demonstrated the injustice and political passion of the usurpers of the public powers (and these could have been none others than the magistrates and agents of the legal Government) against the said Italian subjects, the Poggioli brothers."

The persecutions of the claimants were so varied and numerous and so long continued that we can not but regard them as proving the existence of a plot well organized and of long standing, prosecuted with a most diabolical malignity and with the connivance of the Government, which thus failed in its principal duties.

The undersigned therefore concludes that the indemnity of 100,000 bolivars asked on account of illegal and arbitrary imprisonments, threats, etc., given the position of the claimants and the importance of their commercial affairs, can not be considered excessive.

The fourth class of losses is the most consequential; from it has come, as an immediate and direct consequence, the utter ruin of the claimants.

The proofs of daily prosecutions suffered by them either from public officials or with their connivance, appear clearly and indisputably from the papers in the case.

In 1891 Silvio was seriously wounded by Rudecindo Hernandez, in complicity with Carlos Solarte, Rafael María Trejo, and Faustino Suares, and remains a cripple for life.

The perpetrators were put on trial, and when it appeared they would be convicted they were arbitrarily discharged by General Ferrer, while the records of the case were caused to disappear. Afterwards they went about Monte Carmelo for years, terrorizing the inhabitants or inciting them against the Poggiolis, burning and destroying the property of the latter, while the authorities remained impassive, notwithstanding the denunciations of the dependents of the claimants, and the orders from the minister of the interior, Felice Azevedo, at Caracas, dated July 27, 1893, to punish the malefactors, and institute a trial for the disappearance of the records. This order remained a dead letter, and the central Government took no further heed of the matter. In fact, the proceedings were never reversed, and the four criminals are living at liberty in the neighborhood of Mérida.

In 1899 Americo was barbarously murdered, and among the suspects of this crime figures Carlos Solarte.

In 1892 the claimants were subjected to an odious trial, from which they were freed only in 1893, after having been harshly arrested and thrown into prison for a long time; 95 mules, used by them in their business, were requisitioned, as were likewise 100 steers; they were robbed of merchandise at San José de Palmira and on the road to Arapuey from Monte Carmelo; their houses, etc., at the port of Buena Vista, another essential element of their business, were destroyed by fire. The bridges leading to the port were ruined, and the port closed, though afterwards reopened when it had become impossible for the Poggiolis to use it.

Twice were the stores at St. Rafael burned, and plantations of cane in the same locality ravaged, as were plantations of coffee and bananas at San Emigdio and Miraflores. The coffee-cleaning mills at San Emigdio, Santa María, and Pezcado, and at the latter place another house, shared the same fate, with accompanying inundation.

The authorities either perpetrated these abuses or tolerated them, and even incited not only the banditti, but also the employees of the firm to commit outrages of all sorts on the property, and to refuse the payment of dues and rents, creating a system of most unjust war and persecutions and a situation profoundly immoral and subversive of order, as reported by the minister of the interior, Dr. Gen. José Ramón Núñez at the session of Congress of March 28, 1895.

In 1892 Silvio Poggioli is again arrested, and Americo twice, in 1893 and 1894.

In 1894 they are again brought to trial, but the reason assigned was so absurd and unjust that General Fernandez ordered the suspension of the trial, thereby committing an act contrary to law but according to justice.

The Poggioli Brothers, threatened, deprived of every safeguard for themselves and families, for their property, were thus obliged to abandon the seat of their business, while their dependents, seeing them thus driven and persecuted, became emboldened to refuse obedience and payment of their just dues, and considered as common property all things belonging to the masters, since they had reason to believe these latter would never return to claim. The few dependents who had remained faithful were in their turn persecuted by the Government for no other reason.

In fascicle 16 the honorable umpire will find, among other things, the sworn statement of Gen. G. B. Araujo, a man whose integrity is recognized throughout Venezuela, from which statement it appears that the object of General Ferrer, the author or instigator of the persecutions showered upon the Poggiolis, was the possession of their property. It is clear that to carry out this scheme he had to resort to all kinds of iniquitous measures, some of which it is impossible to specifically prove.

The credit for which the claimants had labored and upon which they had counted was and still remains utterly lost.

In January, 1894, Americo attempts to return to Monte Carmelo, in order to resume the management of his affairs, but is arrested. Silvio betakes himself to Palmira the same year, but being again threatened, gathers together a few faithful dependents and tries to flee from an ambushade in which he is fired upon and his life attempted, and this with the connivance of the authorities.

By a letter of February 4, 1894, the president of the State of Los Andes (see fascicle 18) acknowledges that the Messrs. Poggioli, by reason of the persecutions to which they are exposed, are unable to establish themselves in the parish of Monte Carmelo, and in a letter of February 13, 1894, Gen. Antonio Maria Rincón, chief of the district of Escuque, states to the jefe civil of Monte Carmelo that when Americo Poggioli returned on two occasions to said locality to look after the interests of the firm and ascertain what measures had been taken against the four bandits above named, he was arrested, and testifies that the denunciations of Poggioli were well founded.

Finally, by letter of November 5, 1894, that appears in fascicle 21, Gen. Luis F. Carrasquero, jefe civil at that time of the district of Escuque, acknowledges and testifies to the long series of vexations and persecutions suffered by the claimants, and offers them the necessary guaranties to enable them to return to their homes. The same officer, by letter of the following day, informs the jefe civil of Monte Carmelo that the Poggiolis will return to the direction of their business through guaranties finally obtained from the president of the state, and gives orders that there be no repetition of the occurrence which took place in October of that same year, to wit, the requisitioning of a train of eight mules by an armed guard of the Government.

Fascicle 36 contains the proof furnished by the Venezuelan minister of the interior that up to the end of 1895, though for years the "Legalista" revolution had been triumphant, there was no security in the state for persons or property, and for this condition of affairs the Government was and is responsible.

This fully accounts for the Poggiolis being compelled to leave their several properties, their interests, and their business up to the end of the year 1894. At that time their persecutions finally ceased, after having lasted since 1891, and having been most severe in 1892, 1893, and 1894.

What has been the direct and necessary consequence of all this, if not the entire ruin of the family?

The Poggioli Brothers had, as appears from the partnership contract of March 4, 1892, at that time a liability of 1,162,729 bolivars, exclusive of the 72,000 bolivars which they owed to Manuela Rosales de Poggioli, wife of Silvio (see fascicle 7). It is shown at fascicle 2 that they were paying an interest of between 12 and 15 per cent per year—that is, about 157,000 bolivars each year.

During the three years of the abandonment of their factories they lost, in the first 6,000 quintals of coffee, and in the other two 4,000 quintals each, and these latter do not represent more than half the average production of their haciendas in Monte Carmelo. This is an extremely moderate estimate, since the actual loss exceeds half the average yield per year, the price of which then was 72 bolivars per quintal, as shown in fascicles 2, 28, and 32. The total actual loss is stated at 1,008,000 bolivars.

The burning of the port of Buena Vista and the compulsory removal of the Poggiolis was injurious to them from another point of view, in that it prevented the opportune shipment of various quantities of coffee stored in Monte Carmelo, in San José de Palmira, and in San Cristóbal de Piñango, and the merchandise was spoiled in consequence. The loss under this item is estimated at 78,400 bolivars.

The plantations having suffered an almost total abandonment for four years (since neither the Poggiolis nor anyone else, whether native or foreigner would have dared to care for them, as by so doing they would have incurred persecution from the authorities of Monte Carmelo), became, from fruitful fields, a wilderness of noxious weeds, and it seems just that such an injury should be compensated. For this item the sum of 100,000 bolivars is claimed.

The greatest of all their disasters, however, was the inevitable loss of their credit as the direct consequence of the above-named facts. In their character of industrious, intelligent, and wealthy inhabitants, they enjoyed, before the beginning of the persecutions mentioned, a credit of considerable proportions, but subsequent to these they were unable to meet their liabilities, either principal or interest, from 1892 to 1894. Those who had reposed in them a well-merited faith now seeing them become the objects of daily attacks, hindered in different ways from exercising their industries and enjoying the fruits of their labors and fearing that this odious condition would be prolonged indefinitely, and result finally in the loss of every opportunity to recover their capital, closed their coffers to the claimants, and within only three months of the time when they were enabled to resume operations, compelled them to give up everything, their property passing into the hands of an administration which controls it to this day for the benefit of the creditors.

Had the Poggiolis on the contrary been permitted to work their property during those three years when coffee was selling in Monte Carmelo at 72 bolivars per quintal, they would have been able to meet their liabilities, instead of which they have to-day only a property encumbered by the same debts which burdened it in 1892, and by interest at 5 per cent which it has not been possible to pay, because coffee has fallen as low as 20 bolivars per quintal at Monte Carmelo, while the cost of production is 15 bolivars per quintal.

It is not urged that the ruin of the claimants is due to this fall in the price of coffee. They would have borne this without great difficulty had it not been that their property was mortgaged to the extent of 1,200,000 bolivars, undiminished at the beginning of 1895, and increased by the interest due on an additional sum of 150,000 for the years 1892, 1893, and 1894, solely because during said three years they could not harvest their coffee, which was then bringing remunerative prices, as already mentioned.

The Poggiolis are not as yet bankrupt because the contract for the management of their property was made for ten years from 1895 when the coffee was still fairly remunerative, but at the close of this contract, unless the indemnity awarded them by the umpire is such as to enable them to meet their obligations, they will be utterly ruined.

These exemplary settlers, who, by their energy, opened a large territory to cultivation, established a port, canalized a stream, erected mills, populated a semi-deserted region, are, by the hostility of the Government and its agents, to whom patriotism, common sense, and justice should have suggested the opposite course, driven to the verge of beggary.

The Government is clearly responsible for their financial disaster, brought about by the loss of credit (that most cherished possession of the merchant), the fatal consequences of which have been summed up in the foregoing, and for which they claim an indemnity of 1,000,000 bolivars. This sum does not appear excessive when it is considered that it includes the stipend of 144,000 bolivars for the managers of the Poggioli estate for a period of ten years, and which they were compelled to pay on account of the persecutions inflicted upon them by the agents of the Government.

The liabilities of the claimants, which would have been discharged in 1892, 1893, and 1894, had they been permitted in that period of prosperity to manage their property unmolestedly, amounted, as has been said, to nearly 1,200,000 francs in 1895. With the direct damages suffered by them should be included the interest on the above to date; but the claimants intend to reduce their demand under this item to interest at 5 per cent on 969,015, as appears in the contract of May 7, 1895 (see fascicle 27), the other creditors having accepted partial settlements. It is certain that this accumulated interest, which constitutes one of the causes of the impending ruin of the Poggiolis, would never have been incurred had they been allowed to enjoy the freedom and personal guaranties in the management of their affairs to which they were entitled. Said interest, calculated at 5 per cent as per the contract of 1895, and including all of 1894, would amount to 436,056 bolivars, and this special indemnity is considered due them as well as the others, and for similar reasons.

The last category of damages suffered by the Poggiolis relates to the expenses of the two political trials to which they were subjected and for the preparation and prosecution of their claim, comprising the cost of Silvio Poggioli's residence in Caracas on two occasions for a considerable period; one from 1893 to 1894, and another at a later period, and also the costs of contract with creditors; in all, estimated at 52,313 bolivars, which is deemed within reason.

The claim of the Poggiolis is equitable from every point of view, and even in the determination of the responsibility of the Government in the events of which they were the sufferers, they have followed rules of moderation and reason. In fact, they make no claim for the wounding of the one and the assassination of the other, notwithstanding these may be considered as the first and last links in the chain of violence and persecutions mentioned in this paper. The responsibility for other maltreatments appears sufficiently established. It needs but to examine the odious animosity displayed by General Ferrer in his dealings with the unfortunate Poggiolis, in which he took the initiative and set the sad example of the vexations suffered by them.

The honorable umpire should consider the autograph letter of that officer in fascicle 37, in which he orders the destruction of 2,000 coffee trees belonging to one Felice Terán, solely because he had refused the General a loan, rendered impossible by reason of serious illness. See also a letter by him addressed to the jefe civil y militar of Monte Carmelo, of April 28, 1892, in which he orders the capture of the Poggiolis, and the seizure of all their mules and cattle without regard to any jurisdiction or respect for any law but that of his own will, justifying his odious procedure by referring to the refusal of the Poggiolis in the exercise of their right as foreigners to furnish 40 mules on an arbitrary requisition of that officer, as a proof that they were themselves revolutionists and enemies of the Government. In that letter reference is made to verbal instructions mysteriously transmitted to General Briceño. What these instructions were subsequent events adequately demonstrate.

General Ferrer was at that time invested by the Government with supreme authority in the State of Los Andes, in Barquisimeto and Zulia. If this was the conduct of one who should have been the best guarantee of the rights and liberty of the inhabitants what could logically be expected of the subordinate authorities?

It appears, besides, from documents in fascicle 35, that Generals Vásquez and Briceño, who were filling important positions in the State of Los Andes at the time of Ferrer's administration, were likewise enemies of the Poggioli brothers.

Is it admissible that he who is intrusted with the delicate and important duties of a public functionary should suffer his actions to be controlled by his sympathies or animosities?

This sufficiently explains how the persecutions and arbitrary treatment which precipitated the claimants from the height of their commercial prosperity to the condition of actual ruin lasted so long and took so many divers forms.

The "giustificativo" and counterproof submitted by the Government to this Commission on March 12, 1904, can not overcome the full and complete documentation submitted by the claimants. As a matter of fact, it was prepared in the absence of Silvio Poggioli and on the basis of declarations of persons notoriously inimical to the claimant family. The facts therein alleged are effectively contradicted by the memorial presented to the royal Italian legation by the claimant on the 22d of April, 1904.

The honorable Venezuelan Commissioner alleges that many of the damages suffered by them were the outcome of private feuds engendered by their conduct toward certain of their creditors, whose property they had seized in satisfaction of debts under harsh foreclosures, and in support of this opinion he cites the case of Rudecindo Hernandez, who wounded Silvio Poggioli and who lost five haciendas by the latter seizing them in satisfaction for a few loads of coffee.

Upon an examination of the circumstances attending this affair it appears that Hernandez, in 1885, was indebted to the Poggiolis for 154 loads of coffee to the value of 15,800 bolivars, plus 11,367.78 bolivars in money. They awaited in vain for the settlement of the account to October, 1890, and on the 23d of that month an agreement was drawn up by mutual accord and recorded the 1st of December of the same year, by which 23,280 bolivars was acknowledged as due the Poggiolis, who granted the debtor delays in the payment of said amount in coffee and money.

The first payment fell due in February, 1891, with the condition that if payment was not then made the creditors would be authorized to seize the property held as security therefor. Hernandez did not meet his obligation in February, and on the 28th of May he fired upon and wounded Silvio Poggioli at night, in the plaza of Monte Carmelo, perhaps as a means of avoiding the fulfillment of the clauses of his contract. After this, Poggioli had no further hope of securing payment of the debt, and could not in reason be expected to show friendliness or regard toward Hernandez. In October of that year he obtained judgment from competent authority, and by a decree which explains and justifies the attitude then taken by the claimant secured possession of the property of the debtor.

Whatever of odiousness there was in this transaction can not certainly be attributed to Poggioli, who used his right only after daily proof of forbearance and after a delay of years in its exercise. It will be noted further that at this time Hernandez was in jail for the wounding of Poggioli, and but for the arbitrary intervention of Ferrer would probably have remained there some years, leaving in abandonment the property held as security for the payment of his debts.

In conclusion, the Italian Commissioner asks that the present claim be recognized in the total sum of 3,023,472 bolivars, which, unless the undersigned has erred in his calculations, is the amount asked by the claimants, of which sum, Silvio Poggioli's share is 1,955,033 bolivars, or 65.99 per cent of the whole, while the share of the heirs of Americo Poggioli is 1,028,439 bolivars. Should the honorable umpire not recognize the latter as entitled to claim before this Commission, it is asked that his decision against them be without prejudice to their rights in the manner employed by him in former cases.

ZULOAGA, Commissioner:

Silvio and Americo Poggioli, Italians, domiciled in Monte Carmelo, Escuque District, State of Los Andes, were associated under the firm name of Poggioli Hermanos from 1885 to 1895, and dealt in coffee and cultivated it, whereby they constantly acquired new properties. Poggioli Hermanos were very much disliked in the neighborhood, so much so that on May 28, 1891, an attempt was made to kill Silvio, who was wounded by a shot fired from ambush. The deed was charged against Rudecindo Hernandez, Rafael Trejo, Carlos Solarte, and Faustino Sanches (the first of those named had sold a plantation to the Poggiolis). Process was instituted against these persons, but they escaped from the jail of Trujillo during a revolution; no action was taken and the suit was dropped. In 1892 a terrific civil war broke out in Venezuela, and the State of Los Andes, together with the government there, supported it. The Government at Caracas sent Gen. D. B. Ferrer against the government of Los Andes. When he arrived there the Poggiolis were denounced to him as revolutionists and the possessors of firearms, and Ferrer having demanded of them a certain number of animals and cattle for the army they refused to deliver them. Ferrer took the animals and cattle and put the Poggiolis in prison, ordering that they be tried, as appears from the order of April 28, addressed to the civil and military chief of Monte Carmelo, which reads as follows:

The refusal of the Poggiolis to deliver over the 40 mules which I have demanded of them, and other reasons which you will verify with General Briceño in a judicial manner, gives rise to the presumption that they are revolutionists and enemies of the National Government, and to this end, and in order to prove them such, you shall follow the verbal instructions which I have given Briceño, who will bear the original of what I communicate.

The Poggiolis were released by Ferrer himself, but later, on June 6 of the same year, the judge of the first instance ordered that they be taken prisoners in order that the suit pending against them might proceed; and they were imprisoned on September 26 of said year, and sent to Valera, but later set at liberty. The Caracas Government, in whose service Ferrer was, having been defeated and the revolution having triumphed in Los Andes, the tribunal constituted thereby, on February 7, 1893, dismissed the suit against the Poggiolis, declaring that in said action could be discerned the political passion of the partisans of the Government which Ferrer served. This judgment was confirmed by the court.

The Poggiolis having returned to their home, they were again antagonized by their numerous private enemies. Private individuals burned down small properties of the Poggiolis, they cut down some plantations of bananas (5,000 trees), they killed a saddle horse and 3 head of cattle, and at the time when Silvio was going to take charge of certain plantations, certain unknown persons discharged firearms on him from ambush. Some witnesses state that public opinion attributed it to persons who were delinquent with respect to payment of mortgages on certain coffee plantations which did not belong to the Poggiolis. In a letter from Poggioli to Ferrer it is said that Garceliano Usma and Santos Rivero had taken possession of the real estate of which in due form they had transferred title to him.

In the year 1891 the affairs of the Poggiolis prospered, but they had made free use of credit and owed more than 1,000,000 bolivars, and they paid thereon an interest of from 1 to 1½ per cent monthly. The Poggiolis from 1892 had found themselves in commercial difficulties, and this state grew worse until in 1895 they were forced to deliver their property to their creditors. The Poggiolis ascribe this situation solely to the persecutions suffered. They say that in 1892 during the days they were imprisoned in May and June they lost three-fourths of their crops which they could not harvest; that they lost as estimated 4,500 quintals of coffee in the Escuque District in Trujillo and 750 loads in the Miranda District, in Mérida; that they suffered other losses because coastwise trade was forbidden in the port of Buena Vista, on Lake Maracaibo, etc. It appears, however, that the loss of the coffee crop, if there was any, did not fall alone on the Poggiolis, since L. F. Carrasquero says, in answer to the eighth interrogatory (record 2, p. 9), that the crop was lost not only by the Poggiolis but by all the farmers of that district. The coffee crops (in so far as they were not gathered, but according to the evidence submitted at that time—the time of the imprisonment—they were already harvested), were lost, no doubt because not only the government of the State which was in the revolution but also the general in campaign from Caracas recruited soldiers, and men who were not in the army, fled and hid themselves, workmen therefore being scarce. The imprisonment of the Poggiolis could not materially influence the harvest of the coffee. The plantations, no doubt, had their foremen or overseers and they could carry it out.

The Poggiolis, in their complaint to the minister of Italy, charge a large portion of these persecutions to the parish authorities who were their personal enemies, "who owned real estate and commercial houses in the district where the Poggiolis were residing and to whom their absence was very advantageous." Witnesses testify that the authorities of the town provoked uprisings against the Poggiolis, in order that they should not deal with the latter and should sell to Cheuco Brothers, Terán & Moreno, etc. The Poggiolis appear to have complained to the higher authorities and the latter took steps, in October, 1894, against these acts counteracting the measures of the local authorities. The civil chief of the district, L. F. Carrasquero, gave orders to the local authorities and in a letter of November 5, 1894, said to the Poggiolis: "Considering the great number of unjust damages, injuries, and persecutions that had already occurred, principally because of an avaricious spirit of mercantile rivalry, taking advantage of the political advantages in order the better to injure their interests, etc.," it was pleasing to him to offer, in the name of the president of the State, the amplest protection. Said Carrasquero, as appears from the evidence, was a great friend of the Poggiolis and is still their attorney in many matters. Some years later (the date does not appear precisely) Americo Poggioli was assassinated by an unknown person, and Silvio charges his death to his long-standing private enemies.

The cause of these deep hatreds toward the Poggiolis and of the private violences which followed upon them, is easily discerned in the documents submitted in support of the case. The Poggiolis had rapidly become rich, and had obtained a large part of the coffee plantations in the neighborhood where they had located themselves, notwithstanding that they labored under a heavy indebtedness, for which they paid dearly, since they paid interest at from 1 to 1½ per cent per month. Under these circumstances it is not natural that they should prosper greatly in their farming business, which does not in itself make large returns; but the Poggiolis were very overbearing and oppressive to the small farmers of the locality, an ignorant and candid people, with whom they entered into extremely advantageous contracts, which allowed them to acquire these properties at an extremely low price.

The contract for sale with the right of repurchase is very common in Venezuela for the purpose of borrowing money as a loan, with security, and although the purchaser may retain possession of the property, if after the term of repurchase has elapsed the vendor does not repurchase it, this being regarded as usurious is rarely done. Therefore the buyer gives repeated extensions to the vendor or debtor. The Poggiolis did not act thus, and conforming with the original clause of limitation of time for repurchase, they imposed new and additional obligations upon the debtor. In the titles accompanied by the claim for destruction, incendiarism and destruction, it is seen in that passed by Rudecindo Hernandez that the latter was paying to the Poggiolis 25 loads of coffee in annual installments, of which the first 25 loads of coffee had to be delivered in February, 1891. Because this first 25 loads of coffee were not delivered the Poggiolis took possession of the property called "San Rafael," planted with sugar cane, together with the sugar mill, buildings, improvements, and pastures; of the coffee property "San Emigdio," of the ranch "Miraflores," planted with bananas; of another plantation of coffee and small fruits, the house and mill; and of another coffee plantation, a dwelling house, and plowed field.

The Poggiolis obtained all this from Rudecindo Hernandez under enforced execution because he had not paid them 25 loads of coffee. Hernandez believed himself wrongfully dispossessed.

Likewise the deeds of sale with the privilege of repurchase are found from Rafael Rivera to his ranch "Santa Maria" planted in coffee and small fruit with a water-power mill for the treatment of coffee, a tile oven, etc. The price of the conditional sale was 5,506 bolivars to be paid in March, 1888, and thirteen and one-half loads of coffee; and in the same month of other years following the same amount (neither the price nor the quality of coffee to be delivered are fixed). The Poggiolis took possession of the estate in 1887 for default in payment of part of the first installment—about 400 bolivars. There is also in evidence the deed by virtue of which Francisco Antonio Gonzales sold the Poggiolis with the privilege of repurchase his plantation of coffee and bananas, dwelling house, grinding mill for coffee, etc., for 7,840 bolivars. This amount Gonzales was to return to them by delivering 20 loads of coffee each year. The contract was executed in 1891. In 1892 Gonzales did not pay the first installment and the Poggiolis took the ranch. These were the sort of negotiations which the Poggiolis were carrying on in Monte Carmelo, as appears from the few deeds which have been produced. These plantations were, as is said, cut down or burned by unknown parties. It is not difficult to imagine the motives.

The facts which give rise to the Poggioli claim are as follows: First. Wrongful imprisonment by Ferrer in 1892, and subsequently the process which he instituted against them. Second. Indirect damages caused by this imprisonment, such as the loss of crops and loss of credit. Third. Direct damages for the confiscation by General Ferrer of 95 mules and 100 head of cattle and the confiscation of merchandise in the village of Palmira. Fourth. Indirect damages because of the closing of the coastwise port of Buena Vista by order of the civil and military chief of the State of Trujillo, whereby they believe they suffered in their credit. Fifth. Damages for local antagonism after 1892 until 1895.

First. The imprisonment which Ferrer ordered is justified by the denunciation which the Poggiolis themselves declare their enemies made to said general, of being enemies of the government of Caracas, a denunciation which was corroborated by the refusal to deliver him mules. Ferrer immediately compelled the proper trial to be instituted, and the subsequent imprisonment of the Poggiolis by virtue of the decree of the judge until the action was discontinued is perfectly lawful and can not give rise to any claim.

Second. The indirect damages which the Poggiolis may have suffered by reason of the imprisonment, even in case they were proved, could not be recovered, in the first place, because the imprisonment was justified, and, in the second place, because the Commission, in accordance with the fixed rule always followed by the Commissioners and umpire, does not allow indirect damages (see case of Giacopini decided by the umpire, p. 765), and in the matter of loss of crops in other commissions the point has been decided against the claimants. It is not certain, moreover, that the losses of the Poggiolis were caused by their imprisonment but by the misfortunes which in general wars bring, such as the scarcity of workmen, the difficulty of transportation, limitation of credit, etc.

Third. It appears that the Poggiolis suffered losses because General Ferrer took from them 95 mules, valued at 49,400 bolivars, and 100 head of cattle, valued at 20,000 bolivars; because of merchandise taken by the forces of General Ferrer at San José de Palmira, about 32,000. The half of these three amounts, or say 50,700 bolivars, belong to Silvio Poggioli, and I agree that it is owed by the Government of Venezuela. The other half belongs to the widow and son of Americo Poggioli, who are Venezuelans, and it can not be awarded by this Commission.

Fourth. The indirect damages claimed because the Government closed the port of Buena Vista. In the first place, it is not true that they exist, since the witnesses attribute the damages, not to the closing of the port, but especially to the lack of means of transportation; but even supposing that they might exist, they would not be recoverable, because beyond all doubt it is the right of the authorities to close a way of communication because it believed it expedient for military operations.

Fifth. Damages because of local antagonism from 1892 to 1895. The acts charged to the local authorities are not substantiated. The burning and devastation of some properties, which are the same ones that the Poggiolis so cruelly wrested from Rudecindo Hernandez, appear to be charged by the witnesses to this latter individual and to others who had escaped from prison and had succeeded in freeing themselves from a voluminous process which the judge of the first instance of Trujillo had instituted against them. No concrete determined damage can be found or ascertained. The bases of this item of the claim are the same as in the case of Victor de Zeo<sup>a</sup> and ought therefore to be disallowed for the same reasons as those expressed by the honorable umpire.

The coffee crop, even in the cold regions, is not gathered after January.

The instrument of 1891, in which the association of the Poggiolis appears, is not executed before the commercial judge; nevertheless if it be examined it will be seen that the real estate was not large.

The Poggioli claim amounts, for losses of the crops of certain plantations and other agreements of a temporary nature, to more than double the whole of their capital. Naturally this capital is exaggerated, and the damages are not asked except for the loss of the products of the capital.

The true cause of the losses of the Poggiolis in their interests is to be found in their immense debts, on which they were paying high interest, in the general depression in the time of war, and in the falling of the price of coffee during all these years.

This claim was presented to the Italian legation in 1892, and the claim ended, since the legation did not take any account of it, and therefore it is not admissible.

In the case of Giacopini<sup>a</sup> the honorable umpire disallowed indirect damages very similar to those of the Poggiolis.

I maintain that the loss of the Poggiolis is not a direct damage of the Government.

RALSTON, Umpire:

The above-entitled claim for 3,419,223.28 bolivars is referred to the umpire on difference of opinion between the honorable Commissioners for Italy and Venezuela.

Silvio and Americo Poggioli, natives and subjects of Italy, were domiciled in Venezuela long prior to 1892, the period when the larger share of the losses for which claim is made, was experienced. They had been in partnership for many years in the cultivation and sale of agricultural products, being, besides, the owners of considerable mercantile establishments at several points.

In the spring of 1892 the Legalista revolution broke out in the State of Los Andes, and early in its career, on the 26th of April, 1892, General Ferrer, who was the governmental chief in charge of the headquarters at Valera, demanded from the brothers a certain number of mules, which were not furnished, Americo insisting that they were no longer the property of the Poggiolis, but by contract belonged to another firm. He was given three days in which to produce them, at the end of which time, the mules not appearing and the Poggiolis being in Monte Carmelo, about 10 leagues away, some 85 soldiers were sent to that point, and they were put under arrest, retained there for a few days and afterwards transported elsewhere, remaining prisoners for forty-two days, when they were set at liberty.

About the time of their arrest a charge was instituted against them, at the instigation of the highest military officials, of having imported arms and ammunition intended for the use of the revolutionists, and witnesses were, according to the testimony, by subornation, threats, and promises, made to appear to sustain it. This charge, however, after being fully investigated by the court of first instance, was found to be without foundation, both by that court and its superior court.

About the time of the imprisonment of the Poggiolis there were taken from them 95 mules and 100 cattle, of the entire value of 69,400 bolivars.

After the release of the Poggiolis they went to Mendoza to recover their health, which had been injured by imprisonment, but before they were completely restored Silvio was again, in the following month of September, arrested, being kept in confinement for some fifteen days, when he was released.

The arrest of the Poggiolis was the signal for the destruction of their extensive properties, since we find that by government authorities their sugar mill and house at San Rafael were at once destroyed, with a loss of 4,000 bolivars. Being reconstructed, they were again burned and robberies committed, the additional loss being 4,875 bolivars. Heavy losses at San Antonio, San Rafael, San Emigdio, Los Ranchos, and Miraflores were attributed to an understanding between the criminals hereinafter referred to and the authorities, whereby was established a plan with fire and machete to devastate the properties. Ten hectares of sugar cane were destroyed, which, had it been harvested, would have yielded 12,000 bolivars. At San Emigdio there were destroyed coffee and a coffee mill of a total value of 6,900 bolivars. At Miraflores were destroyed banana trees, capable of producing to the value of 800 bolivars. At El Pescado a house worth 1,000 bolivars was burned by Juan Torres, agent of the government and commissary of the Caserío Cristóbal. At Santa María and El Pescado, coffee mills worked by water, and worth 7,200 bolivars, were destroyed by agents of the government. When the employees of the Poggioli brothers complained to the authorities of the parish, some were recruited in the army and others expelled. At Emigdio 3 cattle were killed and a horse injured, at a total loss of 1,728 bolivars. The authorities at Monte Carmelo took and destroyed property to the value of 48,500 bolivars.

It is further stated circumstantially that high government officials convoked the agents and debtors of the Poggiolis, threatening them with all sorts of injuries unless they should give up their management of the properties of the brothers and refuse to pay their debts to them, and in many cases those who continued their friendship were finally driven off by violence. As incidental to the dispersal of their agents, and their own enforced absence, the Poggiolis claim to have lost, but without giving satisfactory details, 100,000 bolivars through neglect of their properties.

While the Poggiolis were prisoners, they had at Monte Carmelo 600 loads of coffee ready for shipment; at San José de Palmira 725 loads, and at San Cristóbal de Piñango 250 cargoes, but the port of Buena Vista was closed and exportation there and at the port of La Dificultad prevented, with a consequent loss of 24,000 bolivars.

Packages of merchandise on the road from Arapuey to Monte Carmelo, valued at 4,800 bolivars, were taken by the government troops.

The agents of the civil government, under General Vásques, burned the bodega at Buena Vista and other houses; the total loss of materials and labor at that point amounting to 24,000 bolivars.

The mercantile establishment of the brothers at San José de Palmira, containing a large quantity of merchandise, was completely sacked, and coffee destroyed of a total value of not less than 32,000 bolivars.

The preceding year B. Hernandez, C. Solarte, R. H. Trejo, and F. Suares had attempted the life of Silvio Poggioli, and in consequence were arrested and found guilty. They nevertheless were allowed to enter the army, while the expediente showing their guilt disappeared. The Poggioli brothers repeatedly called the attention of the superior authorities of the state, commencing at least as early as May 12, 1892, to this condition of affairs, insisting that these men should be rearrested, but in vain. So far from being retaken, they seemed to have received the tacit protection of the authorities at Monte Carmelo, who would warn them when there was danger of their being disturbed, and who with other officials joined with them in the larger part of the various offenses committed against the Poggiolis, this continuing to be the case until 1895, when the Poggiolis were at last, after repeated efforts, finally assured of a proper administration of justice; competent and reliable authorities at Monte Carmelo replacing those against whom the Poggiolis had protested, even to the secretary of the interior of Venezuela.

Until the last of 1894 the Poggiolis were unable to return to their home at Monte Carmelo because of the events narrated, one effort resulting in the attempted assassination of Silvio, and their properties therefore being meanwhile utterly neglected.

That the general condition in Los Andes was bad and a reign of anarchy existed we may readily believe, from the fact that on March 27, 1895, the minister of interior affairs at Caracas refused to favor calling elections because the State of Los Andes was "an eternal slaughterhouse," and laws protecting life and property were for the time being nonexistent. Another index of the local conditions is afforded in the fact that the officials of Monte Carmelo were changed seven times between April, 1892, and September, 1893.

As late as 1894 the Poggiolis were again called upon to defend themselves against an unfounded charge of introduction of arms, but this claim was quickly disposed of by the intervention of the superior authorities, although for the time being it subjected them to inconvenience and trouble.

They were compelled to expend in defending themselves from the various false charges 7,615.34 pesos, and they further expended to send Silvio Poggioli to Caracas to advance their claim the additional amount of 3,407 pesos.

As the result of all the acts herein set forth, the Poggiolis fell into a state of bankruptcy.

As early as June, 1893, Silvio Poggioli presented to the Venezuelan Government an account of the damages and injuries to which he and his brother had up to that date been subjected, and as a consequence on June 27, 1903, the secretary of the interior wrote to the President of Los Andes, ordering that the criminals be immediately imprisoned and an inquiry had as to the authors of the suppression of the expediente against them, in order to punish them severely. This was regularly transmitted to the authorities of Monte Carmelo, who filed it away without attention.

The foregoing is not a complete statement of the offenses and annoyances to which the Poggiolis were subjected, but gives a sufficient and at the same time concise account of their most grievous troubles.

It is urged, by way of excuse or defense, that the Poggiolis were usurers and had entrapped their neighbors into many contracts extremely disadvantageous to them, and that all of the difficulties to which they were subjected were to be attributed to personal animosities born of their conduct rather than to the acts of officials for which the government should be liable, and, supporting this, it is said that Henandez himself lost his property because of an unfair contract executed by him at the instance of the Poggiolis, which they rigidly enforced, and that his activity in the various offenses committed against them was to be attributed to personal enmity. In addition, it is to be noted that General Francisco Vázquez, civil and military chief of the Trujillo section of the State of Los Andes, and Gen. Gabriel Briceño, who took part against the Poggiolis, were personal enemies of theirs before the war, while in the letter of Carrasquero, chief of the district of El Pescado in November, 1894, promising protection to the Poggiolis, their difficulties were spoken of as arising from commercial rivalries.

Again, some of their troubles with relation to loss of coffee sent by them to the port of La Dificultad for exportation seem to have relation to the fact that they refused to pay taxes thereon, which had been ordered, apparently illegally, by district councils.

These excuses are not, however, of a character to affect liability if it otherwise existed.

Since the events of which we speak, Americo Poggioli has died, having in fact been killed by a musket ball fired by one of the garrison stationed at Valera, and, it is suggested, by Solarte, one of the criminals who had assaulted Silvio Poggioli in the year 1901, and who had escaped confinement, practically receiving in fact Government protection. However this may be, the claim of Americo Poggioli died with him, so far as this Commission is concerned, as his only heirs consist of his widow and children, all of whom are Venezuelans by birth. The claim of his heirs is therefore Venezuelan, under the rules heretofore adopted by the umpire, particularly in the Brignone and Miliani cases.<sup>a</sup>

As a preliminary question, it is suggested that all the Italian claims originating because of the acts of the revolution in 1892, were settled by an arrangement entered into between the Italian minister accredited to Venezuela and the Venezuelan Government, and some language contained in the expediente of the correspondence and negotiations between the two parties gives color to this opinion; for instance, a private letter from Count Magliano de Villar San Marco, the Italian minister, speaks of giving a definite solution to all the Italian reclamations arising from the revolution of 1892. An examination of the papers, however, fails to show that the Poggioli claim was ever taken into consideration between the two Governments, so far as the settlement in question is concerned, although it is manifest from the expediente under present consideration that during practically all the period when Italian claims were being adjusted, this claim was being urged by the Italian legation, receiving attention from the Venezuelan Government down to 1896.

The umpire is therefore disposed to consider that it was not the intention of the two Governments to determine the claim of the Poggioli Brothers at that time, and he is confirmed in this belief by the fact that the Venezuelan direccion de crédito público, in its letter of March 9, 1895, addressed to the tesorero del servicio público, speaks of the amounts considered under the agreement as for aids (suplementos) to the national revolution, and the account accompanying the letter refers, not to all Italian claims, but to the Italian claims recognized by the junta de crédito público, and similar language is used in further communications of the Venezuelan Government. At a later period, in giving a list of the claims, those then settled are referred to as being for "suplementos" for the national revolution. Again, attached to a letter from the direction de crédito público dated July 5, 1895, reference is made to what is entitled "Convención Entre la Legación Italiana y el Ministerio de Hacienda," which contains a résumé of the claims for "suplementos," etc.

Further, the junta, under the law of June 9, 1893, giving it special jurisdiction of claims arising out of the revolution, could scarcely have given an award indemnifying for all or any large portion of the offenses complained of in this case.

Before in detail passing upon the facts before us and the responsibility of the Venezuelan Government incident thereto, it may be worth while to state as nearly as may be some of the general principles to be applied to them.

Not many cases have been presented to international tribunals in which responsibility was claimed for the acts of private individuals, or for trespasses committed by civil authorities. The only cases brought to his attention are recited in the opinion of this umpire in the De Zeo case,<sup>a</sup> and to be found in 3 Moore, pages 3018 and 3032. In one it was claimed that the Government of Mexico had tolerated, and even set on foot, disorders affecting the claimant's business, and the Commission thought that so grave a charge should be maintained by the most unquestionable proof and alleged as a distinct act and ground of reclamation; and in the other (for the seizure of a boy by the governor of a State) relief was refused, because it did not appear that ample redress might not have been obtained by resort to the judicial tribunals of the country.

Had the courts of Mexico been closed to the claimant and justice denied him, that might have constituted a ground for a claim of indemnity against the Government of Mexico. No such case, however, is presented. No appeal was made by the claimant to the courts, and no denial of justice had been proved. Under these circumstances, the board can not regard the Government of Mexico as responsible.

Let us now consider the question from the standpoint of text writers.

Calvo says:

SEC. 1263. Dans l'intérieur des limites juridictionnelles, les agents de l'autorité de toute classe sont personnellement seuls responsables dans la mesure établie par le droit public interne de chaque État. Lorsqu'ils manquent à leurs devoirs, excèdent leurs attributions ou violent la loi, ils créent, selon les circonstances, à ceux dont ils ont lésé les droits un recours légal par les voies administratives ou judiciaires; mais à l'égard des tiers, nationaux ou étrangers, la responsabilité du gouvernement qui les a institués reste purement morale et ne saurait devenir directe et effective qu'en cas de complicité ou de déni de justice manifeste.

Bonfils, in his Manuel de Droit International Public, section 330, says:

Des étrangers, établis ou transitants sur le territoire d'un État, sont lésés à l'intérieur de ce territoire par des fonctionnaires en violation des lois. La responsabilité de pareil acte pèse sur les fonctionnaires qui en sont les auteurs. La partie lésée peut les poursuivre par les voies légales, judiciaires ou administratives. En principe, l'État n'est pas plus responsable vis-à-vis de ces étrangers qu'il ne l'est à l'égard de ses nationaux. Mais si l'acte dommageable était suivi d'un déni de justice; si les tribunaux locaux refusaient d'entendre l'étranger, d'accueillir son action à raison de son extranéité même, l'État qui tolérerait une pareille lésion deviendrait responsable du déni de justice, et le souverain de l'étranger pourrait par voie diplomatique demander que réparation soit accordée.

En ce qui concerne les actes réguliers et légaux d'instruction, de juridiction et de répression exercés sur des étrangers, le principe est que l'étranger reste soumis au régime de droit commun qui pèse sur les nationaux eux-mêmes.

After denying that a state is ordinarily responsible for the acts of its subjects, he adds (sec. 330):

Mais le gouvernement doit avoir pris les précautions nécessaires et ordinaires, ne pas laisser ces faits impunis quand il vient à les connaître, ou, si sa législation propre l'y autorise, livrer les coupables à l'État offensé.

Creasy says, page 343:

Apply then to a state the analogous test of whether it has been as diligent to provide itself in its neighbor's behalf with a sufficient system of criminal process as it is diligent in providing itself safeguards against mischief in its own important affairs; and, furthermore, bear in mind that the mere proof of an affirmative in answer to this interrogation would not be a sufficient justification against complaints if it appeared that the inculpated state was habitually and grossly careless and disorderly in the management of its own affairs. But if it appeared that the state in question was civilized, and was reasonably firm and orderly in its self-government, an answer in the affirmative would be sufficient.

Halleck says, ch. 11, sec. 7, that—

The sovereign who refuses to cause a reparation to be made of the damage done by his subject, or to punish the guilty, or, in short, to deliver him up, renders himself in some measure an accomplice in the injury and becomes responsible for it.

Hall says, page 227, fourth edition:

With private persons the connection of the state is still less close. It only concerns itself with their acts to the extent of the general control exercised over everything within its territories for the purpose of carrying out the common objects of government; and it can only therefore be held responsible for such of them as it may reasonably be expected to have knowledge of and to prevent. If the acts done are undisguisedly open or of common notoriety, the state, when they are of sufficient importance, is obviously responsible for not using proper means to repress them; if they are effectually concealed or if, for sufficient reason, the state has failed to repress them, it as obviously becomes responsible, by way of complicity after the act, if its government does not inflict punishment to the extent of its legal powers.

With regard to responsibility for the acts of administrative, official, naval, and military commanders, he holds, page 226, that—

Presumably, therefore, acts done by them are acts sanctioned by the state, and until such acts are disavowed, and until, if they are of sufficient importance, their authors are punished, the state may fairly be supposed to have identified itself with them. Where, consequently, acts or omissions which are productive of injury in reasonable measure to a foreign state or its subjects are committed by persons of the classes mentioned, their government is bound to disavow them, and to inflict punishment and give reparation when necessary.

Again, on page 232, he speaks of the higher degree of responsibility of the state which is "not reasonably well ordered."

Let us first seek to apply generally the principles above enunciated to the facts before us.

It appears that in 1891 an attempt was made upon the life of Silvio Poggioli by four people who were subsequently recruited into the Venezuelan army, and who have to this day escaped punishment, although guilt appears to have been completely established and although repeated requests were made of the higher officials in the state, judicial and administrative, that they be rearrested and subjected to proper punishment for their act. We find that one of these requests was made within two weeks after the wrongful arrest of the Poggiolis, and occasioned by the fact that these criminals were then engaged in ravaging their properties and driving off their employees.

After this demand for relief the criminals still remained at large, with the connivance of the authorities, who seemed to have notified them on at least one occasion of the danger of their arrest, so that they might temporarily conceal themselves. As late as 1894, notwithstanding express orders given by the Central Government at Caracas, we find the State authorities so blind to their duties that, although they thereafter afforded the Poggiolis the protection they had lacked for two previous years, they failed to make any arrests. It seems to the umpire that under these circumstances the local authorities of Venezuela were derelict in their duty and were guilty of a denial of justice, for justice may as well be denied by administrative authority as by judicial.<sup>a</sup> And it further appears to him that when the authorities of the State of Los Andes have acted in apparent conjunction with criminals, and have with them and under the circumstances heretofore detailed joined in the commission of offenses against private individuals, and no one has been punished therefor and no attempt made to insure punishment, the act has become in a legal sense the act of the government itself. One can not consider that the acts were the acts of a well-ordered state, but rather that for the time being some of the instrumentalities of government had failed to exercise properly their functions, and for this lack the Government of Venezuela must be held responsible. We are the more justified in this conclusion because of the opinion of the minister of interior affairs already quoted, and notwithstanding the undoubtedly correct intentions of the National Government.

Reviewing the authorities, it seems to the umpire that this case differs from those cited from Moore's Arbitrations,<sup>b</sup> in that it is sustained by the clearest proof following distinct allegations, and that there has been in fact a denial of justice by the administrative authorities of the State; that the considerations herein narrated come within the language of Calvo, who finds responsibility "in case of complicity or of manifest denial of justice," for there certainly was complicity on the part of the officials and denial of justice as set out; that the criterion suggested by Bonfils was exactly met by the administrative refusal to grant relief when the local government failed to take ordinary and necessary precautions and allowed the offenses complained of to go unpunished after becoming known; that the State of Los Andes, during the years in question, in the language of Creasy, was "habitually and grossly careless and disorderly in the management of its own affairs;" that by its failure to make reparation or punish the guilty, Venezuela has, through the fault of Los Andes, rendered itself "in some measure an accomplice in the injury" and has become "responsible for it," and that, according to Hall, the acts complained of being "undisguisedly open and of common notoriety" and being of importance, the State "is obviously responsible for not using proper means to repress them," and has not inflicted "punishment to the extent of its legal powers."

The first considerable offense committed against the Poggiolis was their arrest and imprisonment; first, for a period of forty-two days, and second, of Silvio for a period of fifteen days. It is conceivable that such arrests might take place upon misinformation or mistake even of law, and that, honesty at any rate being assumed, no recourse would have remained for the unfortunate victim. In the case under examination, however, it is clearly manifest that the arrests took place pursuant to the order of the general in command, and that they were merely the result of bad feeling engendered by a very proper refusal on the part of the Poggiolis to surrender without compensation mules and other animals to the use of the Government. In another case<sup>a</sup> the umpire has awarded in favor of men of considerable financial means the sum of 250 bolivars for each day of detention, and the same award may now be made in favor of Silvio Poggioli; that is to say, the sum of 14,250 bolivars.

It is strenuously urged that an allowance should be made for the loss of credit to which the Poggiolis were subjected, but this item is entirely too indefinite and uncertain to be taken into consideration by the umpire.

A large claim is presented because threats of violence were made against agents and debtors unless they should give up their management of the properties of the Poggiolis and refuse to pay their debts to them. For the destruction of the properties involved in this situation, a sufficient award is made, but no award will be made for the refusal to pay the debts; the reason being that the debts might have been collected at a subsequent period, together at least with interest on them, which would measurably at any rate offset the important temporary loss to the Poggiolis. Aside from this, however, the loss is too indirect and uncertain.

Large damages are claimed for the closing of the port of Buena Vista with consequent injury to the commerce of the Poggiolis, and it is argued that the reason given for the closing of the port—that is, that arms were imported there for the use of the revolution—was insufficient, inasmuch as the port of La Dificultad, 1,200 meters distant, still remained open, where the same offense could have been committed, if there were foundation for the charge, and it is urged, therefore, that the port was closed simply as a matter of spite toward the Poggiolis. This may have been the case, but the umpire has nothing whatever to do with the reasons inducing the Government to close the port. The umpire assumes that it was within its police power to close it, and no contract existing between the Poggiolis and the Government (as in the Martini case<sup>b</sup>), by virtue of which damages could be claimed for the closing of the port, the power of the Government must be regarded as plenary and the reasons for its exercise beyond question.

An award is asked of 1,008,000 bolivars for the loss of the coffee crops, estimated at 14,000 quintals, during the three years of the enforced abandonment of the Poggioli plantations. In the opinion of the umpire, this claim is greatly exaggerated. Payment for a large part of the crop of the year 1892 taken and destroyed by Government officials and others is provided for in this opinion, and the Poggiolis returned to their properties in the latter part of the year 1894. The umpire believes he will be doing full justice if he makes an award for 5,000 quintals at 72 bolivars per quintal (less 15 bolivars per quintal for the cost of production) or a total of 285,000 bolivars. In the judgment of the umpire this loss was the direct result of the actions of the agents of the Government, joined with those of unpunished malefactors, and for which the Government was responsible, and is not at all to be classed as indirect, the umpire adhering to the rule in this respect laid down by him in the Martini case,<sup>a</sup> no suggestion being made that considerable crops were not or could not have been made during the time in question.

Without reciting in further detail the surrounding circumstances, an award will be made covering the following losses:

It is said that the assets of the firm on December 31, 1901, were 2,803,524 bolivars and the liabilities 1,234,739 bolivars, including 72,000 bolivars due Manuela Rosales. The net worth of the firm was 1,568,795 bolivars. It appears, therefore, by a careful calculation made by the honorable Commissioner for Italy, that Silvio Poggioli's interest amounted to 65.99 per cent of the whole, and all allowances made on account of injuries to the partnership are to be represented by an award of this percentage in favor of Silvio Poggioli, without any award to the heirs of Americo Poggioli for reasons above stated.

A sentence will therefore be signed in favor of Silvio Poggioli for 14,250 bolivars, plus 395,672.13 bolivars, with interest at the rate of 3 per centum per annum on 395,672.13 bolivars from July 1, 1893, to December 31, 1903. And the claim of the heirs of Americo Poggioli will be dismissed without prejudice to their right to relief in any appropriate forum.

OPINIONS IN THE MEXICAN-VENEZUELAN COMMISSION.*DEL RIO CASE.

Under the protocol the Commission has no jurisdiction to decide claims of Venezuela against Mexico; but an exchange of notes of the foreign offices of the two countries giving consent that the Commission take this course, confers jurisdiction to hear such claims.

Where a sum of money loaned is procured at a premium and unpaid, the amount of this premium will be allowed as a resultant damage; but interest will only be allowed on the amount actually received by the debtor.

Where money is loaned for a specific period and it is stipulated that no interest for this period is to be charged, interest will nevertheless be allowed on the amount due after the debt falls due.

In the absence of a stipulated rate of interest, interest will be allowed at the current rate at the time of the contracting of the loan, especially where this rate has been acknowledged to be equitable by the predecessor in interest of the debtor.

The present legal rate of interest in Venezuela can not control where a debt has been contracted prior to the statute.

Where a debt is to be paid at a specified time it is not compulsory upon the creditor to make demand upon the debtor in order that the latter may be in default, and for that reason interest will be allowed upon a claim from the time the money fell due, and not merely from the day that demand was made.

A claim for damages on the part of Venezuela which can not be fixed in amount, and which is not the property of the Government of Venezuela, can not be set up as a counterclaim against the claimants who have only assumed the liability of Mexico for counterclaims of Venezuela.

A claim of an individual against a government does not become international in character until demand has been made on the government debtor.

Credit will be allowed Venezuela for a proportionate part of moneys paid by the old Republic of Colombia on account of the debt for which claim is now made.

No claim can be maintained for services rendered by ships of Colombia where it was expressly stipulated in the contract for their hire that payment should begin to be made from the date of their departure from Colombian ports for Mexico, and they never did, in fact, depart until after the time for which claim is made for their services.

SUMMARY OF CLAIM.

The agent of the Government of Mexico presented a claim against Venezuela arising out of a loan of £63,000 to the old Republic of Colombia, made on April 7, 1826.

This debt was assigned by Mexico to Martinez del Rio Hermanos, and at present belongs to their successors in interest who are Mexican citizens.

The origin of the debt is set forth in an instrument executed in London April 7, 1826, before Mr. Windale, mayor of the city, by Vicente Rocafuerte and Manuel José Hurtado, the former chargé d'affaires of Mexico and the latter minister of Colombia accredited to the Court of St. James.

The essential parts of the instrument were included in the assignment of the debt in favor of Martinez del Rio Hermanos, executed by the Government of Mexico on August 16, 1856, which was placed in evidence. They are as follows:

1. B. A. Goldschmid & Co., holders of a considerable sum of money belonging to the Republic of Colombia, having failed, the payment of £63,000, destined to cover the dividend of the payment of the public debt, which was to fall due on May 1, 1826, was suspended.

2. Señor Hurtado proposed to Señor Rocafuerte that he advance to him (Hurtado) the necessary funds for the payment of the dividend which he had at his disposition with Messrs. Barkley, Herring, Richardson & Co. on account of money advanced on a loan negotiated for Mexico.

3. Señor Rocafuerte agreed to the request of Mr. Hurtado and gave orders to Messrs. Barkley, Herring, Richardson & Co. to pay, out of the money belonging to Mexico in their hands, the sum of £63,000 to meet the interest and other expenses of the Colombian loan which would fall due on May 1, 1826, on the bonds issued on April 2, 1824.

4. Señor Hurtado made solemn and formal promise on the part of the United States of Colombia to repay the said sum of £63,000 without interest within the space of eighteen months.

Upon the termination of the existence of the Republic of Colombia, which had been made up by the union of New Granada, Venezuela, and Ecuador, each one of these became a sovereign and independent state; the two former entered into a convention concerning the division and assumption of the debts of the old Republic of Colombia at Bogotá on December 23, 1834, providing for the payment of said loan of £63,000 in the following manner:

The Republic of Venezuela was to pay 28½ per cent, the Republic of Colombia 50 per cent, and Ecuador 21½ per cent. The amounts, therefore, respectively due were, by Venezuela, £17,955; by New Granada, £31,500, and by Ecuador, £13,545.

The ratifications of the convention were exchanged at Bogotá on the 7th of February, 1838.

Although Ecuador was not a party to the convention, it accepted it afterwards in toto, the ratifications being exchanged between that Republic, Venezuela, and New Granada on the 22d of February, 1838.

Finally, the act of the Venezuelan Congress of April 8, 1840, expressly recognized the debt, referring to the convention of December 23, 1834, and making provision for the appropriation of 160,000 pesos annually from the customs receipts for the payment of the part of the interest, which, according to said convention, was acknowledged due by Venezuela on the foreign debts of 1822 and 1824, reserving the right to provide respecting the Mexican debt as soon as it should be liquidated.

As soon as the Mexican department of foreign relations learned of the action of Señor Rocafuerte in making this loan to the Colombian representative, it addressed a note to the Treasury Department, which disapproved the action of Messrs. Barkley, Herring, Richardson & Co., because of a different order given concerning the money on deposit with the house.

Although the Mexican Government did not authorize the loan nor, once it was made, approve it, it was obliged to submit to it.

Having awaited for the expiration of the eighteen months, the Government of Mexico ordered the Mexican consul in London to institute negotiations with the minister of the Republic of Colombia for its repayment. These negotiations did not secure the desired result, but the Government of Colombia offered to sell Mexico two frigates, built for the Colombian navy, on condition that £63,000 should be deducted from their price. This proposition was rejected by the Government of Mexico.

The most important step taken by Mexico to obtain the payment of the debt was made in 1855 through her minister plenipotentiary to the Republics of New Granada, Venezuela, and Ecuador. The results of this negotiation were the following:

Señor Plata, secretary of the treasury, admitted that the debt claimed was a debt of honor, and that New Granada was disposed to make a prompt settlement with Mexico concerning it.

Said secretary of the treasury stated that the principal of the debt should be fixed at £72,622.44, the sum which the £63,000 actually cost Mexico, and that said sum should bear an annual interest of 6 per cent, thus far acceding to the demand of the Mexican representative, Señor Morao, for £115,659 and compound interest.

The mission of Señor Morao thus terminated without his being able to obtain a settlement of the debt claimed.

On August 16, 1856, by an instrument executed before the notary, Don Ramón de la Cueva, the secretary of the treasury and public credit of Mexico, assigned to del Rio Hermanos its demand against New Granada, Venezuela, and Ecuador, ceding to said assignee all the rights and actions concerning the said debt which belonged to Mexico, and the assignee undertaking to assume any debts due the old Republic of Colombia by Mexico.

The succession of the present claims to the rights of the original assignees from the Government of Mexico was clearly shown.

In view of the foregoing, the Mexican agent made claim for £20,697.40, which, in accordance with the convention of December 23, 1834, between the three Republics which formerly made up the old Republic of Colombia, had been assumed by Venezuela, demanding, further, simple interest at 6 per cent from October 7, 1827, this being the day of the expiration of the eighteen months during which time it was to bear no interest.

Interest at 6 per cent was demanded in view of the fact that this was the rate suggested by the Colombian representative to Señor Morao in 1856, as above stated; also stating that other debts negotiated by Mexico at the same time bore interest at 6 per cent.

This demand was reduced by 28½ per cent of 3,500 pesos (say $1,938), which had been paid to the Mexican representative, Señor Torrens, in Bogotá, in March, 1829.

GAYTÁN DE AYALA, Umpire:

Arbitral award in the claim presented by the United States of Mexico against the Republic of the United States of Venezuela, arising out of the loan of £63,000 made by Mexico to the old Republic of Colombia in accordance with an agreement executed April 7, 1826, a debt which was assigned by Mexico to Messrs. Martinez del Rio Hermanos, and which actually belongs to their successors, Doña María Martinez del Rio de Castiglione, Doña Angela Martinez del Rio Tomás, Doña Julia Martinez del Rio de Gonzalez Pavón, Don Manuel Martinez del Rio, Don Pablo Martinez del Rio, Don Nicolás Martinez del Rio, Don Ventura Martinez del Rio, all Mexican citizens, and in the claims presented by the Government of the United States of Venezuela against the United States of Mexico:

1. For the unlawful collection of duties upon export products.
2. For the value of the ship and cargo of the schooner Carmen, a prize of the Colombian cruiser Zulmé.
3. For the sum of money paid by Colombia in March, 1829, to the chargé d'affaires of Mexico.
4. For the aid of naval vessels asked of Colombia by the Government of the United Mexican States during the years 1824 and 1825 to cooperate in the siege of the fortress San Juan de Ulúa.

Don Ramón Gaytán de Ayala y Brunet, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of His Majesty the King of Spain to Venezuela, umpire of the Mixed Venezuelan-Mexican Commission, constituted in Caracas by virtue of the protocol of Washington, February 26, 1903, having been requested by the respective Commissioners of the two interested nations to render judgment upon the points of difference to which the claim of Messrs. Martinez del Rio Hermanos, and those which the Venezuelan Government has presented against Mexico, have given rise;

In view and by consequence of the disagreement existing between said commissioners at the close of their deliberations concerning this matter, and inspired by the desire to merit the confidence which the two said Republics of Venezuela and Mexico have mutually shown by submitting to his decision a matter of such importance, and subjecting himself in every way to the provision contained in Article I, paragraph 3, of said convention of Washington to decide all the claims upon a basis of absolute equity;

As a preliminary and indispensable explanation relative to the competency and power belonging to the Commission, states:

That in said protocol of Washington, of February 26 of the present year, it is provided that the object of the Commission is to examine and decide the claims of citizens of the United States of Mexico against Venezuela. Its attributes can not, therefore, extend beyond the limit agreed on, notwithstanding the wishes, manifested by the representatives of the two interested nations, so as to include and submit to the determination of the Commission the claims which the Government of Venezuela has presented against the Mexican Republic.

In order to overcome this difficulty arising out of the limits of the international agreement itself, the Commission has determined that it is sufficient to obtain from the Governments of the interested Republics an express declaration of their consent to the demand of the extension of the powers in question, specifying that they confer the necessary power upon the members who form the Mixed Commission already constituted, to exercise with respect to the claims of Venezuela against Mexico the same powers as those given it by the protocol at Washington with reference to the claims of Mexico against Venezuela.

Under date September 26, 1903, the President of the Commission received from the Government of Mexico a telegram couched in the following terms:

SPANISH MINISTER, Caracas:

Mexican Government authorizes arbitral commission to examine and decide counterclaims presented by Venezuela.

ALGARE.

The Government of Venezuela, on its part, in a note dated September 23, 1903, addressed by its minister of foreign relations, His Excellency Alejandro Urbaneja, to the Commissioner of Venezuela in the Mixed Claims Commission, gave its consent in the terms expressed in said note, which is annexed to the record of the claim.

The Commission, in the session of September 28, 1903, took cognizance of both documents, its jurisdiction being thus established to examine and decide all the questions submitted for its judgment.

These questions are the following:

1. The Government of Mexico claims from the Government of Venezuela as the original capital giving rise to and underlying the claim of Messrs. Martinez del Rio Hermanos the sum of £20,697.40.
2. It demands interest at 6 per cent per annum on the foregoing sum, counting from the 7th of October, 1827, to the 31st of December of the current year.

The Government of Venezuela demands—

1. Payment in compensation for the sum unlawfully collected for import duties on cocoa coming from Maracaibo and Guayaquil;
2. Compensation for the value of the ship and cargo of the schooner

Carmen, a prize of the Colombian cruiser Zulmé, left in the port of Campeche;

3. The return of 28½ per cent of 8,500 pesos fuertes delivered by Colombia on March 18, 1828, to the chargé d'affaires of Mexico, Col. Anastasio Torrens; and

4. Payment of an indemnity for the naval aid agreed on between Mexico and Colombia for the purpose of cooperating in the capture of San Juan de Ulúa.

1. Question. To the demand of the Commissioner of Mexico asking that there be acknowledged as to the principal of the loan made to Colombia the sum of £20,697.40, the Commissioner of Venezuela answers that said Republic can not accede to it because it was only £17,955, the sum in cash received by the representative of Colombia at the time the loan in question was negotiated. It is not just nor equitable to make the Republic liable for a greater sum than that received. And he bases his denial, furthermore, on the provisions of the contract of the loan made in London April 6, 1826, which appears in evidence.

The Commissioner of Mexico proves, by documents duly legalized, which are also to be found in the evidence of the claim, that the sum of £17,955 cost Mexico £20,697.40, because said sum was taken from funds obtained by means of a loan negotiated by the Government of Mexico with the house of Barkley, Herring, Richardson & Co., of London, and effected at a discount of 13¼ per cent; wherefore the sum in cash of £17,955 delivered to Colombia was in reality worth £20,697.40 claimed by Mexico from Colombia.

Taking into consideration the fact that the validity of the debt is recognized in principle by both interested parties, taking into consideration the foregoing observations of both Commissioners and the correctness of the facts set forth in every document having been ascertained;

Considering that, even though it be true that the sum received in cash by the representative of Colombia is set out in the contract for the loan mentioned, it is also evident that its real value, with respect to Mexico, is what the agent of that Government now demands in favor of the interested party, as is shown from the proof as to the origin of the funds out of which the loan was furnished;

Considering that because it is of the greatest importance, with respect to future decisions, to determine in a clear, precise way the nature of the various sums which constitute the debt, the sum of £17,955 is, in justice, to be considered as the original capital which was received in cash by the representative of Colombia, and to consider as a resultant damage, arising out of the transaction, the difference between this sum of £17,955 and £20,697.40 claimed by the Mexican Commissioner, which is £2,742.40.

2. Question. The representative of Mexico demands interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum upon the principal of the loan, counting from October 7, 1827, until December 31 of the current year.

In support of his right to claim interest, he invokes the principle of justice, universally recognized, that the debtor is liable for the damages and injuries caused by the nonfulfillment of his obligations and "in treating of ascertained sums of money, these damages and injuries are repaired by the payment of interest." With respect to the rate at which said interest must be fixed, he maintains that it can not be other than 6 per cent per annum, and he bases this rate of interest upon the recitations contained in the contract for a loan between Mexico and Colombia, upon the laws which were at that time in force, upon similar cases between the two nations interested, and upon arrangements for the negotiation of loans made as well by Colombia as by Mexico under similar circumstances of time and place.

The Venezuelan Commissioner is of opinion that Venezuela is not bound to pay the interest claimed, because it was thus provided in the Rocafuerte-Hurtado contract, and because the exact amount of the debt is not determined, and in case the arbitral award should conform to the demand of claimant, he asks that the rate fixed may be 3 per cent per annum.

Taking into consideration these foregoing opinions of the Commissioners, and having examined the considerations to which the Commissioner of Mexico refers, and having been convinced of the correctness of his statements;

Considering, as an argument of special importance, the fact that the Republic of New Granada, in proposing at Bogotá, on June 30, 1862, the settlement of the affair of which we are treating, in so far as one of the original republics of old Colombia was liable for the loan in question, it acknowledged interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum to be just and equitable;

Considering that the loan negotiated by the Mexican Government, from which loan the £63,000 lent to Colombia were procured, bore interest at 6 per cent per annum, as the evidence shows;

Considering that Colombia paid interest at 6 per cent per annum upon the loan, for the payment of one of the installments of which Señor Hurtado asked and obtained from Señor Rocafuerte the loan of the £63,000;

Considering that several other loans which are shown in the evidence bore a like rate of interest;

Considering that the reason invoked by the agent of Venezuela, that the loan was stipulated to be without any interest according to the instrument establishing it, can not be considered in justice as discharging the obligation to pay interest, because it is not permissible to infer that the contracting parties desired to extend this stipulation to the failure to fulfill the agreement;

Considering that the legal rate of interest which is actually in force in Venezuela, and which the Venezuelan Commissioner likewise invokes, can not serve as a guide for fixing the rate of interest on obligations contracted in the year 1823;

Considering that the rate of interest provided for in the loan negotiated by Mexico in the house of Barkley, Herring, Richardson & Co., from which the sum received by Colombia was taken, as is shown by the Rocafuerte-Hurtado contract, was 6 per cent per annum;

Considering finally that at the time when Colombia contracted the obligation it was a principle of justice, as it is to-day, according to the legislation of the most advanced nations, that the debtor is to be considered in default by the sole fact of the nonperformance of his obligation, without the necessity of making demand after the day of the expiration of the term allowed him;

By reason of the foregoing, which is proved by the evidence, it must be decided that Venezuela is obliged to make reparation to Mexico for the damages and injuries resulting from delay in the fulfillment of its obligation, by paying interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, upon the original capital of the debt, counting from the 7th day of October, 1827.

CLAIMS OF THE GOVERNMENT OF VENEZUELA.

I. Question. Payment in compensation for the sum unlawfully collected by New Spain, now Mexico, for import duties on cocoa coming from Caracas, Maracaibo, and Guayaquil.

The Government of Venezuela claims from the Government of Mexico the amount of certain duties unlawfully collected on the importation of cocoa coming from Caracas, Maracaibo, and Guayaquil, and the Commissioner of Mexico accredited to this Commission rejects the demand, relying in so doing upon proofs and public documents which are to be found in the record.

Considering that the agent of Venezuela, in his argument of July 11 of the present year, adopts the report of the solicitor of the public treasury, Mr. Juan Bautista Calcaño, addressed to the minister of state in the department of the treasury of Venezuela, relative to the claim of Messrs. Martinez del Rio Hermanos, and that in this report Doctor Calcaño admits that it is not possible to present this claim in proper form because it is not possible to fix the amount thereof;

Considering that the claim concerning this cocoa belongs to individuals whose nationality is unknown and whose heirs are likewise unknown;

Considering that Messrs. Martinez del Rio Hermanos are not liable except for debts against Mexico which are of an international character;

Considering that in official documents published by the department of foreign relations of Venezuela, which are to be found in the record, the Government of said Republic acknowledges that the claim concerning which there is question is not invested with the aforesaid international character;

Considering, finally, that the Government of Venezuela has not been able to produce proofs of the validity of this debt;

On account of all the foregoing the umpire decides that there is no reason for indemnity, and that Messrs. Martinez del Rio Hermanos are released from all liability in this respect.

2. Question. Compensation for the value of the ship and cargo of the schooner Carmen, the prize Colombian cruiser Zulmé, deposited in the treasury of the port of Campeche.

The proofs and documents relative to this matter having been examined, and

Considering that the value of the ship and cargo of the schooner Carmen, deposited in the treasury of the port of Campeche, is the property of individuals, because the value of prizes belongs by law to the privateer which captures them;

Considering that the existence of said owner is not known, and that neither he nor his heirs, if there be any, have claimed anything upon this particular from the Republic of Mexico;

Considering that in this case the claim is not of an international character, which is an indispensable requisite for its validity;

On account of the foregoing, the umpire decides that no indemnity is due, and that Messrs. Martinez del Rio Hermanos are released from all liability in this respect.

3. Question. The return of 8,500 pesos fuertes delivered by Colombia in March, 1829, to the chargé d'affaires of Mexico, Col. Anastacio Torrens.

It appears established by the evidence that the two interested Governments agree concerning the validity of this debt.

Considering that Venezuela only has a right to 28½ per cent of the aforesaid amount;

It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that Messrs. Martinez del Rio Hermanos are obliged to pay to Venezuela the sum of 28½ per cent of 8,500 pesos fuertes, or, say, 2,422.50 pesos fuertes.

4. Question. Payment for the naval aid agreed on by Mexico and Colombia for the capture of San Juan de Ulúa.

The agent of Venezuela maintains (adopting, as his report of the solicitor of the treasury, Doctor Calcaño) that by virtue of Article II of the convention, made on the 19th of August, 1825, by Señor Torrens, minister plenipotentiary of Mexico, relative to the naval aid destined to cooperate in the capture of the Fortress of San Juan de Ulúa, the Government of Mexico obligated itself to pay the expenses which said aid might occasion until forty days after the surrender of said fort, or for a longer time if by common accord it were found necessary, and, relying on this obligation, he presents the account of the expenses, which is to be found in the record; and

Considering that Article II, relied on, formally establishes that the obligation to pay this expense should begin to run "from the day on which each of the auxiliary ships should leave the ports of Colombia bound for the Gulf of Mexico;"

And it appearing in the proofs that none of the Colombian ships complied with this indispensable requisite;

Considering that the account presented by the Government of Venezuela concerning said naval expenses of the Colombian squadron are not accompanied by proofs in any way appreciable in justice;

Considering that it appears from the correspondence exchanged between the high officials of Colombia and Mexico, respectively, that up to the 21st of January, 1826, these countries considered the agreement to furnish naval aid to Mexico was dissolved;

Considering, finally, that the surrender of the fort of Ulúa, which was the object for which the squadron was destined, was accomplished by Mexico without the help agreed on with Colombia;

For these reasons the umpire decides that there is no reason for indemnity, and that Messrs. Martinez del Rio Hermanos are released from all liability in this respect.

Concluding the examination of each and all of the questions submitted for his decision, and taking into account the reasons and declarations which precede, the undersigned, the umpire, decides that he must decree, and he does hereby decree, that the Government of the United States of Venezuela is obliged to indemnify the successors of Messrs. Martinez del Rio Hermanos, in payment of the claim presented in their name by the Governor of the United States of Mexico, in the sum which may result from a liquidation in the following manner:

1. For 28½ per cent which is due from Venezuela of the sum of £6,300, considered as the original capital of the loan delivered to Colombia by virtue of the Rocafuerte-Hurtado contract, dated at London, April 7, 1826, £17,955.

2. For interest on the original capital, that is to say, £17,955, from October 7, 1827, until October 2, 1903, £81,859.50.

3. For indemnity for the damages and injuries caused by the bonus of  $13\frac{1}{4}$  per cent, which the above-mentioned £17,955 cost Mexico, £2,742.40.

4. Messrs. Martinez del Rio Hermanos shall credit the Government of Venezuela for  $28\frac{1}{4}$  per cent of the 8,500 pesos fuertes paid by the Governor of Colombia on March 6, 1829, which belongs to it, \$2,422.50, or, say, £484.50.

RULES OF NETHERLANDS-VENEZUELAN COMMISSION.

I.

All claims will be presented to the Commission by the Government of the Netherlands through its representative and will be presented within the time specified in the protocol. If possible, the presentation will be by way of a memorial in each case, accompanied by all documents and proofs. For cause shown, to prevent a failure of justice, a memorial may also be waived by the Commission and the time extended beyond the thirty days first named in the protocol. In lieu of the memorial in such case there must be a concise statement of the facts constituting such claim.

II.

All documentary and other evidence presented for the consideration of the Commission will be in the language of the Government presenting the same and in Spanish, accompanied if possible by translations into English.

III.

Each memorial or statement will specify as far as possible with precision the sum claimed and the grounds thereof, and may also state the claim as to interest, and will clearly state the currency in which the damages are calculated. Whether interest will be allowed in a given case, and if allowed, at what rate per cent., will be determined by the commissioners if they agree; and if they do not agree, it may be referred to the umpire.

IV.

When a memorial, or statement, is presented a written receipt will be given by the secretaries to the representative presenting the same. It will then be inscribed in the proper register, a note being made by the secretaries on the memorial, or statement, of the date of its receipt and number.

V.

The Venezuelan representative of record will have the right within five days after the presentation of any claim to indicate whether he intends to oppose it upon the question of fact or law, or both; and in the absence of such indications within such time, or before with the consent of the commissioners, the Commission may proceed to the disposition thereof. If the Venezuelan representative decides within the time stated above to oppose the claim upon the question of fact, he may have twenty days after the presentation of such claim to answer the same in writing, presenting with his answer such proofs and counterproofs as he may think relevant, producing all necessary documents. Such answer will be presented and registered as provided in Section IV, and notice thereof given to the representative of the Netherlands. In case the opposition of the Venezuelan Government is based on the insufficiency of the documents presented, the representative of the Netherlands Government will be so informed and a suitable time will be allowed him in which to present the required documents.

VI.

The Netherlands representative, or the person whom he will appoint as agent to support the Netherlands claims before the Mixed Commission, will have the right within five days after the presentation of the answer of the Venezuelan Government in any case to indicate whether he will join issue upon the memorial and answer, or desires to make reply to such answer. If he does not indicate his desire within such time to make reply, at the expiration of the said five days, or before with the consent of the commissioners, the Commission may proceed to dispose thereof. If the Netherlands representative, or above-named agent, decides within the time stated above to make a reply to such answer, he may have twenty days from the date of the presentation of such answer in which to make such reply, either verbally or in writing, accompanied by the proper translations and proofs. Such reply will be presented and registered as provided in Section IV, and notice thereof given to the representative of the Venezuelan Government.

VII.

The Venezuelan representative may have five days after the presentation of such reply in which to decide whether he desires to make a written or verbal reply thereto, or to submit his case on the papers as they then stand. If he does not indicate his desire within the time stated above to make such counter reply, at the expiration of the said five days, or before with the consent of the commissioners, the Commission may proceed to dispose thereof. If the Venezuelan representative decides within the time stated above to make a counter reply to such replication, he may have twenty days from the date of the presentation of such replication in which to make his counter reply in writing or verbally, accompanied by the proper translations and proofs. Such counter reply will be presented and registered as provided in Section IV, and notice thereof given to the representative of the Netherlands, or his agent.

VIII.

When the issue is formed in either of the ways suggested in the foregoing sections, the secretaries will forthwith inscribe the claims for hearing, giving immediate notice thereof to the representatives of both Governments. The tribunal will then fix a date for the hearing.

IX.

The umpire will be present at all formal meetings of the Commission, and his decision upon any point necessary for the progress of the case may be invoked at any stage of the proceedings. His decision when thus invoked will be entered in the records of the proceedings.

X.

After hearing the case, if the commissioners are agreed, the tribunal may give its decision as soon as the same can be put in writing. If the commissioners disagree, but mutually consider that further consideration is necessary, the tribunal may order such further investigation, fixing the time and place therefor, and if the commissioners are then agreed, the decision may be rendered as provided in the first part of this section.

XI.

No one may attend the sittings of the tribunal except the agents or other representatives of their respective Governments, the official secretaries, and the secretary to the umpire, the claimants or their representatives, and such other persons as first obtain the authorization of the tribunal either verbally or in writing.

XII.

The secretaries will keep, besides the register mentioned in Section IV, a book in which they will enter a record of the proceedings and the decisions of the tribunal in each case, and another in which they shall enter the minutes of the sittings. These books will be kept in duplicate, one copy in Dutch and the other in Spanish, and will be verified, approved, and signed from time to time by the tribunal.

XIII.

The representative or agent of the respective Governments will have the right at any time before a case is taken up for final consideration to present oral or written arguments in connection therewith, but no person will be entitled to recognition before the Commission except such representative or agent.

XIV.

The secretaries will be charged with the custody of all records submitted to them, and will not deliver them to anyone save the members of the Commission, taking his receipt therefor. All papers will be indorsed by them with the date of filing. If, at any time, the Government submitting the same shall demand it, it will be entitled to receive from the secretaries a copy duly certified by them of any documents or papers filed before the Commission. Documents belonging to the archives of either the Dutch legation or the Venezuelan Government and presented to substantiate any claim shall, however, remain in the custody of the parties who have presented them.

XV.

All documents and records shall be considered confidential.

OPINIONS IN THE NETHERLANDS-VENEZUELAN COMMISSION.*J. N. HENRIQUEZ CASE.

In accordance with the accepted principles of international law, to hold a government responsible for the seizure of goods or property such seizure must be made by the government itself, through its proper authorities, or by those who had a right to act in its name or behalf; it must be made by some one having authority to express the governmental will and purpose.

A government can not be held responsible for contract obligations incurred by the authorities of an unsuccessful revolution.

A government to be considered a de facto government must be one that is recognized as the ruling or supreme power. It is not one temporarily in authority in a district or state in revolution against the de facto and de jure government of the nation.

The Government of Venezuela is responsible to aliens, commorant or resident, for injuries they receive in its territory from insurgents or revolutionists whom the Government could control and not otherwise. That the Government was negligent in a given case must be alleged and proved.

PLUMLEY, Umpire:

In this case the commissioners failed to agree, and it came to the umpire for his opinion and decision.

The umpire finds that the claimant was the sole owner of the firm of Henriquez, Cadet & Co., doing business as a merchant under that name in the city of Coro, capital of the State of Falcón, Republic of Venezuela, and that he was a subject of the Netherlands, at and during the time of the happening of the events herein complained of.

His claim is for the sum of 19,250 bolivars.

The sum of 13,513 bolivars and 4 centimos was for goods and cash voluntarily loaned or delivered to revolutionary chiefs or their official subordinates, commencing with the so-called de facto government of General Rivera, in the State of Falcón, in June, 1902.

The sum of 5,737.20 bolivars is for cash and goods—mostly cash—furnished the present Government from November, 1899, to June, 1900. This sum is admitted to be lawfully due from the Republic of Venezuela to the claimant.

It is not questioned by either party that General Rivera was in control of that portion of the Republic of Venezuela of which the claimant was an inhabitant during the time mentioned, and that he was a revolutionary chieftain warring against the constitutional Government. Neither party questions that it was a revolution in fact, nor that the funds and effects furnished General Rivera and his subordinates went for the support and the benefit of the revolutionary forces only. But the claimant insists that it was the de facto government of the State of Falcón; that he was obliged to recognize its authority, and that, being a de facto government, the Republic of Venezuela is responsible for the loans and goods furnished to the superior powers then in control of that State. It is not claimed, however, that General Rivera held any office de facto or de jure under the authority or by the consent of the Republic of Venezuela. Indeed, it is recognized and admitted that such government as there was under him was in direct opposition to the constitutional Government, and was seeking the life of that Government. So far from having the authority to pledge the Government of the Republic of Venezuela for moneys or goods, every dollar received in value by General Rivera was to be used for the destruction of the Government, which it is now sought to charge with its payment. There is no claim or proof that the loan of the money or the delivery of the goods was in fact compulsory. It was placed upon other grounds. If, however, the claimant had been compelled to pay out this money and to deliver the effects mentioned, under such circumstances that in law it would amount to the seizure of them by General Rivera, or his subordinate officers, it would not then occupy such relation to the constitutional Government as would require its payment out of the treasury of such Government.

The umpire has already held in the case of James Crossman v. the Republic of Venezuela, "in the British Mixed Commission, now sitting in Caracas, that to hold the Government of Venezuela responsible for seizure of goods or property, it must be made by the Venezuelan Government through its proper authorities or by those who had a right to act in the name of and on behalf of the Government of Venezuela; that it must be done by some one having authority to express the governmental will and purpose. Such, in the opinion of the umpire, is the inflexible rule of international law as held by text writers, and by courts and mixed commissions, in all cases where the revolution or insurrection had passed beyond the control of the Government.

Wharton's International Law Digest, sec. 223, quoted in Moore, 2951:

The sovereign is responsible to alien residents for injuries they receive in his territory from belligerent action or from insurgents whom he could control. * * *

Hall's International Law, 4th ed., pages 231-2 lays down the law as follows:

When a government is temporarily unable to control the acts of private persons within its dominions, owing to insurrection or civil commotion, it is not responsible for injury which may be received by foreign subjects in their person or property in the course of the struggle, either through the measures which it may be obliged to take for the recovery of its authority, or through acts done by the part of the population which has broken loose from control. When strangers enter a State they must be prepared for the risks of intestine war, because the occurrence is one over which from the nature of the case the Government can have no control; and they can not demand compensation for losses or injuries received, both because, unless it can be shown that a State is not reasonably well ordered, it is not bound to do more for foreigners than for its own subjects, and no government compensates its subjects for losses or injuries suffered in the course of civil commotions, and because the highest interests of the State itself are too deeply involved in the avoidance of such commotions to allow the supposition to be entertained that they have been caused by carelessness on its part which would affect it with responsibility toward a foreign State.

Ralston, umpire, in the case of Sambiaggio v. Venezuela, before the Italian-Venezuelan Mixed Commission, now sitting in Caracas, held upon this question in part as follows:<sup>a</sup>

1. Revolutionists are not the agents of government, and a natural responsibility does not exist.
2. Their acts are committed to destroy the government, and no one should be held responsible for the acts of an enemy attempting his life.
3. The revolutionists were beyond governmental control, and the Government can not be held responsible for injuries committed by those who have escaped its restraint.

Duffield, umpire, in the case of Kummerow v. Venezuela, before the German-Venezuelan Mixed Commission, late sitting in Caracas, concerning the late civil war in Venezuela, held as follows:<sup>b</sup>

From its outset it went beyond the power of the Government to control * * *. Under such circumstances it would be contrary to established principles of international law, and to justice and equity, to hold the Government responsible.

See decisions of Thornton, umpire, in the United States-Mexican Commission, Moore's International Arbitration, pages 2977-8-9-80. See the United States-Spanish Commission of 1871, Ib. pages 2981-2. See United States-Mexican Claims Commission of 1868, Ib. pages 2973, 2902, 2900. See also Ib. pages 2900-2901.

Such would be the position of the present claim if the claimant was allowed to be considered as one having suffered from the taking or seizure of his property and goods by force and against his will. This is the strongest position to which his claim can be assigned, and if in that position it is not well founded much less could it be when resting upon a basis of contract voluntarily entered into between him and those who as revolutionists had received his money and goods. As resting on such voluntary contract it would have no standing whatever before this Commission. Hence, in placing his claim for the purpose of investigation upon the same ground as though the property had been seized or forcibly taken, it is being considered from the best point of advantage possible to be given it.

A de facto government which would give this claim a position before this Commission must be one recognized as such for the Republic of Venezuela, and not one temporarily in authority in a State or district under revolution and against the will and purpose of the de jure and de facto government of the nation. Such a rule may work occasional hardship in the individual case, but it is the unvarying rule of international law, and taken as a whole works beneficially to the nation at large. Insurrections and revolutions are to be deplored, and the cases of especial hardship resulting within the territory subject to such conditions may call for sympathy, but they can have no right of compensation from the national treasury. Insurrections and revolutions more than all other forms of belligerency are always against the will of the constituted government and originate without its ability in any way to prevent them. To hold the Government responsible for the means by which its life is sought would be destructive of all governmental conditions.

Austin speaks of it [a government de facto] as one which presumably commands the habitual respect and obedience of the bulk of the people.

Halleck describes it as a government submitted to by the great body of the people and recognized by other States. (Halleck, p. 127.)

* * * * *

It has been held in England that the courts of that country will not take notice of a foreign government not recognized by the Government of Great Britain. (City of Berne v. Bank of England, 9 Ves., 347.)

The Supreme Court of the United States in noting the features by which a government de facto is to be discriminated, mentions as one of these, recognition by a foreign power. (Thorington v. Smith, 8 Wallace, p. 9.)

This power has been elsewhere styled the ruling—the “supreme power” of the country. (Nesbitt v. Lushington, 4 Term, 763.)
(See Moore's Int. Arb., pp. 3553-3554.)

While the government of General Rivera might have been a de facto government for certain municipal purposes within the State or District, when, for the time his was the supreme force he had power to compel respect and obedience, it lacked all of the characteristics of a de facto national government that could speak and act in the name of Venezuela.

The umpire holds concerning the responsibility of Venezuela for the acts of unsuccessful revolutionists that the Government of Venezuela is responsible to aliens, commorant or resident, for injuries they receive in its territory from insurgents or revolutionists whom the Government could control, and not otherwise. That the Government of Venezuela was negligent in a given case must be alleged and proved.

These are identical in principle with the one between Germany and Colombia of date 1892, which is here quoted:

It is also stipulated between the contracting parties that the German Government will not attempt to hold the Colombian Government responsible, unless there is due want of diligence on the part of the Colombian authorities or their agents, for the injuries, vexations, or exactions occasioned in time of insurrection or civil war to German subjects in the territory of Colombia, through rebels, or caused by savage tribes beyond the control of the Government.

The umpire allows the sum of 6,164 bolivars, which is the sum of 5,737.20 bolivars for which he holds the Government of Venezuela responsible, including interest for two years and six months at 3 per cent, and disallows the claim of 13,513.04 bolivars, and judgment may be entered accordingly.

BEMBELISTA CASE.

No compensation will be allowed for injuries received in the course of battle, and in the rightful and successful endeavor of the Government to repossess itself of one of its important towns.

It will always be presumed that the Government will be careful in the direction of the fire of the troops.

The general rule is that the bombardment of an open city is not admissible.

PLUMLEY, Umpire:

This case came to the umpire on the disagreement of the Commissioners.

This claim is founded upon injuries to the claimant's dwelling house, furniture, and ware service by the Government troops in the engagement which took place at Puerto Cabello on the 11th day of November, 1899, which damages the claimant estimates at 1,900 bolivars.

The proofs show that the house was situated about 12 meters distant from one of the intrenchments of that town, and that it sustained serious injuries by the bullets during the severe fight which resulted in the taking of said town by the Government forces under the command of Gen. Ramón Guerra, the town being defended by the troops under General Paredes. The proofs further show that this house was at one of the points where the attack upon the town had been most formidable.

There seems to be no question as to the facts being as alleged by the claimant, but these facts indisputably show that the injuries complained of were received at a time and under such conditions as to forbid any recovery from the Government by the claimant. His injuries were received in the course of battle and in the rightful and successful endeavor of the Government to repossess itself of one of its important towns and ports. The Government owed a duty to the claimant and to all the inhabitants of Puerto Cabello to become the government in fact of the town in question. And as their repossession of it was resisted by the troops then in charge it became the due course of war to take and carry the intrenchments of the town. It was the misfortune of the claimant that his building was so near to one of the principal intrenchments, where there was the most serious resistance, and the injuries occasioned his property were one of the ordinary incidents of battle. Had his property been situated in such a part of the town as was out of the line of the intrenchments and the usual and proper course of battle, the case would be different. There is always a presumption in favor of the Government that it will be reasonable and will not be reckless and careless, and in this case the facts proven prevent any possible removal of that presumption. The Government bullets were directed toward the place required to insure success, and that there was so far a misdirection of those bullets as to do harm to his property located in such close proximity was a mere accident attending the rightful performance of a solemn duty. The most careful inspection of the case shows nothing that puts this property within the list of exceptional instances, but rather they all place it in the immediate line of battle, and in the very track of flagrant war.

The rules laid down concerning bombardment, in article 32 of the Manual of the Institute of International Law, are in part as follows:

It is forbidden:

(a) To destroy private or public property if that destruction is not compelled by the imperious necessity of war.

(b) To attack and bombard localities which are not defended.

The destruction of these intrenchments and the carrying of the town by the Government troops were compelled by the imperious necessity of war. The intrenchments and the town were defended. The better rule seems to be that the bombardment of an open city—that is to say, one which is not defended by fortifications or other means of attack or resistance for immediate defense, or by detached forts situated in its proximity—for instance, at a maximum distance of 4 to 10 kilometers—is inadmissible in ordinary cases. But an unfortified town may be bombarded for the purpose of quelling armed resistance. Since this was a fortified town, of course the rule prohibiting bombardment in general does not apply, and if the bombardment of unfortified towns were permissible under the circumstances named, much more would it be true that towns intrenched, as was Puerto Cabello at the time complained of, might be attacked and bombarded without just cause of complaint.

It was held in Cleworth's case, American and British Claims Commission, Moore, 3675, that the value of a house destroyed in Vicksburg by shells thrown into the city by the United States forces during bombardment could not be recovered against the United States. This was the unanimous opinion of the Mixed Commission. So held in Dutrieux's case, Moore, 3702, Commission under convention between the United States and France, January 15, 1880. The claimant was the owner of two houses at Charleston, S. C. These houses were injured by shells striking them during the bombardment of that city by the United States. This case was carefully discussed and ably considered, and in the end the claim was disallowed.

In Lawrence on International Law, page 443, quoting from Brussel's Code, articles 15-17, Manual of the Institute of International Law articles 31-34, it is stated that—

Even in bombardments it is now deemed necessary to spare as far as possible churches, museums, and hospitals, and not to direct the artillery upon the quarters inhabited by civilians unless it is impossible to avoid them in firing at the fortifications and military buildings.

Lawrence, says, page 344:

But had the guns of the besiegers been deliberately turned upon the dwelling houses of the bombarded town, or had an open and undefended village been fired into, the person responsible for such proceedings would have been justly accused of barbarity forbidden by modern usage.

Wharton, volume 3, sec. 349, page 338, says:

The bombardment of unfortified towns is not permitted by the law of nations. (See Calvo, 3d ed., vol. ii, 137.) An exception to this rule is recognized in cases where the inhabitants of an unfortified city oppose by barricades and other hostile works, the entrance of the enemy's army, or wantonly proceed in the destruction of his property and refuse redress.

Lawrence's report, page 274:<sup>a</sup>

The American rule of international law was early adopted, that the Government was under no obligation to compensate its citizens for property destroyed or damages done in battle, or by necessary military operations in repelling an invading enemy.

No government, but for a special favor, has ever paid for property, even of its own citizens, destroyed in its own country, on attacking or defending itself against a common public enemy, much less is any government obliged to pay for property belonging to neutrals domiciled in the country of its enemy which may possibly be destroyed by its forces in their operations against such enemy. (Citing Perrin v. U. S., 4 C. Cls., 547.)

Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, said, in relation to a claim upon the United States by a French subject for property destroyed by the bombardment of Greytown, in July, 1854, that "the British Government, upon the advice of the law officers of the Crown, declared to Parliament its inability to prosecute similar claims. In 1857 Lord Palmerston applied the decision in the case of Greytown as a precedent for refusing compensation to British merchants whose property in a Russian port had been destroyed by a British squadron during the Crimean war. (See note in Lawrence's Wheaton, p. 145.)

"The governments of Austria and Russia have applied the doctrine involved in the Greytown case to the claims of British subjects injured by belligerent operations in Italy in 1849 and 1850. (See note p. 49, vol. 2, of Vattel, Guilaumin & Co.'s edition, 1863.)

"We have applied the same principle in declining to make reclamations for citizens of the United States whose property was destroyed in the bombardment of Valparaiso by a Spanish fleet, and in resisting the claims of subjects of neutral powers who sustained injury from our military operations in the Southern States during the recent rebellion. It will probably be found a sufficient answer to the reclamations of many of our citizens who have sustained losses from belligerent operations on both sides during the recent occupation of Mexico by French troops."

This is the rule recognized by Vattel, who says: "But there are other damages caused by inevitable necessity; as, for instance, the destruction caused by the artillery in retaking a town from the enemy. These are merely accidents. They are misfortunes which chance deals out to the proprietors on whom they happen to fall. * * * No action lies against the State for misfortunes of this nature, for losses which she has occasioned, not willfully but through necessity and by mere accident, in the exertion of her rights." (Vattel, book 3, ch. xv, sec. 232, p. 403.)

The umpire has made careful examination of nearly all of the international law text-books, and finds the principles herein laid down to receive their unqualified sanction. Hence he is compelled to say that in this case there is no just ground for complaint against the Venezuelan Government and no claim thereon arises because of the injuries received.

The claim is disallowed, and judgment may be entered accordingly.

SALAS CASE.

The Government of Venezuela is responsible to aliens, commorant or residents, for injuries they receive in its territory from insurgents whom the Government could control and not otherwise. That the Government of Venezuela was negligent in a given case must be alleged and proved.<sup>a</sup>

PLUMLEY, Umpire:

In this case the commissioners failed to agree and it came to the umpire for his decision.

The claimant is a Dutch subject resident at Barquisimeto. He claims an amount of 26,906 bolivars on account of damages upon his buildings and the personal property therein contained, which he sustained during the siege of Barquisimeto by the revolutionary troops under Gen. Luciano Mendoza in the month of June, 1902.

There seems to be no dispute concerning the facts, and they are substantially as follows: That the injuries and losses to the claimant occurred at the time when Barquisimeto was besieged by revolutionary forces; that during the besiegement the mercantile establishment of the claimant was occupied by these forces; the merchandise and furnishings of his store were taken and carried away by them, also a large deposit of stamps and national stamp paper, and the money in the drawer, as well as his account books, which were in the safe of said establishment, which safe was broken open; that starting from the partition wall between the house of the claimant and the one inhabited by one of the witnesses, and continuing up to the room where the office of Mr. Salas was kept, there were evident signs of walls and doors having been broken; the stands, wardrobes, and shelves of his lemonade factory were destroyed; the furniture generally broken; some excavations were made in the floor of the building, and there were places in the walls made to be used by the soldiery of the revolutionary army through which to fire their arms; all his mercantile stock and his machines for the manufacture of lemonade and gaseous waters were destroyed, and everything about the building was left in a decided ruin.

There is no claim that any injury was received to the buildings or property from the Government troops, which had been occupying the town, and which fought to maintain their possession thereof, but the proof is that all of the injury was caused by the voluntary acts of the revolutionary troops during their successful attack upon the city. As a result of this attack the Government troops were driven out of the city and the revolutionary forces were the victors and occupied the city for some time thereafter.

While the attack upon Barquisimeto was successful and the revolutionary party for the time became the dominant force in that immediate vicinity, the revolution itself was unsuccessful. There can be no question that the injuries were received from the hands of revolutionary soldiers, who for the time being and within that city were beyond the control of the Government. The Government in fact was defeated and was driven out of the city, so that in no way can it be held that they could have prevented these acts, and they can not be charged with a neglect of duty in not having done what they could not do.

The case comes clearly within the rule prescribed by the umpire in the case of J. N. Henriquez<sup>a</sup> (No. 1), concerning the responsibility of Venezuela for the acts of unsuccessful revolutionists:

That the Government of Venezuela is responsible to aliens, commorant or resident, for injuries they receive in its territory from insurgents or revolutionists whom the Government could control and not otherwise. That the Government of Venezuela was negligent in a given case must be alleged and proved.

The opinion of the umpire in the Henriquez case may be examined for the authorities there cited or quoted sustaining this proposition.

The claim is disallowed, and judgment may be entered accordingly.

EVERTSZ CASE.

By article II of the protocol the Commission is bound to receive and consider all evidence whether taken ex parte and without notice or not.<sup>b</sup>

The Venezuelan Government held liable to indemnify claimant for property taken for the maintenance of prisoners left on claimant's estate [an island] without claimant's permission and without food.

Damages awarded for the property taken or destroyed at the price fixed by claimant. Claimant had the right to fix any price not extortionate if property was taken without his consent.

PLUMLEY, Umpire:

This case came to the umpire for his consideration and decision upon the disagreement of the honorable commissioners.

Before entering upon the consideration of the case proper, it seems wise to look first at the contention of the learned agent for Venezuela, who objects that the testimony presented on the part of the claimant Government can not be accepted as proof of any fact because taken in foreign parts and ex parte. While testimony prepared in the absence of the other party, without giving them an opportunity to elucidate the facts by cross-examination, would not have the evidential force which it otherwise would have, and while testimony so taken without due and reasonable notice to the opposing party of the time and place of such taking might be refused admission into courts controlled by definitive or restrictive rules and statutes covering such matters, yet here it must be both received and considered, however adduced or obtained, in virtue of the specific provision in that regard found in article II of the Netherlands-Venezuelan protocol of February 28, 1903, which protocol is the perfect law of this tribunal. It is there stated:

* * * They shall be bound to receive and consider all written documents or statements which may be presented to them by or on behalf of the respective Governments in support of or in answer to any claim. * * *

The probative force of the testimony presented is for the tribunal to determine, but that it must be received and considered is settled in advance.

Having determined that the evidence must be considered and weighed, it is next to determine what facts are to be found therefrom. If the testimony introduced on behalf of the claimant were in any material part untrue, it concerns facts so lately within the knowledge of the respondent Government, and its opportunity for countervailing proof is apparently so perfect and immediate that the absence thereof is tantamount to the admission of the truth of the claimant's proof, and the umpire will deal with the case upon the assumption that the facts are as alleged.

It appears that the island of Orchila is a part of the territory of Colón, of the Republic of Venezuela; that in 1885 one Manuel Roblín assigned and transferred to Gen. Joaquín Crespo and Marco Julio Rivera the rights which he had previously acquired through a contract with the Venezuelan minister of fomento to burn lime and to raise cattle upon said island; that in August, 1890, Rivera ceded all his rights in the same to General Crespo, and, that on February 3, 1897, General Crespo sold outright to the claimant the cattle and dwelling house on said island and transferred to the claimant his usufructuary interest in said island for the term of fifteen years. These facts being admitted, it is not important to the determination of the questions here involved to study the especial terms of the original contract. It is enough for the umpire to know, what he finds to be true, that at the time of the happening of the events complained of the claimant was the lawful owner of the cattle and the boat in question and was in rightful and actual possession of the island.

Through the fortunes of war the respondent Government in January, 1902, found itself with certain military prisoners under its charge and within its control; through the fears or necessity of the respondent Government it had also in its control the persons of several of its citizens whom it deemed necessary to hold to insure its safety or welfare.

In accordance with what the umpire must assume was the wisdom of the respondent Government, it entered upon the deportation of these persons to the island of Orchila. As these persons were left on this island without any means of maintenance provided by the Government, it can not for a moment be assumed that the respondent Government was unaware of the fact that out of the cattle of the claimant they could obtain sustenance. Any other assumption is too contrary to the claims of humanity under the sway of christian civilization to be entertained. That their presence might be injurious otherwise to the rights of the claimant must have been in the mind of the respondent Government. There is no other rightful view of this act apparent to the umpire than that under the stress of its peculiar circumstances it decided to do as it did in full view of all the facts known and in full expectation of meeting and canceling all the obligations and consequences which might naturally flow from its acts.

As the case stands, the respondent Government must be held liable for the loss occasioned the claimant through the coast guard of the island of Orchila by the seizure and confiscation of the sloop of the claimant.

There is no suggestion by the learned agent for the respondent Government that the indemnity claimed is excessive, and since the claimant had no voice concerning the coming of these persons on to his estate and had no alternative in permitting his property to be taken for their maintenance, and since he was given no chance to decide concerning the taking and the selling of his boat, it is eminently just that he should name any price not extortionate for the losses incurred by him through the acts of the authorities of the respondent Government.

The umpire therefore finds for the claimant in the sum of $1,200 in the gold coin of the United States of America, or its equivalent in silver at the rate of exchange at the time of payment, and judgment may be entered accordingly.

BAASCH & RÖMER CASE.

The jurisdiction of an international claims commission over the claims of a corporation is controlled by the nationality of the corporation and not by the nationality of the stockholders.<sup>a</sup>

Interest at the legal rate in Venezuela allowed on claims after the expiration of one year from the time that the Government is presumed to have had notice of them.

PLUMLEY, Umpire:

Messrs. Baasch & Römer, claimants, are successors of Messrs. Leseur, Römer & Co., which firm was composed of J. R. Leseur, M. A. Römer, H. A. Leseur, and E. Baasch. It is alleged and proven that the first three are Dutch subjects.

The claimants are liquidators of the firm of Leseur, Römer & Baasch, which firm was composed of J. R. Leseur, M. A. Römer, H. A. Leseur, H. G. Römer, O. Baasch, and O. E. Römer. It is alleged and proven that the first four are Dutch subjects.

On behalf of Leseur, Römer & Co. accounts against the respondent Government are set down as follows, viz:

July 7, 1892. Order No. 578, for 1,680 bolivars, drawn by the governor of the Federal District against the municipal revenues for wool stuff. The order states that it is by the authority of the President of the Republic and is for war uses. Frequent demands are asserted, but no payment made. Interest at 8 per cent is claimed. It is allowed with interest at 3 per cent after one year, amounting to 2,208.36 bolivars. As three-fourths of the firm are proven to be of Dutch nationality this item is allowed to the claimants at 1,656.27 bolivars.

<sup>a</sup>This subject of the nationality of legal persons is at large discussed in an article by P. The subject is discussed under the following headlines, with the citations indicated:

II. Nationality of corporations—systems proposed—how is such nationality determined?

First system. The corporation takes its nationality from the state which authorizes its existence, citing—

Second system. The nationality of the corporation is determined by that of the country within whose jurisdiction it is constituted, citing—

VII. Nationality of associations and endowments, saying—

La cour de cassation de Rome a eu l'occasion de proclamer dans un arrêt cité par le Journal de droit international privé, 1890, p. 739, "Qu'un ordre religieux, présentant-il un caractère d'universalité, comme celui des Jésuites, ne pouvait être, au point de vue des rapports de droit civil, considéré et traité comme constituant une personne morale universelle. * * * Par suite, pour tout ce qui concerne l'acquisition ou la possession des biens, l'ordre des Jésuites se résout en autant de personnalités juridiques qu'il y a d'États dans lesquels il est reconnu." Geouffre de la Pradelle, des fondations (thèse), p. 8. L'auteur justifie par de solides raisons ce procédé "plus terne, moins pittoresque, que le second," mais, selon lui, plus simple, plus pratique, plus respectueux de la réalité. Les expériences, faites depuis quelques années semblent pourtant lui donner tort. Bien des fondations indépendantes de toute association fonctionnent actuellement en France et y donnent d'excellents résultats. Saleilles, Étude sur la théorie de l'obligation, 2<sup>e</sup> édition, p. 151. (Voir le code civil allemand, art. 80-83.) Truchy, Des fondations (thèse), p. 159. A parler rigoureusement, ni le trust ni le ouak n'ont une véritable personnalité juridique. Ils n'en forment pas moins l'un et l'autre un ensemble de biens distinct du "moins du nazir ou de celui du trustee, et indépendant des changements subis par la personnalité individuelle.

army May 10, 1892, under direction of its commander, and the bill vouched by him, and its payment ordered. The umpire understands that the army is national, not of the State, and hence he holds this claim properly chargeable to the National Government. Interest is demanded at 8 per cent, and is allowed at 3 per cent after May 10, 1893. He assumes that this claim was reported to the Government by the commander, as was his official duty to do, and the Government is allowed one year as a reasonable time in which to make payment. It amounts to 1,828.05 bolívares. The claim is allowed for three-fourths of the foregoing, which is 1,371.04 bolívares.

The claimants are also liquidators of the extinct firm of Leseur, Römer & Baasch, which firm was composed of J. R. Leseur, M. A. Römer, H. A. Leseur, H. G. Römer, O. Baasch, and O. E. Römer.

It is alleged and proven that the first four are Dutch subjects.

The first item is for a document termed a bond issued by General Aquilino Juarez March 22, 1898, for 3,000 bolívares in recognition of a payment made to him by the extinct firm on account of the military necessities of the National Government. The document is proved and brought in to the Commission by the claimants. Interest is claimed at 8 per cent, and is allowed at 3 per cent after March 22, 1899. The same reasons apply here as in the last sum allowed and need not be repeated. It amounts to 3,429.75 bolívares. It is allowed at two-thirds of this amount, which is 2,286.50 bolívares.

A claim of 1,910 bolívares, based on an order of General Diego Bta. Ferrer, minister of war and marine, of date September 27, 1899, on the ministry of finance, for cash supplied by the extinct firm to General Juarez to ration the forces of the Government garrisoned at Barquisimeto. The order is produced and is in the hands of the Commission. Interest is claimed at 8 per cent, and is allowed at 3 per cent from its date, it being regarded by the umpire as a debt of which the financial department of the Government undoubtedly had immediate notice through the proper channels, and being also for cash, which relieved the Treasury of just so much of its burden. Interest, therefore, should begin at once. It amounts to 2,354.14 bolívares. It is allowed at two-thirds that amount, which is 1,436.08 bolívares.

A claim of 2,200 bolívares, based on a certificate issued by the board for the examination and qualification of credits, approved by the minister of finance, of date July 26, 1901. The certificate is produced and is in the hands of the Commission. Interest at 8 per cent is claimed, but interest is allowed at 3 per cent from its date, for the same reason as named in the last claim. It amounts to 2,354.96 bolívares. It is allowed at two-thirds of that amount, which is 1,569.96 bolívares.

A claim for the practical destruction of the plant of the Luz Eléctrica de Barquisimeto Company, a corporation with a paid-up capital of 240,000 bolívares, by troops in command of General Freites. The extinct firm of Leseur, Römer & Baasch held capital stock to the amount of 26,800 bolívares. The destruction of the plant bankrupted the company and they claim to recover for the full amount of the shares. It is not necessary to consider this claim further than to accede to the position taken by the learned agent of the respondent Government. It is a Venezuelan corporation created and existing under and by virtue of Venezuelan law and has its domicile in Venezuela. This Mixed Commission has no jurisdiction over the claim. It is the corporation whose property was injured. It may have a rightful claim before Venezuelan courts, but it has no standing here. The shareholders being Dutch does not affect the question. The nationality of the corporation is the sole matter to be considered. This claim is therefore dismissed without prejudice.

The umpire holds for the purposes of this case that the two firms being extinct the claims may be allowed in proportion to the stated interest of the Dutch members thereof. He does this the more readily because there seems to be no question about the indebtedness of the National Government, and it at most means a payment in this way instead of some other and will be a cancellation of its indebtedness pro tanto, which indebtedness it must discharge in some manner. No inequity or injustice is therefore done, even if a technical mistake has been made.

JACOB M. HENRIQUEZ CASE.

Claim dismissed for want of proof of nationality of other members of the firm and their respective interests therein.

Where in a pleading the respondent Government sets out that a firm is of Venezuelan origin and domicile, and no contradiction is interposed by the claimant Government, the claim will be dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

A government will not be held responsible for the wanton, reckless acts of unofficered troops.<sup>a</sup>

PLUMLEY, Umpire:

Upon the disagreement of the honorable commissioners this case came to the umpire for his consideration and determination.

This claimant appears before this Commission as a late member of the extinct firm of Jacob M. Henriquez & Co., merchants at Maracaibo, and asks compensation for the sacking of a store, by Government troops, belonging to said merchants in the parish of Nueva Era, in the jurisdiction of Betijogue, in the State of Trujillo. The sacking is alleged to have occurred on the 25th of August, 1899, by forces forming a part of the army commanded by Gen. Antonio Fernandez while the said troops were in possession and occupancy of the store building of these merchants, which occurred during the time that the troops were passing through the place. The goods were ironware, kept for the purposes of wholesale, and in addition to the sacking of the store it is claimed that the troops tore down the inclosure of the yard and broke down the interior doors of the building, and that such goods as they did not take they left in ruin.

A careful examination of the proof offered does not disclose that any of this ironware was of such character as to be useful to the Government troops while en route or in garrison.

The nationality of Jacob M. Henriquez is fully established as being a Dutch subject, but no proof is offered of the nationality of the other members which comprised the firm or association prior to its extinction. Neither is there any proof offered nor any suggestion made as to the respective interests of the members constituting said firm or association, prior to its extinction, or subsequent thereto. No proof is offered and no claim, in terms, is made that the claimant is the lawful owner of all the rights of action, credits, and properties of said extinct firm or association. No proof is offered or claim made that the possession and occupancy of said store building was with the knowledge or in the presence or by command of the officers of the Government army. So far as the facts are stated it would appear more to be an unauthorized sacking and looting of the merchandise of the store than of any taking of the goods for the purposes and uses of the army by direction and through the approval of the Government officers. There is no proof that the injuries done to the building were in consequence of, or as an incident to, the occupancy of said building as a place of rendezvous under official orders, but it has more the appearance of reckless and undirected action of ungoverned soldiery.

Both the learned agent for the respondent Government and the honorable commissioner thereof assert as lawyers, and the latter with the added responsibility of his oath as such commissioner, that this association, or partnership, or mercantile establishment, by whatever name it may be called, was in fact and law, by virtue of the Venezuelan code governing such associations and establishments, of Venezuelan origin and domicile; that it is therefore not a Dutch citizen or subject, but Venezuelan, and hence this Commission has no jurisdiction over it or any claim which it may present or which may be presented for it. This claim of the Venezuelan Government, first appearing in due course through the answer of the learned agent, being subjected to the scrutiny and inspection of the learned agent for the claimant Government, was neither answered nor denied, but instead the said learned agent for the claimant Government renounced his right to make a reply thereto. Since this jurisdictional position of the learned agent for Venezuela is neither answered nor denied by the learned agent for the claimant Government, whose duty it was to make such denial or answer if such jurisdictional position was not properly taken, it is proper that the umpire should assume that it is not susceptible of answer or denial and is to be taken as in effect admitted. It is also true that it would be impossible for the umpire, under the facts stated by the claimant in his own declaration and in his proof, to award the claimant the whole of any sum which he might adjudge proper, and if not the whole then for the same want of proof the umpire could make no sensible division of said sum. If the contention of the respondent Government is to prevail, then the umpire has no jurisdiction over the question presented. If all these legal questions were susceptible of solution favorable to the claim of Mr. Henriquez, there is still left the fact that on the proof it is impossible to say that the goods taken and the injury done to the property of the claimant was done under such circumstances as to entitle the claimant to an award. Since either one of these contentions being resolved in favor of the respondent Government would be a sufficient answer to the claim and an explicit denial of an award, it is the opinion of the umpire that this claim must be disallowed, and such may be the judgment entered.

ARENDS CASE

A government may bring to port vessel found within its territorial waters in order that a thorough investigation may be made concerning the ship, but in so doing the government is obliged to treat the master and crew with consideration and complete the investigation promptly.

PLUMLEY, Umpire:

Upon the disagreement of the honorable commissioners this case came to the umpire for his determination:

The salient facts succinctly stated are these: The claimant is a Dutch subject and a resident of the island of Aruba; that in March, 1897, he was the owner of the Dutch schooner Jupiter, Capt. Arnodus Rees. On the 15th of that month the captain, with five fishermen and a cook, left the port of Paardenbaer, of the island of Aruba, provided with a fishing permit on the high seas, in a westerly course from the island. They arrived at their destination and entered upon their purpose, but on the 19th, the Friday following, they found that the staves of one of their principal water casks had been broken and nearly all the water had leaked, and they had only two small barrels of water left. Not daring to remain longer on the high seas with so small a quantity of water, they set sail to return to the island of Aruba. After having unsuccessfully tacked during one day northwest of the island, on Saturday, the 20th of March, they sailed toward the south with the hope of finding better seas in which to navigate and the sooner reach their island. At about 11 o'clock of that night, while they were sailing toward the south, they were detained by the Venezuelan man-of-war Mariscal de Ayacucho in Venezuelan waters. The commander of the war vessel finding this ship in Venezuelan waters with nothing but a fishing permit for a different part of the seas determined, notwithstanding the explanation of the captain, to take the vessel in tow to La Vela de Coro, in the Republic of Venezuela, where they arrived at about 2 o'clock in the afternoon of the 22d of March. After their arrival at this port the captain was taken before the customs-house principal office at La Vela de Coro to be interrogated. Subsequently he was ordered not to leave the town and not to communicate with his vessel. It was on Wednesday following that the captain and the crew were all taken before the judge and there interrogated, after which they were given their liberty and permitted to return on board and to land their fish. On request of the captain the judge allowed him to sail out of the port on his giving surety for his ship, which he obtained. His official permit for fishing was not returned to him, although he asked for it, but he was given a document signed and sealed according to which he could sail without any objection. It appears that the water on board the Jupiter was all exhausted about 11 o'clock on the morning of the 22d; that the crew asked the customs guard left on board for some water, but it was not given them, and it was not until Tuesday morning—the next day—that another ship provided them with some water.

The owner of the ship claims 5,000 bolivars for the unlawful seizure and detention of his ship and of the crew and captain.

It is the opinion of the umpire that the captain was justified in taking the course he did in sailing south for better waters in which to navigate and the sooner return to the island of Aruba on account of the shortness of water, but that the misadventure of sailing into Venezuelan waters justified the commander of the man-of-war in making the investigation that he did; and on finding a ship in the waters of his country with no other reasons than those given and with only a fishing permit for another part of the sea, there was sufficient cause for him to take the ship in tow to the port where there was competent authority under Venezuelan law to interrogate the captain and his crew, examine their papers, and determine whether the ship was innocent in the waters of that country. This view of the case is especially enhanced by the well-known conditions concerning smuggling existing between the Dutch West Indies and the country of Venezuela, and the consequent increased care and caution necessary for an efficient execution of the duties of the officials whose duties are to prevent such offensive operations against the revenues of Venezuela. But it seems to the umpire that too long a time elapsed between the arrival of the ship in the port and the hearing of its officer and men and the examination of its papers. Arrived at 2 o'clock on the afternoon of the 22d, the examination might well have been had, the vessel relieved of its necessities in the way of water, and allowed to sail that same night. It was in fact detained without any explanation for such lapse of time until the 24th.

The treatment of the crew, who were refused their petition for water by the officer left in charge of their boat, is also an element proper to be considered, and by no inaction on the part of the Venezuelan authorities should they have been allowed to remain without water for about two days. This conduct is contrary to that spirit of commerce and amity which should exist between the two nations and their respective citizens under circumstances where the one is perforce dependent upon the action of the other. While the delay attendant upon the tow of the ship Jupiter, nearly two days, that they might explain its presence in Venezuelan waters was a necessary hardship following the misadventure to the captain of getting within those waters, although unintentionally, it was the duty of the officers in charge of the port having those matters in hand to give their immediate attention to this matter, and any delays beyond the necessary time for the conclusion of their labors was an unlawful detention of the vessel. The damages consequent upon the detention of this vessel are necessarily small, but it is the belief of the umpire that the respondent Government is willing to recognize its responsibility for the untoward act of its officers under such circumstances and to express to the sovereign and sister State, with which it is on terms of friendship and commerce, its regret for such acts in the only way that it can now be done, which is through the action of this Commission by an award on behalf of the claimant sufficient to make full amends for the unlawful delay.

In the opinion of the umpire this sum may be expressed in the sum of $100 in gold coin of the United States of America, or its equivalent in silver, at the current rate of exchange at the time of payment. and judgment may be entered for that amount.

MAAL CASE.

Every government has the right to exclude or expel foreigners from its territory if they are prejudicial to public order or the welfare of the state. <sup>a</sup>

Expulsion of a foreigner is justifiable only when his presence is detrimental to the welfare of the state, and when it is resorted to it must be accomplished with due regard to the convenience and personal and property interests of the person expelled.

The Government of Venezuela must stand sponsor for the acts of its officers no matter how odious these acts may be, and in the event that it is not shown that officers committing unwarranted offenses in the exercise of their duty have been reprimanded, punished, or discharged the Government will be condemned to pay a fitting indemnity to the person injured.

PLUMLEY, Umpire:

On the disagreement of the honorable commissioners this case came to the umpire for his consideration and determination.

The salient facts are that the claimant at the time of the happening of these events was a commercial traveler representing important houses in the United States of America and in Europe; that in the prosecution of his business he left Curaçao on the 9th of June, 1899, on the Red "D" Line steamship Caracas, bound for La Guaira and thence to the city of Caracas, there to attend to his duties as such commercial traveler. On the 10th of June he arrived at the port of La Guaira; had disembarked from the steamship Caracas and was about to enter the train for the city of Caracas when he was accosted by a Venezuelan citizen, who informed him that he was under arrest and that he must go with him to the port; that he was accompanied also by armed police. His trunks and baggage were opened and examined in the minutest detail. While thus under arrest he was subjected to the indignity of being stripped of all his clothing and made the subject of much mirth and laughter on the part of the bystanders; that he was later taken by order of the customs administrator to the civil chief of that city, who, after communicating by telephone with the President of the Republic, informed the claimant that he was suspected of being a conspirator against the Government of Venezuela and in the interest of revolutionists, and that he must at once reembark and leave the country of Venezuela not to return, and was conducted by this same posse to the steamship Caracas, where after much solicitation he was permitted to enter for his return trip to Curaçao. He claims large damages because of his arrest, the indignities which he suffered, and the delay which it brought about in his anticipated trip to Europe in the prosecution of his business enterprises, causing him the loss of much money. He denied at the time all connection with revolutionary matters incident to Venezuela and protested that he was utterly indifferent to the political conditions of this country. He makes full proof of his Holland citizenship, and the case is properly within the jurisdiction of this tribunal.

Notwithstanding the objections of the learned agent for Venezuela, the umpire has found these facts from the testimony submitted by the claimant, and for the reasons governing him in so finding, he refers to his opinion delivered before this Commission in the claim of Carel de Haseth Evertsz, No. 12.<sup>b</sup>

There is no question in the mind of the umpire that the Government of Venezuela in a proper and lawful manner may exclude, or if need be, expel persons dangerous to the welfare of the country, and may exercise large discretionary powers in this regard. Countries differ in their methods and means by which these matters are accomplished, but the right is inherent in all sovereign powers and is one of the attributes of sovereignty, since it exercises it rightfully only in a proper defense of the country from some danger anticipated or actual.

This Government could never give up the right of excluding foreigners whose presence they might deem a source of danger to the United States. (Mr. Everett, Sec. of State, to Mr. Mann, Dec. 13, 1852.) Wharton's Int. Law Dig., vol. 2, sec. 206, p. 516.

Every society possesses the undoubted right to determine who shall compose its members, and it is exercised by all nations both in peace and war. A memorable example of the exercise of this power in time of peace was the passage of the alien law of the United States in the year 1798. (Mr. Marcy, Sec. of State, to Mr. Fay, Mar. 22, 1856.) Ibid.

It may always be questionable whether a resort to this power is warranted by the circumstances, or what department of the Government is empowered to exert it; but there can be no doubt that it is possessed by all nations, and that each may decide for itself when the occasion arises demanding its exercise. (Supra, p. 517.)

This Government can not contest the right of foreign Governments to exclude, on police or other grounds, American citizens from their shores. (Mr. Frelinghuysen, Sec. of State, to Mr. Stillman, Aug. 3, 1882.) (Supra, p. 520.)

The umpire understands that by the laws, organic and civil, of Venezuela this power is lodged in the hands of the chief executive, who, acting under the methods laid down may expel one who is a menace to the Republic, if not domiciled by a two years' residence. It is historic that the date of this exclusion from Venezuela was within that period of Venezuela's national life when there were more than the ordinary hazards to the country from revolutionary actions and conspiracies, and it was undoubtedly necessary that the national Government should be on the alert to protect itself against such evils; and had the exclusion of the claimant been accomplished in a rightful manner without unnecessary indignity or hardship to him the umpire would feel constrained to disallow the claim.

The modern theory and the practice of Christian nations is believed to be founded on the principle that the expulsion of a foreigner is justified only when his presence is detrimental to the welfare of the State, and that when expulsion is resorted to as an extreme police measure it is to be accomplished with due regard to the convenience and the personal and property interests of the person expelled. (Sec. Olney in Hollander case in U. S. For. Rel. for 1895, p. 776; and also see page 801 same volume; these citations to be found in sec. 206, vol. 2, Wharton's Int. Law Dig.)

This is his grievance, and as to this I have to say that on general principles it is within the power of the German Government to make and enforce such a decree of expulsion, nor can this Government object, unless the exclusion be enforced with undue harshness. (Mr. Bayard, Sec. of State, to Mr. Pendleton, July 9, 1885.) Wharton's Int. Law Dig., vol. 2, p. 525, sec. 206.

Great Britain in 11th and 12th Vict. c. 20, and by Executive order in the United States, 19 Aug., 1861, during times in both countries of peculiar stress and danger, authority was given to exclude and to remove aliens and to require passports. (See supra, p. 528.)

There was no possible occasion for the public stripping, or private stripping in fact, of the claimant. It was not for the protection of Venezuela that he was compelled to suffer this indignity to his person and to his feelings. From all the proof he came here as a gentleman and was entitled throughout his examination and deportation to be treated as a gentleman, and whether we are to consider him as a gentleman or simply as a man his right to his own person and to his own undisturbed sensibilities is one of the first rights of freedom and one of the priceless privileges of liberty. The umpire has been taught to regard the person of another as something to be held sacred, and that it could not be touched even in the lightest manner, in anger or without cause, against his consent, and if so done it is considered an assault for which damages must be given commensurate with the spirit and the character of the assault and the quality of the manhood represented in the individual thus assaulted. The umpire acquits the high authorities of the Government from any other purpose or thought than the mere exclusion of one regarded dangerous to the welfare of the Government, but the acts of their subordinates in the line of their authority, however odious their acts may be, the Government must stand sponsor for. And since there is no proof or suggestion that those in discharge of this important duty of the Government of Venezuela have been reprimanded, punished or discharged, the only way in which there can be an expression of regret on the part of the Government and a discharge of its duty toward the subject of a sovereign and a friendly State is by making an indemnity therefor in the way of money compensation. This must be of a sufficient sum to express its appreciation of the indignity practiced upon this subject and its high desire to fully discharge such obligation.

In the opinion of the umpire the respondent Government should be held to pay the claimant Government in the interest of and on behalf of the claimant, solely because of these indignities the sum of five hundred dollars in gold coin of the United States of America, or its equivalent in silver at the current rate of exchange at the time of payment; and judgment may be entered accordingly.

OPINIONS IN THE SPANISH-VENEZUELAN COMMISSION.*EXTENSION OF TIME FOR SUBMISSION OF CLAIMS.

Under the terms of the protocol no general extension can be allowed for the presentation of claims; but on cause shown any particular claim may be admitted for consideration and decision for ninety days after the time set for its presentation under the protocol.

GUTIERREZ-OTERO, Umpire:

The umpire, having examined and reached a decision concerning the point on which the Commissioners have disagreed, relative to the extension of time which the Legation of His Catholic Majesty in Venezuela demands for the presentation of claims of Spanish subjects to this Mixed Commission;

Has decided that a general decision, which would permit the presentation of any claim without exception after thirty days, and during the three months additional, to which the second clause of the protocol refers, would not be compatible with a true interpretation of the protocol in question;

Nor could the decision be made limiting its effects to claimants who reside in the State or territory of Venezuela where a difficulty or lack of communication exists, which is considered sufficient to prevent their presentation during the first thirty days, since there is no reliable information upon which to base such a finding; besides this means might not always be in accord with absolute equity, which ought to control the decisions of the Commission.

But as equity demands—and it is universally recognized as justice—that the length of time granted for the exercise of a right should be sufficient and should be properly taken advantage of by the interested parties, it is certain, that in accordance with the proper interpretation of the protocol and the motive of its execution, the Commission may receive during the three additional months mentioned in the article already cited, claims which could not have been presented during the first thirty days, provided that in the judgment of the commissioners, or of the umpire, as the case may be, it is shown that a sufficient cause for not having made prompt presentation existed;

And thus the umpire decides this question which has arisen and been submitted for his determination.

ESTEVE'S CASE.

Spanish nationality of claimant may be shown by production of certificate from consulate of Spain showing that claimant is enrolled on register of Spanish citizens resident in Venezuela.

GUTIERREZ-OTERO, Umpire:

In the record of the claim which Miguel Esteves presents, claiming to be a Spanish subject, and demanding payment for various merchandise and animals which he asserts were taken by revolutionary and government forces during the civil war which terminated in the year 1900, a preliminary question, not decided by the commissioners, has arisen because the Commissioner of Venezuela is of opinion that said claim is not admissible, inasmuch as the claimant has not presented his certificate of naturalization, and it appears in the record that he is a native of Tetuan, a city of Morocco.

The Commissioner of Spain holds that, having a certificate of Spanish nationality, as appears by the certificate in evidence coming from the Spanish Legation, and in which it is stated that Esteves is enrolled upon the register of nationality of the vice-consulate in Villa de Cura, he is entitled to claim as a Spaniard. Because of a disagreement, the question has been submitted to the decision of the umpire.

It is not denied by the Commissioner of Venezuela that, although Esteves may be a native of Morocco, he could have acquired Spanish nationality, but he limits himself to claiming the necessity of the presentation of the document, which directly and originally evidenced this change of nationality, believing, no doubt, that by this means only it could be proved that said Esteves can rightly avail himself of the provisions of the protocol of April 2 of this year, signed at Washington by the representatives of Spain and Venezuela, relative to claims which Spanish subjects should make against this latter Republic.

In deciding if this necessity exists, the umpire has taken into account the following considerations:

It is a principle that it is the province of the internal legislation of States to declare or concede nationality to the individuals who form them, establishing the means by which it may be acquired, preserved or lost, and the manner that said States shall consider the character of their nationals as fixed.

The Spanish law, in article 26 of the civil code, provides that Spaniards who transfer their domiciles to foreign countries are under obligation to prove in every case that they have preserved their nationality, and so declare to the Spanish diplomatic or consular agent, who shall be obliged to enroll them, as well as their wives, if they be married, and their children, if they have any, in the register of Spanish residents.

The Spanish law, in articles 26 and 32 of the consular regulations, also provides that it is an attribute of Spanish consuls in foreign countries to grant letters of residence or security to their nationals, and it charges them with the duty of making a register of the Spanish residents in the district.

The enrollment in this list or register puts the party inscribed in it in possession of a letter which proves his nationality, and the letters with which Spanish residents in the Republic of Venezuela are provided, granted by the legation in the exercises of its powers as consulate-general which are united in it, or by their consulates and viceconsulates in the exercise of the faculties which ordinarily belong to them, prove that the holder of one of these letters is a subject of Spain, to which the protocol of May 30, 1845, made by the above-named powers, refers.

Thus it is that the enrollment and the letter mentioned constitute proof of nationality, which can give way only to a more convincing proof to the contrary, which has not been attempted, nor made in the present case.

To these considerations strictly of a juridic nature to which said case belongs, others of admitted equity are joined which serve to support the idea of the sufficiency of this proof, since, on the one hand, certificates of enrollment have been considered sufficient by the decisions of this Mixed Commission to prove Spanish nationality, and, on the other hand, the umpire has diligently inquired concerning the manner in which such inscriptions are made in the register of the Spanish consular offices and has learned that they are not made unless the interested parties also produce proof of their character as subjects in the Kingdom of Spain. This last is in accord with the terms of the treaty of 1845,<sup>a</sup> already cited, in which it was provided as an indispensable requisite for the conservation of their nationality that Spaniards who at that time desired to reacquire it, as well as those who in the future might migrate to Venezuela, should have themselves inscribed in the consular register.

Finally, it must be considered:

First. That as a general rule and in the same manner as provided for Spanish consuls those of all nations are charged with the keeping of a register of their nationals.

Second. That even though it be true that the claimant, Miguel Esteves, stated in writing, which he executed before the judicial authority of Zamora, that he was a native of Tetuan, in the same document he began by stating that he was a Spanish subject and he continued to designate himself thus in all his proceedings without giving rise to any motive to suppose, all things being equitably considered, that the faith placed in his statement concerning his original origin by birth should contradict his statement relative to the nationality which he enjoys.

For these reasons the umpire decides that the claim of Miguel Esteves is to be admitted as one of a Spanish subject, and that the record should therefore be returned to the consideration of the commissioners, that they may consider it on the merits.

PADRÓN CASE.

It is an accepted principle of international law that States are not responsible to aliens resident in their territory for damages and injuries inflicted upon them by persons in revolt against the constituted authorities.<sup>b</sup>

This principle if invoked before a court of absolute equity becomes a technical objection which is expressly barred by the terms of the protocol.

The fact that this principle was expressly agreed to by both Venezuela and Spain for all future claims in a treaty of 1871 does not bind Spain and Venezuela so as to prevent them from entering into a new agreement waiving this stipulation.

In the absence of express stipulations in the protocol an arbitral court must decide according to the accepted principles of international law; but a tribunal called upon to decide on a basis of absolute equity renders judgment in accordance with the conscience of the arbitrators.

GUTIERREZ-OTERO, Umpire:

With respect to record No. 4, made up by the claim of the Spanish subject María García de Padrón, in whose favor payment of 1,300 bolivars is demanded, to indemnify her for the price of the rent of her house in Naguayá occupied by the forces of the Government, and those of the revolution, from the month of September, 1899, to May, 1900; for the sum which she expended in repairing it on account of the damages which the occupants caused it; and the value of a shed destroyed by them, the commissioners because of difference of opinion have pronounced no judgment, and therefore the decision of the case has been left to the umpire.

The Venezuelan Commissioner has declared in his opinion relative thereto that he absolutely disallows the claim, and the Spanish Commissioner has stated that, in his opinion, the Government of Venezuela ought to be held responsible for the damages caused by the revolution and that the claimant has a right to the amount that she demands.

In the written memoranda<sup>a</sup> which the Commissioners have made to support their opinions, are explained the absolute opinion given by the Venezuelan Commissioner supporting the principle of irresponsibility of States for acts done by troops, or bands in rebellion against, or separated, in any way from, obedience to the constituted authorities; and on his part, the Spanish Commissioner holds that responsibility of States is not avoided by reason of internal or external changes, that it extends to injuries caused by political factions that strive to acquire power; and that if the Spanish subjects in Venezuela were not protected by indemnity for damages which the revolution has caused them, they would be in an oppressive position, and at the mercy of the misfortunes that it caused them, without resources on the one hand to prevent them, and on the other without a right to recover therefor.

This manner of arguing shows how the commissioners have forced the issue and drawn it into a state of absolute difference of opinion, indicated by the Venezuelan Commissioner in contending that States are not responsible for damages which insurgents cause foreigners, and in deducing from this statement or general rule that the claim made in this particular case should be disallowed.

And the strictness of the principle which has been brought out in its application by the one invoking it, has been followed to such a point that he has not taken into account for the purpose of making a distinction the circumstance which the claimant alleges, and concerning which she produced proofs, that the damages were caused her not only by forces of the revolution, but also by those of the Government; and concerning this point, the Commissioner of Venezuela claims that the extreme vagueness of the expression troops of the Government, which is used, makes it impossible to determine if regular forces are meant whose acts could affect the responsibility of the nation.

Thus the decision asked of the umpire has been understood to be with respect to this particular case of which we are treating, whether as a consequence of the application of the general principle which the Venezuelan Commissioner cites, who, in order to strengthen it and show that practically it has been accepted in the relations of his nation with Spain, refers to the convention of 1861,<sup>a</sup> made by both powers concerning some Spanish claims; and in which it was agreed that Spanish subjects injured by revolutions are obliged to prove the negligence of the constituted authorities in the adoption of the proper measures to protect their interests and persons, or to punish or reprimand those at fault; and that this provision, and the others that the convention contains, shall serve as invariable rules after it may be formally and explicitly ratified in the pending negotiations and those that may arise in the future.

The umpire will endeavor to render his judgment clearly and minutely, giving scrupulous attention to the important nature of said points, and the others he may have to touch on.

It is true that, with respect to international law, it is admitted that it embraces certain principles and rules, deduced more or less from its various aspects, but as Calvo remarks (preface to fifth edition, q. v):

Il n'existe point de code universel applicable aux questions et aux conflits de toute nature qui surgissent entre les Etats. Cette absence de loi suprême, de règle commune, est la source de nombreuses hésitations parmi les publicistes, de contradictions infinies dans la jurisprudence et la pratique des peuples, de désaccords sans cesse renouvelés dans les relations internationales, qui, n'obéissant point à des principes nettement définis et invariables, s'inspirent quelquefois plutôt de l'arbitraire que de la justice, de la force que de l'action du droit.

The same author remarks how difficult, if not impossible, it is to give a complete definition of international law, among other reasons because its signification changes or is modified according to the advances of civilization, which is what has suggested to Wheaton the following very general formula:

International law, as understood among civilized nations, may be defined as consisting of those rules of conduct, which reason deduces, as consonant to justice, from the nature of the society existing among independent nations; with such definitions and modifications as may be established by general consent. (Boyd's Wheaton, sec. 14, p. 22.)

It is unquestionable that this lack of a universal code common to all nations, and the necessity of deducing the principles and rules of international law from the various sources which constitute their origin, impress upon these principles and rules, as expounded and considered, be it by the states themselves in the relations of their governments; be it by local or international tribunals when they resolve questions of this sort; be it by the publicists in designating and explaining them, converting them into a doctrine; not the character of a written law, which no one has the power to give them, but necessarily the exclusive character of technical or scientific conclusions, rationally founded, capable of more or less contradiction, according to the force and clearness of their premises; more or less firm according as they are immediately or mediately deduced, and more or less general, more or less subject to modifications and exceptions, according to the subject-matter to which they refer.

This precise explanation having been made, it may be admitted as an established truth, that after a much debated discussion concerning the responsibility of states for damages which revolutionists cause to the persons and properties of foreigners residing in their territory, a negative solution has predominated and been accepted among the rules and principles, to which the umpire has heretofore alluded, that no right to demand indemnity for such damages exists; a principle, on the other hand, to which there have been pointed out various—we may say, numerous—exceptions which it is not necessary to state for the purposes of this decision.

Now, then, does this principle govern the case of María García de Padrón in such an absolute manner that it should be decided upon this point exclusively?

The protocol of April 2 of the current year, signed at Washington by the plenipotentiaries of Spain and Venezuela, and to which this Commission owes its origin, provides that each claim be examined and decided, and textually orders that—

The Commissioners, or in case of their disagreement, the umpire, shall decide all claims upon a basis of absolute equity without regard to objections of a technical nature or the provisions of local legislation.

There have, therefore, been imposed on the said commissioners and on the umpire the three following rules of an imperative nature, and from which, in order not to place themselves in conflict with the instrument which gives them jurisdiction and confers on them their only powers, it is not permissible for them to depart:

First. Each claim must be specially and separately examined, without it being permissible to pronounce an abstract resolution conceived in general terms by which it might be supposed that, overlooking said consideration and decision of each case, different claims would simultaneously be decided. Therefore, in order to comply with the protocol, in each case the proper attention shall be paid to the general and special considerations which may be fitting and proper; and if it be necessary, the influence which is owed to the former shall be accorded them.

Second. In exercise of the right which nations naturally enjoy when they agree to create tribunals of arbitration, to establish the principles which must guide them in the decision of the disputed points which they submit to them, it has been made binding with respect to the members of this Commission that they must found their decision upon a basis of absolute equity.

Third. In order to dispel the least shadow of a doubt with respect to the scope of the preceding rule, and letting it be known that this Commission was created as a tribunal of equity only, it was provided, finally, that objections of a technical nature or provisions of local legislation should not govern or be taken into account as against the spirit and rule that their decisions should be reached in that sense.

The last of these rules would suffice to make it clear that the principle of the irresponsibility of states for damages which insurgents cause is incapable, unless we attribute to it an absolute force, to determine by itself the decision in the case of María García de Padrón.

This principle, like any other similar one, does not support any except a technical objection, and those of this nature are precluded by the protocol, in so far as they are opposed to the criterion of equity which must be the basis of their decisions.

Moreover, conceding to said principle any abstract force or merit desired, there is still room to inquire what the concrete force or merits that it has are in a case which must be decided by this tribunal of absolute equity.

In tribunals of internal arbitration the principle of equity holds a most important place, and it is to be borne in mind and applied by all of them, whether rules for pronouncing their judgments have been conventionally fixed, since in the many difficulties which may arise they shall resort to the principles of law moderated by equity to decide them, or if no rules have been prescribed for them.

Because with the soundest reason they can appeal to equity when the compromis is mute, says Mérignhac, concerning the principles on which they should rely, or finally if absolute liberty has been allowed them, since, in that case, as the author cited repeats, no rule restrains them in principle and they are free to render judgment in accordance with their personal conscience. (Mérignhac, l'Arbitrage International, No. 305 et seq., p. 297.)

To the provisions which leave the arbitrator at entire liberty, as the same author continues further on, belong those which permit him "to decide according to justice and equity." This vague expression operates in effect so as to leave him at absolute liberty.

The creation of tribunals of equity in which the arbitrator decides according to his conscience has been frequently put into practice; and it has been considered so regular and convenient that the Institute of International Law included in it the rules of August, 1875, which it proposed and recommended for States when they sought to negotiate agreements for arbitration. Article 18 runs as follows:

Le tribunal arbitral juge selon les principes du droit international, à moins que le compromis ne lui impose des règles différentes ou ne remette la décision à la libre appréciation des arbitres. (Revue de Droit International, 1875, p. 281.)

For this reason, referring to the varied nature of tribunals of international arbitration, M. Lafayette, cited by Calvo and Tchernoff, says:

Quand c'est d'après leur conscience, les sentiments d'équité ou les principes de droit naturel, que les arbitres doivent rendre leur sentence, ils constituent un tribunal d'équité; si, au contraire, c'est d'après les principes de droit formulés dans la convention ou d'après les principes déjà établis du droit international, l'on a un tribunal de justice. Les uns comme les autres forment de véritables corporations judiciaires et, en cette qualité, jouissent d'une entière indépendance vis-à-vis des parties dont ils tiennent leurs pouvoirs. (Cited by Calvo, Inter. Law, Vol. III, p. 464, Note I. Tchernoff, Protection des Nations, p. 378.)

And this character of tribunals of equity is especially adapted to mixed commissions, which are almost always constituted nowadays to decide cases of protection, since amongst other considerations proper for an intimate appreciation of justice, in which that character places them, is found the one that enables them to take into consideration those claims which the States refuse to recognize as not touching the principle nor the pecuniary debt, confusing the two things in the same opposition; an opposition which becomes so profound, as one of the authors just cited remarks:

que l'Etat y persiste même quand il se trouve en face d'un individu dont la situation mérite incontestablement une attention particulière. (Tchernoff, Protection des Nations, p. 382.)

Pursuing the logical order of ideas concerning the nature of mixed commissions the Institute of International Law agreed at its session of September, 1900, after having adopted a resolution concerning the responsibility of States on account of damages caused to foreigners during an insurrection or civil war, to unite to it this recommendation:<sup>a</sup>

Recourse to international commissions of investigation and to international tribunals is in general recommended for all differences that may arise because of damages suffered by foreigners in the course of a revolt, an insurrection, or a civil war. (Annuaire de l'Institut de Droit International, Vol. XVIII, pp. 254, et seq.)<sup>b</sup>

In discussing this recommendation thus definitely drafted at the request of Mr. Lyon Caen, and as appears in the record of the 10th of September, attention was called to the fact that damages suffered by foreigners could be of two kinds, "those caused by the authorities and those caused by individuals." It was then further suggested that if the text did not comprise the second class it would be better to say "injuries caused in the suppression and not during the course of a revolt." The person who drew up the project and he who made the foregoing observation both expressly declared that the object was to exclude indemnities for damages caused by individuals; and after the declaration of the ideas of Mr. Descamps, asserting that while the institute was considering the proceeding and the conclusion it did not intend to exclude responsibility for damages which individuals might cause; and the explanations which the writer, Mr. Brusa, repeated, stating that by making no distinction the Commission had intended to include damages caused by individuals as well as the others, the proposal, such as it was and is drafted, was adopted and approved.

The institute relied evidently upon the principle that the tribunals to which they would be referred would be tribunals of equity.

In a case which occurred years ago, that is in 1892, and as to which the United States of Venezuela agreed with the United States of America to constitute a mixed commission of arbitration, to which they accorded the attributes of justice and equity, so that in accordance with these and the principles of international law it might decide the claim of the Venezuelan Steam Transportation Company; and Mr. Seijas, representative of the first of these powers, being aware of what the inclusion of equity among the considerations of the judgment signified, proposed, at the conference of July 1 of the year mentioned, that "the word 'equity' be stricken out, not only because of the conflict that existed between the doctrines of justice and equity, but also to prevent the commissioners from believing themselves arbiters and not arbitrators in law, which is what Venezuela intended to name."

The American plenipotentiary did not consent to the change, and replied "that, in his opinion, the use of the word 'equity' would result more favorably than adversely to Venezuela, because it would enable the commissioners to better take into consideration all the circumstances of the case." Thus the protocol was drawn, and accepted as such, the concept of equity admitted as a rule to decide in a mixed commission, it permits it to do so without conforming to the law, which is what essentially characterizes arbiters.

And concerning this difference, between what the law does not exact and equity may nevertheless allow, there exists an example most important in its scope, which is the reparation by the State, because of the internal law, of damages caused by revolts or civil wars.

This example, which has been followed by several nations, emanates from France, where, in consequence of the revolution of 1848, the decree of December 24, 1851, was made, which in the pertinent portion reads as follows (Calvo 5th ed., Vol. III, p. 152, note):

Considering that according to the terms of the law of the tenth of Vendemaire, year 4 (October 1, 1797), communities are responsible for wrongs committed by violence in insurrections, as also for the damages and actions to which they may give rise; * * *

* * * Considering that even if the State is not subject to any legal obligation, it is in conformity to the rules of equity and of sound politics to repair unmerited misfortunes and obliterate, as far as may be possible, the sad recollections of our civil discords;

It is decreed:

ARTICLE I. That there be opened in the ministry of the interior a credit * * * to pay the indemnities for damages occasioned by the revolution.

In that case, as well as in the others of reparation after the war with Germany, the insurrection, and commune, said equitable reparations were affected without distinction as to damages inflicted by the authorities or the insurgents, and as well to nationals as to foreigners.

The foregoing is more than sufficient to show what are the points and attributes of international tribunals of equity, of which sort this Mixed Commission is, created by a protocol that does honor to the powers that signed it, in doing which they not only gave evidence of a lofty spirit, cutting off recourse from both to any principle or rule which smothers the inspirations of an upright and lofty conscience, but also of the most ardent desire that they show practically to foster the Institution of International Arbitration, conceding to it a broadness of scope that increases its efficacy and augments the number of cases intrusted to its cognizance and decision.

The umpire, therefore, believes it to be incontrovertible that classifying, as may be desired, the general principle of irresponsibility of States for damages which insurgents cause—that is to say, as a doctrine which gives rise to technical arguments, or as an inflexible rule of law—it can not govern in a positive way the case of María García de Padrón; and it being far from obligatory to decide it in accordance with the terms thereof, the positive duty of this Commission consists in deciding without taking into account a necessity which does not exist, resting upon a basis of absolute equity.

The preceding conclusion is in no way weakened by the circumstance that in the convention made in 1861<sup>a</sup> between Spain and Venezuela relative to Spanish claims, it was agreed that subjects of that nationality injured by revolutions were obliged to prove the negligence of the lawful authorities, and that this rule should be unalterable in the pending negotiations and those that might arise in the future, since if it be true that it was so agreed at that time it is also true that both powers retained the natural and absolute power to agree upon a different course whenever they might desire, and as they have in effect done by means of their above-cited protocol of the 2d of April of this year, which they negotiated for the settlement of the other claims which in their entirety must be decided equitably.

"The commissioners," says the protocol, "or, in case of their disagreement, the umpire, shall decide all claims upon a basis of absolute equity." Thus it is that the application of the rule of 1871 as a requisite in order that the claims, for the decision of which this Commission was established, might prevail and be decided favorably, is clearly incompatible with the principle of equity exclusively and imperatively set down for its judgments.

Having arrived at this point the occasion also appears to have arisen for the umpire, in accordance with the foregoing principles which he has established, to pronounce the decision which he believes equitable and fitting concerning the claim; but, as he understands that it was the intention of the commissioners to consider the case anew, if the umpire did not disallow it because of its revolutionary origin; and it is to be desired that in effect they may do so since they will once more evince their intelligence and impartiality, of which they have given so many proofs, the undersigned decides:

That this record return to the examination of the commissioners so that they may be pleased to decide the claim presented on behalf of María García de Padrón, considering that the principle of irresponsibility of States for damages which insurgents cause does not govern it, since it is not submitted for judgment on any other basis than that of absolute equity.

LOZANO CASE.

Under the terms of the protocol the Commission is bound to receive and consider all documents submitted by either government.<sup>a</sup>

GUTIERREZ-OTERO, Umpire:

In the record of the claim made in the name of the Spanish subject, José Lozano, demanding the payment of 15,000 bolivars as indemnity for the damages which the revolutionary forces inflicted upon him in his mercantile establishment, situated in the city of Barquisimeto, on the 1st of October, 1899, there has arisen a preliminary question concerning the admissibility of the proof produced with the claim, since, while the Commissioner of Venezuela maintains that it is inadmissible because the evidence presented was given before the vice-consul of Spain, and because, therefore, the evidence given for him was of no value, the Spanish Commissioner is of the opinion that the declarations made before the consular agents of his nation ought to be admitted, since many times it is the only means of which Spanish subjects have been able to avail themselves to prove the facts upon which they base their claims. In an exposition of his belief said commissioner stated:

That the consuls of his country were authorized to receive the declarations of witnesses; that said faculty is in general inherent in all consuls, and that, at all events, it is to be borne in mind that this Mixed Commission is not a tribunal of justice, but that it ought to take into consideration all proofs that may be presented, giving to them the weight which they ought to have in accordance with equity, as prescribed in the protocol.

This point concerning the inadmissibility of the proof was submitted to the decision of the umpire, who, in rendering such opinion, believes that the express clause of said protocol, signed in Washington, April 2, of this year, by the representatives of Spain and Venezuela, are to be applied, in which, rules that must be observed are prescribed for this Commission, which can not assume powers which the protocol denies it, nor refrain from fulfilling the obligations which it imposes upon it.

The second article of the protocol cited, provides:

The Commissioners, or umpire, as the case may be, shall investigate and decide said claims upon such evidence or information only as shall be furnished by or on behalf of the respective governments. They shall be bound to receive and consider all documents or written statements which may be presented by or on behalf of the respective governments in support of, or in answer to, any claim.

And since the documents or statements, which tend to support the claim here considered, have been presented in writing and by the legation of Spain in the name of the Government, the Commission is bound to examine and consider them in order to take them into consideration in pronouncing the judgment which it may deem justified by the merits.

Nevertheless, the question of admissibility of the proof presented shall not prejudice its efficacy, which shall be appreciated by the commissioners or the umpire, as the case may be, as they may determine to proceed in accordance with absolute equity without regard to objections of a technical nature, or provisions of a local legislature, as prescribed as a binding rule.

Therefore the umpire decides that the proofs submitted with the claim made in the name of the Spanish subject, José Lozano, is admissible, and that the claim should be returned for the investigation of the commissioners, in order that they may decide it, examining and taking into consideration said proofs.

MENA CASE.

It is an accepted principle of international law that states are not responsible for damages and injuries caused by persons in revolt against the constituted authorities; but this principle under the terms of the protocol can not be invoked by Venezuela. <sup>a</sup>

GUTIERREZ-OTERO, Umpire.

In record No. 5, presented in the claim of the Spanish subject Domingo Gonzalez Mena, in favor of whom the payment is claimed of 34,744 bolivars as the value of 670 head of horses and mules situated upon the ranches belonging to him, the former having been destroyed by the belligerent forces in the war beginning in May, 1899, and the latter having been entirely lost during the same time, there arose a question concerning which the commissioners did not agree, and which, as a preliminary question, has been submitted to the umpire.

The Commissioner of Venezuela, referring to the circumstances, says that there is no exact statement concerning which force said troops belonged to, nor the name of the leader who commands them; and that there is question of the losses suffered because of war; he maintains that the State is only responsible for acts of its authorities, and also that strangers ought to suffer the consequences of wars which the country undergoes, and should not claim damages on this account, because they are produced by force majeure, which in no case can render said State responsible.

From this he deduces that Venezuela is not responsible for the damages which Gonzalez Mena says he suffered by reason of the war of 1899.

The Commissioner of Spain is of opinion that the interests of the claimant have not received the protection to which the treaties in force give them a right, and he maintains that said responsibility does exist.

The question set down in this way by the commissioners, it appears in the record that:

Not being in accord upon this point, its resolution shall pass to the decision of the umpire.

In reality the two following principles are invoked by one of the commissioners, in order that they may be applied and govern the case:

Primarily, the State is responsible only for the acts done by its agents, and not for damages which insurgents cause to foreigners, and therefore Gonzalez Mena has no right, from this point of view, to claim damages which the revolutionary forces may have caused him:

In general, the State is not responsible for damages caused as a consequence of war because damages of this sort are considered as caused by force majeure, which exempts it from liability.

Do these principles in fact govern the case of Gonzalez Mena in such an absolute way, that, by reason of both, it is not permissible to take into account any other consideration in order to decide it and make it necessary to reject it summarily?

With respect to the first of these two rules which have been cited, the umpire has, upon another occasion,<sup>a</sup> already decided that although after a long discussion the theory has undoubtedly prevailed concerning the irresponsibility of states for damages which insurgents cause to the persons or property of foreigners living in their territory, and such a principle is now considered as a rule properly called one of international law, it does not govern a tribunal of the nature of this Mixed Commission, which, according to the protocol that created it, should, on the contrary, necessarily base its judgments upon absolute equity and not take into consideration objections of a technical nature which may be raised before it.

This character of a tribunal of equity, which is considered sufficient for the submission to arbitration of cases of protection, has been recognized as giving absolute liberty for a decision which is not against good conscience inspired by a true estimation of absolute justice, and which permits, finally, taking into consideration of all the circumstances of the case, conceding equitably what is not a matter of obligation and can not be demanded, and, in a word, proceeding, as arbitrators proceed, that is, without regard to law.

The umpire has shown that the protocol of Washington, of April 2 of this year, by its own terms, and in accordance with the most reliable opinions which in this particular case can be produced, among them another protocol made in 1890 by the United States of Venezuela and the United States of America, places this Mixed Commission in that position.

Concerning the second principle—and even with more reason—substantially the same must be said, since if this doctrine to a certain degree did absolutely exist, that the acts of war do not give rise to the responsibility which obliges states to make arbitration, it would be modified by the theory that the distinction between these cases should be made as to those which, properly speaking, are defensible, and those which are not, therefore, of the nature of a fatal necessity.

Upon this point Fiore, cited by Tchernoff, says:

S'il est incontestable, dit un auteur, que la guerre a le caractère de nécessité fatale et de force majeure, tout ce qu'un gouvernement peut faire et entreprendre pour satisfaire aux justes exigences de la défense, en prévision d'une guerre, ou pendant la guerre n'a pas en lui-même le caractère de nécessité fatale. La guerre imminente ou déclarée peut, sans doute, nécessiter certains faits contre la propriété privée, et autoriser les détériorations de cette propriété dans l'intérêt public de la défense militaire: mais ce que l'autorité publique peut faire dans un but stratégique revêt toujours le caractère de l'entreprise légitime dans un intérêt public, et non toujours celui de nécessité fatale, caractère qui devrait être réservé uniquement aux faits accomplis durant l'action et rendus nécessaire pour résister à l'ennemi qui s'avance pour commencer la lutte. (Tchernoff, Protection des Nationaux Résident à l'Etranger, p. 309, citing Fiore, France Judiciaire, X, 1, p. 193.)

Tchernoff contends, that the council of state in France established the distinction with respect to the demolition of real estate in the zone of the defense of Paris from between those which constituted a measure of this nature until the disaster of Sedan, and those after this event considering the latter as an act of war, which did not give, as the first did, a right to indemnity.

That the French court of cassation has decided that the damages caused to private property by the works completed, even in case of necessity for the defense of a stronghold in a state of war, give a right to indemnity in all cases where they do not constitute a case of force majeure;

And finally that an author, cited in La France Judiciaire, expresses himself as follows:

Si, au lieu de s'en tenir à la forme, on va au fond des choses, qu'il s'agisse des dommages résultant de travaux de défense antérieurs à l'action, ou des dommages résultant d'opérations militaires d'attaque ou de défense durant l'action, il y a toujours, dans un cas comme dans l'autre, des citoyens qui souffrent un dommage dans l'intérêt collectif de la patrie.

Dès lors, la collectivité des citoyens, ou le gouvernement qui la représente, doit indemniser intégralement les particuliers des pertes qu'ils ont subies dans l'intérêt commun, soit avant, soit après l'action. Du reste, le système contraire est tellement injuste, que ses partisans n'osent pas le pousser jusqu'à ses dernières conséquences logiques, mais le mitigent en disant que l'équité doit conseiller à l'Etat, même lorsqu'il s'agit des dommages causés durant l'action, à faire la charité aux victimes de la défense nationale. (Tchernoff, Protection des Nationaux Résident à l'Etranger, pp. 311, 312; citing a note of the translator of La France Judiciaire, X, 1, p. 192.)

Thus it is that although without taking into consideration that the case of Gonzalez Mena is submitted to a mixed commission, which is obliged to decide according to equity, the question of indemnity for acts of war appears, moreover, to be a question recommended in general for its decision to the same criterion of equity, but these considerations which fix the necessity of deciding this claim upon its merits in no way prejudices the facts nor entail an opinion concerning the nature of those facts which have been the subject of the proof produced.

It is for this reason that the umpire in declaring that the rules invoked in an absolute sense with respect to damages caused by the revolution or by acts of war do not govern the case proposed, necessitating its disallowance decides expressly and exclusively:

That this record is to be returned to the commissioners in order that they may decide the claim presented on behalf of the Spanish subject Gonzalez Mena, bearing in mind that it is not subjected in this respect to any other criterion than that of absolute equity.

FRANQUI CASE.

In the absence of an express provision to the contrary, the Commission has the right to adopt whatever means it determines upon to obtain evidence.

A witness can not discredit by subsequent retraction statements made by him as a governmental authority, especially where his statements have been corroborated at the time they were first made.

GUTIERREZ-OTERO, Umpire:

In record No. 70 relative to the claim made on behalf of the Spanish subject Alonzo Franqui a difference of opinion has arisen, and it is submitted to the umpire for his decision because upon the Venezuelan Commissioner's demand that Gen. Maurice Aguilar, whose testimony has been presented in support of said claim, should be heard by the whole Commission, the Spanish Commissioner was of opinion that the protocol, in its second article, expressly limits the persons whom said Commission ought to hear, and therefore the declaration of Gen. Maurice Aguilar is not to be admitted; and the undersigned takes into consideration and decides this point in the following manner:

First. That the protocol, signed in Washington on April 2 of this year by the representatives of Spain and Venezuela for the establishment of this Mixed Commission, does not limit the means of proof which may be made use of before it, and only demands in the first part of the second article that the proof shall be rendered by the respective Government or in their name; and in the second part of the same article that the Commission shall receive and consider all documents or written statements which may be presented by the Governments in support of or in answer to any claim.

Second. That in the absence of an express prohibition concerning the admissibility of determining means of proof, it is the unanimous conviction of the most conspicuous writers upon international law, which Mérygnac expresses in these terms:

The Institute of International Law, in article 15 of the Rules for Arbitration between Nations, proposes substantially the same thing.<sup>a</sup>

Third. That although supposing that the text of the protocol of Washington was doubtful, and demanded to be interpreted for want of clearness, the interpretation ought to be made in a broad sense because the general principles of legislation and jurisprudence provide a broad scope in this matter of proof; and because it is clearly a general rule that the oppressive [in the protocol] ought to be restricted and what allows freedom of action extended in interpreting it; and finally because this broadness of interpretation should be more binding when there is question, as with this Commission, exclusively of a tribunal of equity.

Fourth. That the duty imposed by said protocol in the second part of Article II to hear oral or written arguments which the agent of each nation may make concerning each claim does not mean more than that they shall not be prevented from being heard, and the acknowledgment that it is incumbent upon the agents to argue for their respective Governments; but by no means does it include, according to the concept of the umpire, the other prohibition to receive specific proofs, and much less to hear those who naturally are to take part in them.

Fifth. That considering the broadness of the powers of the Commission and its character as a tribunal of absolute equity, there is no reason for not considering included in them the right to accede to the request of one of the arbitrators, who spontaneously for his own information and that of his colleagues believes it opportune and proper that there be heard by all, and examined if it please them, a person who in his public, civil, and military character has already given testimony in the matter under consideration; and this proposition, which is not ex parte, since it is not the request of any agent in the name of his Government and merits attention because of the impartiality of its origin and the benefit of its purpose, is to be counted in order to be accepted, with the reasons heretofore set forth, and perhaps even with other superior ones.

Therefore the umpire decides:

That Gen. Maurice Aguilar is to be heard by this Commission in accordance with the request of the Commissioner of Venezuela for the purposes which have already been expressed.

After this opinion was delivered, General Aguilar was called as a witness before the Commission, and testified that in the official letter given by him to the claimant, setting forth the latter's loss, he had overestimated the value of the property.

The Commissioners for Spain and Venezuela, being then unable to agree as to the decision of the case, it was passed to the umpire for his judgment, and after reciting in detail the facts and evidence of the case, he decided in the following manner with respect to the weight of the oral testimony of General Aguilar:

The umpire considers:

* * * * *

Fourth. That with respect to the valuation of 250,000 bolivars, the umpire is of opinion that it ought to be accepted, because if it is true that General Aguilar in fact has retracted his statement concerning it, and testified before this Commission as to his want of knowledge, and the extraordinary inaccuracy with which said valuation was conducted, he can not succeed in discrediting with his later statement, given now, the official act of that time, when exercising the duties of public authority, namely, as civil and military superior of that locality, he estimated the loss caused during a battle in which he took part as one of the officers engaged.

His statement of that time is corroborated by the testimony of the bookkeeper, who testified relative to the character of the losses suffered; and by the declaration of Franqui, who, although the person injured, and the interested party, enjoyed the reputation of unblemished integrity according to the declaration of witnesses, who affirm that the conditions of the houses of said Franqui could have suffered damages to the amount indicated, and in general by the nature of the event capable, no doubt, of producing the loss of whatever was situated in the place where such a dreadful disaster occurred; besides, it is to be remembered that, not only before this Commission, General Aguilar expressly said that before answering he had at various times thought what he was asked; but six months after having given his answer in writing and made the valuation aforesaid, he corroborated them judicially under oath, stating that their contents were true. He has also testified before this Commission that the reputation for honesty and integrity of Franqui was unassailable and generally known. Thus it is that a latent sense of justice indicates that the first testimony of General Aguilar is entirely credible.

After making various deductions on other grounds, the umpire awards the sum of 191,000 bolivars.

CORCUERA CASE.

Where the Government of Venezuela has admitted and agreed to pay a debt due a Spanish subject for services, such debt becomes a portion of the national debt of Venezuela, and the obligation will not be extinguished by a clause of a treaty between Spain and Venezuela of a later date canceling all pending Spanish claims.

GUTIERREZ-OTERO, Umpire:

In record No. 120, which contains the claim of the Spanish subject Gen. Leonardo Corcuera, in favor of whom the payment of 2,201.96 bolivars is demanded, in accordance with an order recognizing and ordering him paid this debt by the minister of war, issued on February 18, 1898, a disagreement between the commissioners has arisen, and the case has been referred to the decision of the umpire.

The claimant presents the order referred to, and, moreover, a confidential note of the minister of foreign relations dated May 24, 1898, in which it is announced to the Spanish minister that the President of the Republic, lamenting that immediate payment of the order can not be made, has decided to do it in monthly installments of 500 bolivars, which would begin to be paid in the following June. Payment, however, has not been made in any way, and for that reason Corcuera has made a claim before this Commission.

The Commissioner of Venezuela is of opinion that the claim can not be admitted, and that no jurisdiction over it can be taken, because the claim is prior in date to February 25, 1898, when, in accordance with the convention of June 21 following, all Spanish claims then pending were canceled.

The Spanish Commissioner holds that Corcuera has a right to enforce his credit.

The umpire considers:

1. That with respect to the existence and legitimacy of the amount of the debt there is no doubt, because the claimant possesses an official document of the minister of war which acknowledges and orders this debt of the Government of Venezuela to be paid, the origin of which, moreover, is explained in detail, which shows that it arose because of military service furnished, which Corcuera performed by order of the minister of that department.

2. That this recognition and order were of February 18, 1898, and consequently constituted the debt from then on as a portion of the public debt of Venezuela and an asset which had become the property of Corcuera; it is not comprised among the credits canceled according to agreement of June 21 of the same year, because said credits were only the pending claimants, which were ordered to be paid by a stipulated sum. This debt being of such a nature, it was by no means included among pending reclamations.

3. That this correct understanding of the agreement of June 21, 1898, is set forth in the text thereof, because it appears therein that for the renunciation on the part of Spain to the recovery and payment of another credit existing and recognized, as was that of the installments of the Spanish debt which were not recovered during eleven months, running from May, 1892, to April, 1893, an express stipulation was made, and the cancellation of the other pending reclamations until February 25 was not sufficient to include it.

With respect to the debt due Corcuera, no renunciation existed, as it was indispensable in order that it should be excluded from his property.

4. Besides, on May 18 it was already known that pending claims would be canceled, because it was thus agreed in the convention of December 20, 1897, and it was also announced in the judgment of February 25 following, rendered by the commissioners charged with the settlement of said claims, both of which documents served as premises for the agreement of June 21, which did no more than refer to such acts; and, notwithstanding this undeniable knowledge of the facts, on said 18th day of May the Government agreed, and so communicated to the Spanish legation, that it would pay the debt of Corcuera by monthly installments of 500 bolivars.

Because of all the foregoing, and the umpire also making it known that, although the claimant rendered military service to Venezuela, he did so with the permission of his Government, and therefore preserved his nationality, decides that the claim of the Spanish subject Leonardo Corcuera falls within the jurisdiction of this Commission and must be allowed for the sum of 2,201.96 bolivars, and that, therefore, the Government of the United States of Venezuela should pay a like sum to His Majesty the King of Spain for the services of this subject.

SANCHEZ CASE.

Where the evidence produced in support of a claim is too vague to enable the Commission to determine the amount of the claim, said claim will be dismissed.<sup>a</sup>

GUTIERREZ-OTERO, Umpire:

In record No. 74, which comprises the claim of the Spanish subject J. Manuel León Sanchez, in favor of whom an indemnity of 50,000 bolivars is demanded for material damages which he says were caused by preventing him from continuing a periodical publication, legitimately established, a disagreement has arisen between the commissioners, and the case has been submitted to the umpire for his decision.

The claimant says:

That his said periodical leaflet which was called Movimiento Marítimo y Comercial y Noticias Universales was established by permission of the government of the Federal District granted on the 18th of December, 1902, and produced for him a profit from the start so encouraging that he was able thereby to satisfy all his obligations and outlays of expense, and to realize a monthly return of from 1,700 to 1,800 bolivars.

That upon the 15th of February following there was verbally announced to him by agents of the police an order, first from the prefectura and afterwards from the government of the district itself, that this publication should be suspended.

That in vain he sought, by all the means in his power, for the revocation of the order; that he did not procure the aid of the lawyers who might defend his rights before the tribunals and help him in a claim for damages which he might wish to bring.

That in view of these circumstances, and suffering the inevitable execution of an order which was not based upon a true cause of complaint, which had been made without right, which was not even couched in legal form, he found himself obliged to realize upon all his business in Venezuela by an inopportune sale of his printing establishment, and to emigrate to another country to seek support for his family.

To the foregoing statement of facts, and to support it, León Sanchez annexed the original permission to publish his leaflet; a letter from the manager of the French cable, which certified that he had never altered any translation or notice which were received by said manager; copies of various private publications, which were made for the purpose of procuring the withdrawal of the order of suspension; copies of various periodicals in which the notice of this order was published, and the cause attributed for it, which was the inaccuracy of said translation; two letters of persons who assert that León Sanchez was the manager of two newspapers; that later he was the owner of the Movimiento Marítimo; that this was suspended in the manner stated; that Sanchez endeavored to procure the revocation, devoting himself to the steps before mentioned; that he did not seek redress before the tribunals, because everybody considered it useless; and that there were printed and distributed from 300 to 350 copies of each one of the editions of the Movimiento Marítimo y Comercial y Noticias Universales.

Such are the complaints and proofs exactly and minutely set forth.

The Venezuelan Commissioner is of the opinion that León Sanchez has no right to demand any indemnity for the suspension to which there is reference, and he cites in support of his opinion the decree issued on May 10, 1902, by which the President of the Republic suspended, among other guarantees or constitutional rights, that of free expression of thought by word of mouth or by means of the press.

The Spanish Commissioner maintained that where there is question of an enterprise legally established with previous permission of the Government of Venezuela the latter is responsible for the damages caused claimant.

The umpire does not take up this question of responsibility, because, in the supposition that it might be determined abstractly or in principle against Venezuela, it would not be possible to fix these terms concretely in order to make it effective, because the claimant has not proved even one of the facts necessary to estimate and determine any indemnity.

In order that this want of evidence might clearly appear, the undersigned made the detailed enumeration of the proofs presented, which do not relate to the value of the publication, nor to the expenses incurred, nor the income, nor even to the profits and possibilities of its being maintained, nor upon the necessity which the facts imposed on León Sanchez of selling his printing establishment and absenting himself from the Republic, nor upon the value of this establishment, nor upon the price for which it was necessary to sell it, nor, in a word, upon anything that might justify the amount of property lost or injured.

Such an extreme in this respect was reached that not even when the private testimony of two persons was asked upon the fact of there having been published and distributed from 300 to 350 copies of each one of the editions of Movimiento Marítimo was there any proof as to how many of these editions there were, if they ceased to be published any day, and what expenses and profits they produced, nor whether these later circumstances refer to each edition, each day, or each month of the two months which the publication approximately lasted. In no case, therefore, could the umpire enter into an equitable appreciation of the facts which are not alleged and proven, nor much less invent them, in the want of all proofs produced by the interested party.

These reasons suffice to render it unnecessary to examine and resolve other questions, and make it necessary to decide, as the umpire does decide:

That there is no reason for granting (because of the reasons alleged in this record) any indemnity in favor of the Spanish subject, J. Manuel León Sanchez.

BETANCOURT CASE.

In the absence of an express mention of a liquidated and acknowledged debt due from the Government of Venezuela to a Spanish subject in a stipulation of a treaty cancelling all pending Spanish claims, such obligation will not be released.<sup>a</sup> For the proper interpretation of a treaty all the circumstances antecedent to its execution may be examined by the Commission.

GUTIERREZ-OTERO, Umpire:

In record No. 71, which comprises the claim of the Spanish subject Federico Betancourt, in favor of whom the payment of 43,300 bolívars is demanded on account of the formation and management of an expedition of immigrants from the Canary Islands to the port of La Guaira in the year 1892, and the damages and injuries which he alleges to have suffered because of the failure of prompt payment, the commissioners have not agreed, and the case has been submitted to the decision of the umpire.

The claimant shows:

That in February, 1892, he brought into Venezuela, through the port of La Guaira, an immigration from the Canary Islands comprised of 389 persons, whom he brought over in the Spanish bark La Fama, in accordance with a contract which he had entered into with the government of the Republic, and that although the immigrants were carefully chosen and the inspection of them which the officers officially named for this purpose made of them resulted satisfactorily, not only at the point of sailing, but also at the place of arrival—that is to say, in the Canary Islands and in La Guaira—nevertheless, he estimated that the debt which was acknowledged for the passage should be fixed at the sum aforesaid, and not at the larger sum which the law of the subject matter fixed and that he believed that he had merited, in all justice, on account of the proper fulfillment which he made of the contract entered into by him.

He further shows that, notwithstanding the time elapsed since the debt was liquidated and fixed and the necessary steps which he has taken administratively in order that he might be paid it, it still remains unsettled, and thereby he has been caused grave injuries, on account of which he demands to be indemnified, besides having the principal debt paid him.

To determine these damages he enters into an explanation of various operations which he could have undertaken with the value of the debt, if he had received it, and states that he is willing to consider it entirely satisfied with the result of any one of them.

To prove his debt he put in evidence various documents, and among them a certified copy which, by order of the minister of fomento, on the 16th of January of this year, was issued to him, and also of another certification given on September 24, 1892, by the director of statistics and immigration, certifying that in the archives of the office there existed a record, properly substantiated, in which it appears that Betancourt brought the immigration aforesaid, composed of 389 persons, as appears in the list sent to the minister by the subordinate commission of immigration of La Guaira, in accordance with the law in the premises, and therefore the Government owed said Mr. Betancourt the sum of 43,320 bolivars according to the accounting which his commission found in said record.

In order to show what is the interest which is customarily collected here in negotiations of loans, he presents two letters from the banks of Venezuela and Caracas, in which their representatives state that it is 12 per cent per annum.

When the claim was presented to the commissioners, the Venezuelan Commissioner considered that it ought to be disallowed because the diplomatic convention of June 21, 1898, made by the ministers of foreign relations and public credit of Venezuela and the ministers plenipotentiaries of Spain and this Republic canceled it, and consequently it was excluded from the examination of this Commission in accordance with Article I of the protocol of Washington.

The Spanish Commissioner was of opinion that the claimant ought to be allowed the sum which he demanded, because there was question of a contract which he entered into with the Government of Venezuela, the fulfillment of which he had been attempting, and to obtain in an administrative way without being able to accomplish its fulfillment, and that the claim of Betancourt did not form a part of those which were readjusted by said convention.

The umpire considers:

That Article I of the protocol signed at Washington on April 2 of this year places under the jurisdiction and decision of this Commission all claims of Spanish subjects which have not been settled by diplomatic agreement or by arbitration between the two Governments of Spain and Venezuela, and the first thing to be done, therefore, is to investigate with respect to the claim of Betancourt if it was included in the agreement of 1898 and was canceled thereby, as the learned Commissioner of Spain and Venezuela has contended.

That said convention of 1898 acknowledged as a precedent another convention of December, 1897, concluded at a conference, which at that date the minister of hacienda of Venezuela and the plenipotentiary of Spain had, and in the text of which it was expressed that said conference treated all claims still pending made by various Spanish subjects for injuries suffered during the war of 1892, and for other reasons; and that one person was named by the minister of hacienda and another by the legation of Spain, who examined all claims and determined the total sum which the Government of the Republic should pay therefor. They decided thereafter the terms of the payment and it was agreed providing:

That as soon as the bonds of the diplomatic debt which should be issued for the sum which might be determined should have been delivered, the legation of Spain would renounce with full authorization of its Government all other claims of Spaniards against Venezuela up to date, and also any claim that might arise from the suspension of the monthly payments during the duration of the past war.

That in the record of the conference held on June 21, 1898, which resulted in the convention of that date, successively approved by all the executive and legislative powers of Venezuela, it appears:

That an exact transcription was made of the other protocol of 1897, relative to the adjustment of claims pending by Spanish subjects by reason of the war suffered in 1892, and for other reasons, and attention being called that in said protocol it was agreed that the legation of Spain should renounce every other claim of Spanish subjects up to that date; and also every other claim that might have originated on account of the failure of payment of the eleven monthly installments during the duration of last June, 1892;

Wherefore the minister of Spain declared that at no time could there be demanded from the Government of the Republic the payment of said eleven monthly installments.

It likewise provided that the persons named to adjust all the claims and fix the amount that on account of them should be paid, accomplished their mission, and determined the sum which ought to be delivered to the Government of Venezuela for the different cancellation of all pending claims.

Finally the terms of the convention of that date, June 21, 1898, were definitely fixed, the first part of which reads as follows:

All claims of Spanish subjects up to the date of this judgment, or say February 25, 1898, shall be canceled.

That having considered the inducements which the convention of 1898 had and the definite text which has just been cited, it appears with entire clearness to the judgment of the umpire:

First. That all the claims which were canceled, were all those pending which were intrusted to the determination of the commissioners named for that purpose, and for the payment of which a specified sum was designated;

Second. That in no sense was there made or acceded to any claim which would likewise cancel debts which at that time were liquidated and acknowledged by the Government of Venezuela in favor of Spanish subjects, and which formed, therefore, a part of the public debt.

This proper understanding of the convention is corroborated by these very terms, since it being desired that there should be included also the cancellation or renunciation of another debt already liquidated and acknowledged, as was that of the eleven monthly installments, due on account of the Spanish debt, which were not paid from May, 1892, until April, 1893; with respect to this, particular and express stipulation was made, and it was not considered as included in the cancellation of the pending debts, which were the object of the transaction and the agreement to pay intrusted to the commissioners who were named for these purposes.

In a separate clause the following was agreed in said convention of 1898:

The legation of Spain declares that at no time may it demand from the Government of the Republic of Venezuela the payment of eleven monthly installments that were owed in 1892-93.

That was the only renunciation contained in the convention, and there were no other debts then existing for the determination and acknowledgment of which the Government of Venezuela might have made, and which also, therefore, belonged to the patrimony and property of the creditors.

That the debt of Frederico Betancourt belongs to those of the sort, supposing that an entirely trustworthy certification, because it proceeds from the ministry which has in custody the antecedents of this negotiation, proves the true amount and acknowledgment thereof before the convention of 1898 was made; consequently it was not included in the pending claims which at that time were adjusted and canceled in said year, nor was it the subject of any negotiation which might abstract it from his property.

That from the foregoing it is deduced upon the most secure basis that said credit, now that there is an attempt to collect it because it has not been satisfied, is not in any way excluded from the jurisdiction of this Mixed Commission, and that besides, in accordance with every sentiment of justice it must be declared that it ought to be paid, even if to this end it was necessary to apply equity as far as possible.

That upon this point it must be taken into consideration that although a long time has expired since the liquidation ought to have been made, since even in September of 1892 the debt was ascertained and acknowledged, and that without it the claimant must have experienced damages on account of the refusal to pay, they can not be repaired in any of the ways which he indicates and with respect to which he renders no proof.

Nor at the rate of 12 per cent per annum upon the capital, because, even supposing that he might have maintained a suit to ascertain these damages at this rate of interest, he would not have accomplished his intention.

Equity does no more than allow him for this capital a total and complete indemnity which is almost equivalent to 5 per cent per annum as long as it has been unsatisfied, and that the umpire should fix the sum of 14,295 bolivars and 70 centimos as corresponding exclusively to a period of eleven years exactly.

For the foregoing reasons the umpire decides that the claim of the Spanish subject Frederico Betancourt must be allowed for the total sum of 57,615.60 bolivars; and that, therefore, a like sum must be paid by the Government of the United States of Venezuela to His Majesty the King of Spain destined to satisfy said claim.

PERSONNEL OF SWEDISH-VENEZUELAN MIXED COMMISSION.

Umpire.—Ramón Gaytán de Ayala.

Swedish and Norwegian Commissioner.—Guillermo Valentiner.

Venezuelan Commissioner.—F. A. Guzmán Alfaro.

Venezuelan Agent.—F. Arroyo-Parejo.

Swedish and Norwegian Secretary.—Ch. Piton.

OPINIONS IN THE SWEDISH-VENEZUELAN COMMISSION.*THE CHRISTINA CASE.

Claim referred to umpire on question of the allowance of interest, the Commissioners having agreed upon the amount of the principal of the indemnity. Interest at 5 per cent allowed on the principal award for damages from the date that claimants were proved to have been in their right.

GAYTÁN DE AYALA, Umpire:

The writer, umpire of the Swedish-Norwegian-Venezuelan Mixed Commission, constituted by virtue of the protocol signed at Washington on March 10, 1903, and named by His Majesty, the King of Spain, at the request of the Government of Sweden and Norway, states:

That the record filed to prove the validity and amount of the claim in question having been examined;

That the arguments presented in defense of the rights of their respective constituents by the commissioners of Sweden and Norway and Venezuela, and their opinions relating to the demand for the payment of interest on the amount allowed on the claim which the commissioner of Sweden and Norway presents;

Whereas it appears from the opinion of the Venezuelan commissioner:

That neither the diplomatic nor consular representatives of Sweden and Norway in presenting the Christina claim to the commission demanded interest on the sum claimed;

That the creditor has no right to interest for default, except when there has been a delay in payment chargeable to the debtor, and in the present case the delay which has transpired can not be charged to Venezuela, since the Government of the Republic has given notice that it was willing to satisfy the claim, provided it was reduced to a just amount;

That the Government of Venezuela was right in refusing to acknowledge as just the estimate of the damages and injuries made by the owner of the bark Christina, as is seen from the award of the commission, by virtue whereof only the fifth part of such claim has been allowed;

That the persistence on the part of the claimants in demanding excessive damages—more than has been agreed were their due—should be considered as the sole cause of delay; and therefore it is neither just nor equitable that Venezuela should be liable for the losses caused by the rash pretensions of said claimants;

That the Venezuelan commissioner calls the attention of the umpire to the rate of interest that is demanded in favor of the claimants, and to the date from which said interest should run, alleging with respect to the first point that the rate of 6 per cent per annum is very much too high, and with respect to the second that the claim was not officially presented to Venezuela until the month of September, 1895.

And whereas it appears from the opinion of the commissioner of Sweden and Norway:

That the fundamental spirit of all the protocols signed in Washington is to decide all the claims upon a basis of absolute equity, and that equity has no criterion of making satisfaction for damages and injuries except to reinstate the injured person in the same condition in which he would have been had the damages and injuries not occurred.

That in support of the foregoing doctrine he cites the general rules as to the payment of the claims approved by mutual agreement of all the representatives of the interested powers after and on account of the Boxer uprising at Peking, which rules provided, in Article I, section 5:<sup>a</sup>

Persons who may have suffered damages and injuries as a consequence of the Boxer movement shall be restored to the situation in which they would have been had not the aforesaid uprising taken place.

That said principle is especially applicable to the case of the Christina, and that because there is question of damages committed in the year 1892, which was not decided until 1903, when they were estimated at one thousand pounds sterling, this circumstance implies, as against the perpetrator thereof, the obligation to pay interest for the time elapsed;

That he determines 6 per cent per annum as the rate of interest, relying therefore upon the facts that in Venezuela 18 per cent per annum is frequently paid, and that the commercial rate is 12 per cent per annum, and that it is certain that the owners of the Christina earned in their business a rate much higher than the said 6 per cent;

The writer, bearing in mind the foregoing opinions of the interested parties, and

Considering that even though the fact alleged by the Venezuelan commissioner be true—that neither the minister nor the consul-general of Sweden and Norway demanded interest upon presenting the claim under consideration—the fact that they did not do so does not involve the express or implied waiver of interest upon claiming specifically, since those officials in demanding a cash indemnity for the damages and injuries caused to their constituents did not abandon the rights that might arise by lapse of time during negotiations of the claim;

Considering that the right to demand the payment of interest arises in the present case out of the length of time it has taken the representatives of the two parties to agree upon the proper amount of the claim, but that said delay can not be attributed exclusively to the negligence or ill will on the part of Sweden and Norway, since on several occasions propositions of settlement were proposed which the Government of Venezuela rejected, for reasons which do not enter into the subject-matter of the discussion before this commission;

Considering that it is a principle of justice universally recognized that the measure of damages should be made coextensive not only with the material direct damages suffered by the injured person, but also with the profits of which he has been deprived;

Considering that when there is question of ascertained sums of money the profits of which the injured party has been deprived are compensated for by the payment of interest which may be general or special, as the case and circumstances connected with the nature of the business in which the interested party devoted himself;

Considering that in cases like that of the Christina it is proper to allow interest at the rate generally adopted in the negotiations of owners of ships;

Considering that the legal interest of 3 per cent per annum urged by the commissioner of Venezuela is only applicable by virtue of specific stipulations, or in case of loans of money under absolute security, and not when there is question of industrial or commercial undertakings in which this requisite is necessarily lacking;

Considering that Venezuela pays its creditors interests varying in rate between 9, 6, 5, and 3 per cent per annum, according to the circumstances and sort of the debt;

Considering that the Venezuelan commissioner in calling the attention of the umpire to the rate of interest which the honorable commissioner of Sweden and Norway demands, shows secondarily how it is possible to allow interest in accordance with the principles of justice and equity which are to inspire this decision;

Considering that these very principles of equity and justice hold that interest should be allowed the injured party by reason of the damage suffered from the day when the party causing the injury incurred the inherent liability to pay the same, and that this liability should be considered as fixed in the case of the Christina from the day on which the owners and claimants herein proved their blamelessness for the act which gave rise to the detention of said bark;

Whereas Article II, paragraph 1, of the protocol signed at Washington by the representatives of Sweden and Norway and Venezuela on March 10, 1903, the commissioners of the two interested parties agreed upon the amount of the indemnity which ought to be allowed the claimants and fixed it at one thousand pounds, sterling;

Whereas by the disagreement of the commissioners with respect to the payment of interest on the one thousand pounds sterling agreed upon as the amount of the claim, and as a consequence thereof by the disagreement concerning the rate of said interest and concerning the time from which it should run, the writer is required to decide the foregoing disagreements, and bearing scrupulously in mind the provisions of Article I, paragraph 3, of the protocol above mentioned, which says:

The commissioners, or in case of their disagreement, the umpire, shall decide all claims upon a basis of absolute equity, without regard to objections of a technical nature, or of the provisions of local legislation.

He decides—

1. That interest should be paid.
2. That the rate of interest shall be 5 per cent per annum, which is the rate that Venezuela pays commercial companies on her external debt.
3. That interest should begin to run from the day when the blamelessness of the claimants in the act which caused the detention of the Christina was proved; that is, from the 7th day of July, 1892, until the date of the present award.

BOVALLINS AND HEDLUND CASES.

In case of the commission of a crime in the territory of a State the State is bound, without being requested, to prosecute the criminals before the proper local authorities, and in case of failure of the country to prosecute the wrongdoers it will be held liable in damages to those who have suffered.

A State is responsible in damages committed by revolutionists where it subsequently appoints the participants and leaders of the revolution to office, thereby tacitly approving their conduct.

Where it is shown that documentary evidence can not be produced, the statements of witnesses will be accepted.

GAYTÁN DE AYALA, Umpire:

The writer, umpire of the Mixed Swedish and Norwegian Claims Commission, organized at Caracas by virtue of the protocol signed at Washington by the representatives of the two interested nations on March 10, 1903, Requested by the commissioners of Sweden and Norway and Venezuela to render the award which equity and justice require concerning the claims of the Swedish and Norwegian subjects, Carl Bovallins, Henry Hedlund, and Edwin Bovallins, for the amounts and because of he reasons hereinafter expressed.

Carl Bovallins:

For cash and articles paid for by him .....	£875
For injuries .....	10, 000

10, 875

Henry Hedlund:

For clothes, jewels, papers, etc .....	£130
For imprisonment and injuries .....	10, 000

---

10, 130

Edwin Bovallins:

For personal property, cash, and effects .....	£351-10
For personal suffering .....	10, 000

10, 351-10

Having examined the documents produced to prove the validity and amount of these claims;

Having considered the arguments presented by the commissioners of Sweden and Norway and Venezuela in support of the rights and obligations of their respective constituents;

Having weighed the argument presented by the agent of Venezuela and the report of the commissioner, Dr. T. A. Guzmán Alfaro; and

Considering that the forcible attack by an armed force and other facts set forth by the claimants are proved;

Considering that if the opinion of the agent of Venezuela that the perpetrators of the violence were wrongdoers and sharpers be accepted, it would follow that the obligation of prosecuting and punishing the criminals rested on the competent local authorities, without its being necessary that any request be made by the injured parties for that purpose;<sup>a</sup>

Considering that at the time when the acts complained of were committed, and since then, the delinquents have not been chastised or prosecuted, but, on the contrary, their principal leaders have occupied for some time official positions, having been appointed by the present

Government of Venezuela, and that they are cloaked with authority in the very region where the events took place;

Considering that this circumstance is sufficient in itself to show that the claimants have not been able to address themselves to the local authorities for the purpose of taking the testimony necessary to legally prove the damages and injuries suffered;

Considering that during the greater part of the time elapsed since the outrages occurred until to-day the region where they transpired has remained in a state of war;

Considering that all the acts perpetrated by the authors of the sackage, of which the Orinoco Shipping and Trading Company was the victim, induce one to characterize the bands of armed men in question as revolutionists;

Considering that the Government of Venezuela, by conferring various public offices in the government of the country upon the principals of the said revolutionary forces, tacitly approves their conduct, and according to the principles recognized by public law makes itself responsible for all the acts done by them;

Considering that the persons who assaulted the offices of said Orinoco Shipping and Trading Company, burned and destroyed all the books and documents belonging to the same and to its employees, depriving the latter of the means of producing written detailed proofs of the damages and injuries suffered;

Considering that the claimants have presented the only ones which they could obtain and that they concur in their respective statements sworn to before the competent consular authorities;

Considering that the agent of said company in that region, Carl Bovallins, was absent from Venezuela when the outrages complained of occurred, and that therefore he has no right to the indemnity with respect to the damages like those suffered by his brother, Edwin Bovallins, and by Henry Hedlund, which he demands in his complaint;

By reason of everything stated, and in the name of equity and justice, the umpire decides:

That the Government of Venezuela should pay—

To Carl Bovallins for loss of cash and personal effects.....	£200
To Henry Hedlund for loss of money, clothes, jewels, and private documents.....	130
For eight days in prison, for sickness contracted thereby, and loss of time.....	400
	<hr/> 530
To Edwin Bovallins for the loss of money and personal effects.....	240
For five days in prison, bodily sufferings, and loss of employment.....	400
	<hr/> 640

NOTE.—In this commission Mr. Christian Anker, owner of the Norwegian bark Christina, made claim for £5,000, consisting of the following items:

For the maintenance of the captain and crew for four months during their detention.....	£1,000
For the use of the ship in transporting troops during this time.....	2,000
For the loss of an advantageous charter.....	1,000
For damages caused to the ship during the transportation of troops.....	1,000
	<hr/> 5,000

The commissioners disagreed with reference to the allowance of interest from the date of the seizure of the vessel, but agreed in the allowance of £1,000 on the claim.

In the claim of Serine Meling, payment of 84,600 crowns was asked on account of the death of her husband, commander of the steamship Jotun, caused by the discharge of artillery upon the vessel at St. Felix on the 11th of June, 1902. The commissioners allowed on this claim the sum of 71,520 crowns.

The claim of the Ydun Life Insurance Company, because of the life-insurance policy which the company had paid to the widow of Captain Meling, was disallowed.

The claim of Messrs. Madsen and Jespersen, owners of the steamer Jotun, was for the sum of 4,379.31 crowns, on account of damages caused them by the death of Captain Meling, who commanded the ship. On this claim the sum of 1,244.61 crowns was allowed.

GERMANY.

THE MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES OF VENEZUELA.

The document entitled "Papers relating to the Foreign Relations of the United States," published annually by the Department of State of Washington, contains, in its last issue corresponding to December, 1901, but not placed in circulation until several months thereafter, a memorandum presented by the Emperor of Germany to the Secretary of State on the 11th of that month, in which there are stated reasons or grounds held by the Imperial Government for a contemplated coercive or comminatory action against the Republic of Venezuela. In that paper, the purpose of coercion is based on the refusal of the Venezuelan Government to permit that powers foreign to the nationals take part in the examination, classification, or mode of payment of the claims that various German subjects have presented or reserve the right to present, for alleged losses or damages sustained during the last wars, since 1898. While the text of the memorandum makes unfavorable remarks about the Venezuelan magistrates of the judiciary, whose office it is to pass upon the nature of these claims, it sets forth the resolution of the Imperial Government to present the claims itself, as finally examined, in order that they be accepted in that form by Venezuela, whether willing or not.

In consequence of the above-mentioned publication the Government of the Republic is now confronted by a document by which it is seriously affected, and of whose spirit and tendency it was entirely unaware. On the other hand, it had occasion to be surprised at the form of the memorandum, in view of the cordiality that the respectable Government of Berlin is imparting to its relations with that of Venezuela; relations in which there had not been theretofore, as proved by the archives of the department of foreign relations, any lack of the evidence of reciprocal sincerity, on which is based the more or less reliable token of culture that may be exchanged among civilized nations.

The paper of the German ambassador, once known to Venezuela, can not be allowed to pass without the protest resulting from its contravening maxims of strict equality that international law advocates as a principle of harmony among the States of the civilized world. From one fact alone, explicable in itself, the imperial official draws his imputations, and from a mere supposition, offensive because inconsistent, it deduces the duty of exercising intervention foreign to the laws in the prosecution and settlement of cases of German subjects. The fact, that is to say, the refusal of the Government to lay aside, on every occasion, the powers of national sovereignty, can be looked upon by no one except in the light of imperative necessity, consubstantial with the very existence of the State, and the aggravating supposition, that is to say, the presumed partiality of the Federal court, the body representing the highest judiciary in Venezuela, is not to be considered except as an unfortunate or accidental remark without any foundation in truth, without the slightest reason to defend it. There never was, as seems to be supposed by the ambassador, any of its members dismissed. The change is made, in each case, by virtue of the law, and in the established form for the appointment of new members.

The views and arguments advanced by the Republic since the beginning in support of its refusal to accept diplomatic action in the settlement of claims of the Empire have never been refuted, not even incidentally. There are on record, in a long correspondence of the imperial legation at Caracas, now for the first time given to the press for a correct appreciation by all friendly Governments, as well as for the foundation for a protest of Venezuela against the manner in which facts are represented in the memorandum of the ambassador. In that series of diplomatic notes, the Empire rested its case not only on the law of the country, which, as such, gave sufficient force to the argument, but on the best recognized rules of modern international law on the opinion of eminent European and American writers, on the legislation of other countries, Germany, herself, among others, and on the ideas and circumstances which no fair Government can ignore, when it has to examine claims with due regard to all those concerned. It never was the intent of the Republic, in that correspondence, to impose its will arbitrarily and capriciously, nor did it intend, as the ambassador seems to suppose, to evade sacred obligations in a frivolous manner, but to hold the ground it has stood on since its advent to political life, for natural and judicious reasons. Obligations are repudiated by declining to listen to the reasons, or precedents on which these obligations are founded, not by opening, as Venezuela did, a legal field for their complete fulfillment. The question therefore resolves itself into a simple one of form, but if the form adopted were not that provided by its laws, the Republic would see in it something akin to a disregard of the national sovereignty. The Imperial Government, according to the language of the ambassador, wishes to examine and decide for itself, and by itself, the character, amount, and mode of payment of claims connected with property or interests established in the Republic of Venezuela. The Venezuelan Government, supported by its constitution and the regulations, maintains that such procedure can not be granted to any but the respective national powers. The intent indicated by the ambassador, evinces, to say the least, an excess of protection contrary to the universal principle of law, which subjects property, real and personal, to the regulations and laws of the country where it is situated. Fair and impartial consideration can find nothing in the attitude of Venezuela except the obligatory exercise of a political power, and the discharge of a duty depending thereon. A relinquishment of the same would be tantamount to a denial by the nation of the efficiency of its laws for the due protection of the general interest.

To legislate for the natives only, and to leave open for foreigners the application of a special law, enforced through the intervention of representatives from other countries, would expose countries whose destiny is to grow from immigration to degenerate into mere settlements lacking the essential quality of political states, a position they hold in the international concert. Indeed more than one European statesman has called attention to the flagrant injustice that flows occasionally from the forcible protection of interests that are not absolutely legitimate or which the preconceived intent to take advantage of the internal disturbances of certain foreign countries may have in some way contributed to make apparently legitimate. If by exceptionally waiving the local laws, the matter of claims was allowed to be made one of mere diplomatic action, the simultaneous effect might be a constant injury to the internal sovereignty and a ceaseless threat to the national treasury. As it is not to be presumed that the foreign governments and their honorable political representatives may assume judicial powers to establish in the course of a regular trial the true character, the lawful origin of the actual status of any claim, there would be frequent and regrettable occasions to see the high person of a State appearing to favor, unwittingly but strenuously, designs inconsistent with either justice or reason.

The memorandum of the ambassador affords in one of its parts the best evidence of the inapplicability of diplomatic action to matters that appertain to the courts of the country. It cites, as a serious argument against the attitude of Venezuela, one of the claims submitted to the board for 3,800 head of cattle, the value of which was made to amount to 600,000 bolivars. The data submitted by the claimants showed the demand to be so abnormal that the board could find no ground for an award except in an infinitely smaller sum. The parties in interest were engaged in cattle raising as a part of their business, and supported the main part of their claims with a comparative statement of previous inventories, and the subsequent condition in various stock farms, without any other evidence as to the number of oxen than the testimony of three persons, two of them Germans, who witnessed the statement, and a certificate of the imperial consul at Valencia regarding the original number of cattle in several pasture grounds, some of them owned by citizens of the Republic. The time between the original inventory and the ascertainment of the remainder, showing a loss of 2,652 oxen, all charged to the Republic in the claim, ran, as represented, from the 9th of September, 1899, to the 4th of March, 1900. During the month of December of the first-named year, the Government, as shown by an official document filed in the archives of the ministry of the treasury, purchased 1,000 oxen from the very same stock farm, for which it ultimately paid in cash a much lower price, set by the sellers or the owners of the herd themselves; wherefrom two equally grave inferences may be drawn, to wit, that there were included in the conjectural computation on which the claim rested a large number of oxen previously sold, and that the value of the herd was set down in the memorial at a price nearly double that which was asked by the same claimant in other transactions.

These incidents should suffice to demonstrate the necessity of acting and proceeding, in matters affecting the treasury and in which the judicial responsibility of the nation is invoked as a factor of prime importance, in a manner more consonant with the law and less exposed to an abuse of the status of the claimant. The same firm which the imperial memorandum holds to be so clearly in the right, added in the memorial, to the value of the cattle, fixed ad libitum, without any other basis than the opinion of certain military commanders in regard to a slight portion of the same, the enormous sum of 200,000 bolivars under the head of profit lost on account of the seizure.

It is to be observed that the Venezuelan law which regulates the mode of preferring claims against the nation, does not admit testimonial proof unless it can be shown that the officer who caused the damage refused to give the voucher in the case, or that it was impossible to obtain it in good time. Without a formal trial in which interests are involved that have to be defended simultaneously, as those of the nation and of the claimant are in such case, there can be no regular judgment, unless the alleged right be established prima facie by simple and natural conclusion. Therefore, the decree of January 24, 1901, which the ambassador's memorandum criticises so sharply, left, with praiseworthy foresight, the way open to all claimants for all just redress.

In the regular intercourse of civilized nations, there occurs no difference when the matter submitted to mutual examination is defined or provided for by the absolute principle of national sovereignty. If the class of claims relating to property owned within the territory does not come exclusively under the law of the country, it would behoove the other party to prove it by representing such a statement as would upset all maxims, arguments, and opinions advanced by Venezuela. As for the rest, the coercion hinted at in the memorandum would be inadmissible for the lack of the slightest grievance on which to base it; contrary to law, because bent of the achievement of a purpose satisfactorily provided for by the laws of the country; unusual because brought into operation without any alteration of the mutual cordiality between the Government exercising it and that to which it would be applied; and contrary to its intent in its effects, because endangering in favor of a few the interest of others, which perhaps are more worthy of consideration on the part of the Imperial Government, as are those of all respectable Germans settled here, who are so peace loving, and always so deeply interested in seeing that no obstacle will be raised against the development of trade between their Fatherland and Venezuela.

In laying the just protest of the Republic against the views, imputations, and the purposes of the memorandum of the 11th of December last before all friendly powers, as well as the German Empire itself, in this document, it is imperative to add that Venezuela, while objecting to the intrinsic animus of the ambassador's communication, finds, and could as an independent nation but find, in the ostensible object of its being represented to the Government at Washington, nothing but the rational effect of a political principle of a general character bearing on the integrity of the rights of the American Hemisphere, which must always receive the joint or independent support of all the sovereign republics of the New World, and to which is already due in part the organization of the two international congresses convened on the powerful initiative of the Great Republic of the North.

IMPERIAL LEGATION OF GERMANY IN VENEZUELA.

(PROMEMORIA.)

(Confidential.)

The minister resident of the German Empire, has had the honor to expound orally to the Venezuelan Government the objections of Germany to various dispositions of the decree of the 24th of January of this year concerning the settlement of claims growing out of the war.

The objections bear on the following points;

1. The decree admits to examination only such claims as originated since the 23d of May, 1899. Germany desires that claims which arose prior to that date be also taken into consideration.

2. Under the decree, payment of the claims is to be effected by means of certificates of a new debt to be created by the revolution. From the experience of past years, this mode of payment does not seem to be acceptable. The German Government rather hopes that it will be practicable to reach, with the Venezuelan Government, an agreement for another mode of payment.

3. Article 4 of the decree sends the claimants, who may not declare themselves satisfied with the decision of the Commission, before the high Federal court, in accordance with the provisions of the decree of February 14, 1893.

The German Government is not ready to subject to the provisions of this decree the indemnity claims of its proteges. It would rather have the functions of the Commission confined to the examination and proof of the claims, and reserve the final determination of the amount to be allowed to each claimant for a free and amicable arrangement between the Venezuelan Government and the imperial legation.

The sum total of the claims thus far made known to the imperial legation amounts to something like 2,750,000 bolivars. The Imperial Government sincerely cherishes the wish that it will reach, as soon as it can be done, an agreement with the Venezuelan Government concerning these claims, and deems it natural that they should immediately be examined, as to their validity, by the Venezuelan authorities.

The imperial legation, therefore, will make no difficulty in urging the German claimants to lay, without delay, their claims before the Commission created by the decree of the 24th of January of this year, as soon as an agreement shall have been effected to the effect that the functions of the Commission shall be confined to the certification of the claims, but that the final decision regarding their settlement shall be reserved for a direct agreement between the Venezuelan Government and imperial legation; which agreement will have to cover specifically:

1. The final determination of the sums to be paid.
2. The mode of payment.
3. The settlement of the claims dating from a period earlier than the 23d of May, 1899.

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE
UNITED STATES OF VENEZUELA.

(Memorandum.)

(Confidential.)

After careful consideration of the confidential memorandum of the honorable legation of Germany, dated the 8th instant, and presenting its views concerning the decree of the 24th of January last for the settlement of claims growing out of the war, it is found, with regret, that all its remarks revolve around an idea to which it is impossible to assent without detriment to the general principle that secures to every state the right to establish its own domestic legislation. On the one hand, the memorandum tends to deny the judicial validity of the law of February 14, 1873, regarding the manner of preferring claims against the nation, and, on the other hand, endeavors to restrict, in a certain sense, the action of the Government as affecting the claims submitted to the board of classification, recently created. Such ideas, which amount to making an exception in favor of German interests in the Republic possible, could be entertained if there were two legislations in existence—one intended to govern the interests of the Nationals and another relating to the property of foreigners. No long meditation is necessary to realize the grave injury that would be done by such a dual legislation to the nations, like the greater part of those in America in whose development foreign immigration and the influx of foreign capital are important factors. In the course of a few lustres the inequality of conditions between natives and foreigners would create numberless difficulties which would go so far as to make national sovereignty a mere illusion of fancy.

It is a maxim of sound logic, demonstrated by science and confirmed by practice, that the most positive results toward the desired social harmony are obtained from equality in the operation of justice. If a state should admit in its statutes governing any one point articles intended respectively for various classes, every judicial doctrine would eventually be overturned by special exemptions and privileges, born of concessions foreign, and even antagonistic to the political concert of nations. The difference in the civil status between them (the nationals and the aliens) would involve ceaseless conflicts which could not be kept within bounds, even through the harmonious action of the powers intrusted with the duty of enforcing the law.

The desire to remove forever any apprehension in that respect gave occasion for many important debates in the celebrated International American conferences of 1889-90. It gave birth to the principle of absolute equality of civil rights for nationals and aliens, which received the approval of fifteen of the delegations there present, and was immediately embodied in the Venezuelan constitution. The principle not only observes and follows the soundest doctrines of international law, but wards off the grave difficulties that would necessarily arise from the gradual increase of the stream of immigration which for years has been flowing from Europe to the American regions. The existence of this principle at once guarantees to the foreigner the enjoyment of his property in foreign lands without any greater risk than that shared by all his associates, frees him, to his great material and moral advantage, from any bias on the part of the ruler or the owner of the soil he treads, and makes of him a sound and desirable element, capable of cooperating, for his own good, in the work of general advancement. Hence the law of February 14, 1873, far from affording the slightest ground for difficulties, constitutes, both in practice and law, the fulfillment of a necessity.

It was communicated to the Government of the German Empire, as well as to all foreign governments, by means of a note addressed to the Hon. von Gulich on the 22d of that month, under No. 77 of the first division. Its text did not establish the slightest discrimination in favor of the natives, and the judicial body that was given cognizance of claims was then, as it is now, the highest in the Republic, so that it had in view not only the importance of the case, but also the facility of procedure. The promulgation of the laws which affect interests established in the territory is but the operation of immanent sovereignty. No government or state can protest against such operation without injury to one of the most generally recognized and universally practiced maxims of international law. It would be easy to invoke authorities ad infinitum in its support, but let it suffice to name the German Heffter, the Englishman Twiss, and the American Wheaton, all three writers of distinguished renown. The first declares that "the laws of each state govern all property of any nature whatever found within the territory" (par. 3811). The second affirms that "the right of civil and criminal legislation touching all property and persons within the territory of a nation is inherent in the right of dominion." He adds: "The laws of each nation bind, of natural right, all property lying within its territory in the same way as the persons residing therein, whether natives or aliens, and govern and regulate all acts performed and all contracts executed within its boundaries" (par. 150). Wheaton is just as explicit. According to him (par. 78) "the principle under consideration is the immediate consequence of the independence of nations. Every nation (he says) possesses and exercises exclusive sovereignty and jurisdiction over the whole extent of the territory, whence it follows that the laws of each state govern, of right, all property, real and personal, within its territory, in the same way as the inhabitants of the territory, whether natives thereof or not, and affect and regulate all the acts performed or the contracts executed within its boundaries."

The practice of conferring upon the high courts the cognizance of acts that may give rise to claims because attributed to public agents is not exclusively that of Venezuela. The law of judicial organization of the German Empire, promulgated on the 27th of January, 1877, retained the provisions of the states in which it was held that actions against public officers were more or less absolutely subordinated to the previous decision of a superior authority, with the proviso that such a previous decision be confined to determining whether the officer had exceeded his powers or neglected to perform any of his duties and with the additional condition that the decision be given by the higher administrative tribunal of the state, or in the absence of such a tribunal, by the supreme court of the Empire. (Art. 11.)

In his study of the latest imperial legislation Demonbynes notes (Chap. IV, Sec. IV) that the civil court takes cognizance in the first instance, among other cases, of claims preferred against officials of the Empire on account of abuse of power or neglect. Further on, dealing with the claims that every state may turn over to the local courts, he cites those preferred against the state itself, on account of measures taken by the administrative authorities or of faults imputed to officials.

Over forty years ago there was organized in the United States the so-called "Court of Claims," to which are referred all the petitions or bills asking or providing for the satisfaction of private claims against the Government, based on some act of Congress, or some contract, express or implied, etc. This court has the power to lay down rules for its government; it may punish for contempt, appoint commissioners, and exercise such authority as may be necessary to give effect to the powers that are conferred upon it. * * * Its decision in any case prosecuted in conformity to the provisions of the law bars forever any subsequent claim or action against the United States arising from the matter involved in the controversy. (Revised Statutes, secs. 1060, 1070, 1093).

Indeed this method of dealing with and deciding questions which, from their nature, can not be conclusively examined in any department of executive power is both wise and practical. The judicial hearing, to which recourse must unavoidably be had in many cases of claims, excludes, or makes impossible, executive action which can not be brought into play except within the bounds defined by law for each concrete case, beyond any formula of investigation. The necessity of resorting, generally, to the procedure indicated by the law of February 14, 1873, lies in the various circumstances of the claims, in the abnormal conditions under which they arise at times, in the objections that may be created by a disposition to exaggerate facts, and in other reasons which demand the attention of the legislators, and were no doubt present to the mind of the editors of the latest Civil Code of the German Empire when they laid down in article 254 the following provident rule:

"If the aggrieved party should, by some fault of its own, have contributed in causing the damage, the obligation to indemnify and the amount of the indemnity shall depend on the circumstance, especially on that of knowing whether the injury was caused chiefly by one party or the other.

"This provision shall also be applicable when the fault of the aggrieved party merely consists in having failed to call the attention of the delinquent to the risk of inflicting injury of which the offense had not or was not bound to have knowledge, or in omitting to evade or minimize the injury."

Article 343 of the same code, on account of its analogy with the subject-matter, likewise seems to be worthy of record:

"If the penalty measured should be out of proportion to the injury, the debtor may ask that it be reduced to an equitable amount. In appreciating this amount, the court shall take into account not only the pecuniary interest, but also any other legitimate interest of the creditor."

Prince Bismarck was no doubt inspired by considerations of a nature similar, in a certain way, to that which makes it indispensable to apply judicial proceedings to the investigation of the origin of certain claims and to the proof of their validity, when he expressed the view communicated in February, 1884, to the Hon. Mancini by the Count de Launay, and inserted under No. 27, among the documents laid before the Italian Parliament by the royal ministry of foreign relations, on the 6th of December, 1894. "The Prince [wrote de Launay] refrains as much as possible from injecting the policy of Germany in anything that may smack of intervention in favor of speculators who undertake transactions in a foreign country, with a full knowledge of doing so for their account and at their risk." And while the respectability and the manly deportment of the Germans settled in this country could not suggest the idea that, in regard to their claims, there could exist cases like those which the eminent German statesman had in mind, this view goes far, on account of its scope and practical import, to add great strength to the reasons on which the legislator based his action when he gave to the highest judicial body of the country cognizance of the claims preferred by the nationals or the foreigners.

The foregoing makes it clear that the law of February 14, 1873, apart from the undeniable right with which it was promulgated, from the weighty precedents that sanction it, and from its value as integral part of the domestic legislation of Venezuela, combines the only conditions of procedure that are available to prosecute any claim against the Republic by the way of justice.

If a departure was made in 1893, and at the present time, from its provisions, and a special rule established for the examination and classification of the claims growing out of the war, the fact finds its explanation beforehand in the exceptional character of the case which was the transformation into a government of what had originally been a revolution.

As soon as the claims presented by German subjects should come to be examined under other conditions than those provided by statute for the others, the doctrine maintained by Venezuela, touching the equality of civil rights for natives and aliens, and which is part of her constitution, would receive a severe blow. Neither the law of February 14, 1873, nor the decree of January 24 last, can operate adversely to the rights of those who propose, or have, to prosecute claims growing out of the recent war, all the less as the procedure indicated for all those that may be submitted to the board of classification must prove uniform in its course and effects. Moreover, the Government foreseeing cases exceptionally of a negative character has left the judicial way opened, with its well-known rules, to all those who may propose or believe themselves entitled to the redress of some right.

By reason of these practices and principles and of the situation necessarily created by them, it is unable to concur in the views of the respectable imperial legation concerning the alleged inefficiency of the law of 1873, for the purpose of passing upon applications of this character, nor is it practicable to assent, in regard to the German claims growing out of the last war, to the proposition of restricting the action of the board of classification that is to take cognizance of them; and as for the claims anterior to the 23d of May the same law of 1873 points out the way.

IMPERIAL LEGATION OF GERMANY IN VENEZUELA,

MR. MINISTER: I have seen with regret, from the esteemed confidential memorandum of the 19th of this month, that the Venezuelan Government is not disposed to enter into an agreement for the settlement of German claims growing out of the last civil war in the manner that I had suggested, in accord with my Government, in my memorandum of the 8th of this month. Under the circumstances I have been instructed by my Government to declare that, as regards the interests of its protégés it finds itself constrained to refuse its assent to the decree of the 24th of January of this year, relative to the organization of a commission for the examination and determination of the claims. This dissent also applies to the Executive decrees of February 14, 1873, and June 9, 1893, whose dispositions can not be considered as binding by Government in the settlement of the German claims.

While having the honor to bring the foregoing to the knowledge of your excellency, in obedience to the Imperial Government's instructions, I avail myself of the opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

SCHMIDT LEDA.

The Most Excellent Minister of Foreign Relations to the United States of Venezuela, DOCTOR BLANCO.

No. 404.]

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
BUREAU OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAW,
Caracas, March 30, 1901.

MR. MINISTER: In replying to your note No. 190, of the 24th instant, I can not conceal from your excellency the surprise experienced by the Chief of the Executive and the whole Government on finding that it made no mention of the principles of international law which warrant and vindicate the dispositions taken by the Venezuelan Government in the matter of claims for acts imputed to officers who act or have acted in their public capacity. The honorable German legation, ignoring all the views, precedents, and arguments set forth in the memorandum of the 19th, and which affirm the principle of strict sovereignty on which Venezuela based her promulgation of the existing regulations on the subject, comes out, in its reply of the 24th, with a denial, in the name of its Government, of the validity of the long-standing laws of the Republic, without any other ground in justification thereof than that which might be taken in an effort to create a discrimination, objectionable because prejudicial, unjust, and antijudicial, between the foreigners who come to a country and the natives of that country.

It can not escape the enlightened judgment of your excellency, or the learned discernment of the Imperial Government that it is impossible to admit, in the order of relations that regulate and maintain the moral intercourse of nations, practices or principles apt to redound to the detriment of the domestic sovereignty of one of them. Hence does the Government of the Republic, while it fully appreciates its harmonious relations with Germany, and values as a most beneficial factor the gradual increase in this territory of the population coming from the Empire, deems it imperative to reaffirm its resolution to abide by its domestic legislation in all that appertains to this question or other similar ones; by any other course it would create the possibility of imparting a double character to the judicial effects of the existing institutions, thereby weakening the maxims best known to and most practiced by the family of nations, and impairing the sovereignty of the Republic. And thus, while reiterating, as it does, the categorical views of the memorandum of the 19th of March, it finds itself in a position where it must declare itself that it can not admit any opinion which does or may involve the slightest disavowal of the right that Venezuela had to enact the several parts of its domestic legislation. Among these are included the decree of February 14, 1873, that of June 9, 1893, and that of the 24th of January last, none of which can be considered in conflict, but rather in conformity with the principles on which rests the public law of nations.

The perfect accord that has always happily existed and must continue to exist between Venezuela and Germany, will manifest itself on this question as efficiently as on all others, by means of a simple reconsideration of the circumstances that distinguish it and of the arguments that put it in its true light.

Accept, excellency, the renewed expressions and assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

IMPERIAL LEGATION OF GERMANY IN VENEZUELA,
Caracas, July 16, 1901.

MR. MINISTER: In compliance with the desire expressed by the provisional President of the Republic in the conference I had the honor to have with him on the 11th of this month, I take the liberty of repeating to your excellency herein below in writing the proposals I have had the honor to lay orally before your excellency, as well as before the provisional President of the Republic.

I have to restate here to your excellency the motives that have led the Imperial Government to the opinion that the method devised by the Venezuelan Government for the examination and classification of the claims of German subjects who have suffered in their property or interests during the last civil wars is not in accord with the position the German Empire has the right to take for the protection of the interests of those of its subjects who live in foreign countries. These motives were sufficiently discussed in the memorandum of the minister resident of the Empire, Dr. Schmidt Leda, dated the 8th of March of this year.

If at the stage reached by the discussions had on this subject I nevertheless now make an effort to prevail upon the Venezuelan Government to accept the proposals that meet the just desires of the Imperial Government, and are in every way to be considered as an equitable solution of the question, it is chiefly because I did not wish for my part to leave anything untried in order to bring to an end a situation that is awkward for the friendly relations of our two countries.

The proposal which I already had the honor to make orally to your excellency is as follows:

The Venezuelan Government on the one part and the imperial legation on the other would each name an arbitrator, so that both would jointly examine the claims of German subjects growing out of the civil wars.

Whenever the arbitrators should agree, the payment of the indemnity would be effected without any delay whatever, and all cases in which the arbitrators could not come to an agreement would be made the subject of special conferences between the Venezuelan Government and the imperial legation. If these were likewise barren of result then the matter would in advance be deferred to the arbitral tribunal of The Hague for a decision.

While believing that this my proposal meets all the demands of equity, I would nevertheless lay special stress on the point that should the Venezuelan Government have any reason whatever for not being suited with it, I stand ready to accede to any other solution of the question by which the cooperation of the authorities of the Empire in the examination of the claims of German subjects and in the determination of the indemnities appertaining thereto, will be assured. Such a cooperation is the only foundation on which a solution of the question can be established.

While emphasizing, in conclusion, the fact that the Imperial Government attaches the greatest importance to a satisfactory solution of this matter, permit me to express the hope that your excellency's high Government will not allow my effort to reach an agreement on this point to go in vain.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

The Most Excellent Dr. EDUARDO BLANCO,
Minister Resident of Foreign Relations of the United States of Venezuela.

No. 898.]

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
BUREAU OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAW,
Caracas, July 23, 1901.

SIR: The Government has given the most careful attention to the contents of your note of the 16th of this month of July, No. 428, from which it could infer or confirm the necessity of submitting to a concrete criterion a question that from its origin, circumstances, and effects requires nothing but an examination in a strictly judicial sense, easy of interpretation and simple in results. This department means to avail itself of such a criterion in its reply to the memorandum that your worthy predecessor handed on the 8th of March last, touching the position of the legation in the matter of the claims of German subjects; and, holding that there is no better method for reaching the concurrence of views which the Venezuelan Government desires, and you yourself urge, it earnestly desires that you resort to it.

You say that notwithstanding the stage reached by the discussion of this matter you nevertheless endeavor to bring the Venezuelan Government to an acceptance of earlier proposals; a proposition to which this ministry can not ascribe the meaning that you seem to want to give it, for there is, properly speaking, no formal controversy thus far, since the correspondence has gone no further than a statement from Dr. Schmidt Leda, and the arguments offered by the Government of the Republic, and as yet unrefuted, even in part, by the honorable imperial legation.

The essential point now dealt with, and for the first time advanced by you, is one of transcendent importance to Venezuela, for it touches upon nothing less than our domestic legislation, with whose spirit the national sovereignty is closely bound. Any action or cooperation foreign to this spirit would tend to impair principles with which you are perfectly acquainted, which this ministry set forth and expounded in its memorandum of the 19th of March, and which are observed by all the nations, without any reservation whatever, because in them international concert finds its greatest guarantee.

If nations should legislate for certain classes and the others were given the right to claim protection other than that which the organized local powers are bound to extend, there would be no means of establishing that uniformity of obligations which is the foundation of civil order, and which is logically the consolidation of the duties of the members of a community. Venezuela depends on a legislation that is ample in the sense of protecting the interests of all, and the provisions that precisely regulate the prosecution of claims against the nation afford abundantly adequate guarantees for the obtaining of just indemnities.

You could find in the texts which this ministry had the honor to invoke on the 19th of March in favor of the efficiency and validity of the domestic legislation for the claims under consideration the evidence of the duty imposed by the international law itself upon the Governments to treat the nationals and aliens, within the civil spheres, on terms of absolute equality. You could also see in the body of the memorandum how all the precedents of a legal order coincide, both in Germany and in the United States, in affirming the action of the courts, not that of the Executive power, in cases analogous to that which is discussed in this correspondence.

You will realize the difficulties that would arise in any trial in open court from the intervention of any power which would be unable to follow the proper procedure for the thorough investigation of the alleged facts. Hence spring the necessary separation of powers and the resulting limitation of duties. It is not a disregard on the part of the General Government of the concerns of the nation, or an evasion of the results of its obligations, but the necessity to safeguard the domestic sovereignty embodied in the national laws. So that, as to the point made by you in your note of the 16th, there is no difference other than that concerning the ways and means which each party advocates to arrive at the identical end of making fair reparation for injuries suffered by the act of lawful authorities in the exercise of their public office. You insist that the cooperation of the authorities of the Empire in the examination of claims must be guaranteed, and Venezuela, on behalf of her sovereignty, and by virtue of her domestic legislation, maintains that such cooperation is wholly inadmissible. The apparent dissent lies, not in the object aimed at, but in the manner of attaining it. The most perfect agreement is therefore at hand if the matter be only subjected to the circumstances that define it under the operation of international law.

Among the cases examined and classified by the board extraordinarily organized on the 24th of January last there are several in which German subjects are concerned, as you may see in No. 8262 of the Gaceta Oficial. Those that have thought that their interests would be better subserved by keeping away from the legal remedy or recourse need not bring forth any outside action in order to carry their rights or allege some other circumstances. There remains open to them the easy or expeditious way that may or must make fair reparation for them.

It would be impossible to admit them to any privilege that would impair the rights of the other foreigners and of all the nationals. If the end that is sought is to be in harmony with the rights of all, the way to it must be in equal conformity with the principle of justice. And inasmuch as these were, more or less, the arguments offered you by the President in the conference of the 11th, in repeating them here, I carry out the instructions of the Chief Magistrate that I shall express the hope that, upon reconsidering the case, you will accept the grounds on which the Venezuelan Government declines to assent to the proposed intervention of the legation in the conduct of a matter which, far from exposing the interested parties to danger if they trust the procedure of domestic legislation, will always find therein the assurance of being examined in accordance with the most strict precepts of reason and justice.

The earnest desire of the Government of the Republic to maintain the most satisfactory accord with that of the German Empire on all points that may come up for elucidation between them, moves this Ministry to insist upon the foregoing ideas, not from any purely doctrinal point of view, but for the sake of mutual cordiality, which is so necessary and advantageous when the discussion bears, not on ephemeral matters, but on everlasting interests, as are those which are identified with the stability of the law of the country, for the good of the foreigners themselves who hold their property in the Republic.

I take pleasure in renewing to your excellency the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

IMPERIAL LEGATION OF GERMANY IN VENEZUELA,
Caracas, December 31, 1901.

MR. MINISTER: Several Germans have filed in the imperial legation claims for the damages growing out of the last Venezuelan civil wars. These claims have been carefully and thoroughly examined, first by me, and then by my Government. As a result, the total amount of the claims that have been found valid aggregates 1,718,815.67 bolivars.

The several indemnity claims are set forth in the accompanying statement. The documents and declarations of witnesses, therein mentioned and addressed in justification of these claims, are sent herewith in certified copies. The originals of these documents are in the imperial legation.

By direction of my Government, I beg that your excellency will see to it that the sum of 1,718,815.67 bolivars be paid to me in satisfaction of these claims.

Accept, Mr. Minister, on this occasion, the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
BUREAU OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAW,
Caracas, January 8, 1902.

SIR: As the matter referred to in your note of the 31st of December, No. 927, has already been the object of special correspondence with your legation and as the arguments advanced by the Government to demonstrate the impossibility of giving diplomatic examination to what appertains to the domestic legation of the Republic have not been considered, and much less refuted by the legation, the actual reason for your request relative to the payment of the sum in which you estimate the amount of the German claims can hardly be discovered. The Executive power does not believe, nor is it even presumable, that one of the most enlightened governments of Europe, as is that of the German Empire, and one of the most respectable missions, as is that which it has accredited to Venezuela, will pass upon the merits of a case before examining all its circumstances jointly with the party whose business it is to give it a legal course. Since the date of the reply to the memorandum of the Most Excellent Dr. Schmidt Leda and of the note addressed to him on the 30th of March last, you have had a conversation with the President of the Republic in which he advanced new arguments in the same sense, which my predecessor repeated in his reply to your note of the 16th of July. No objection was ever made by the legation to the ideas there expressed; and the very circumstance that it was then stated that several of the German claimants had complied with the provisions of the decree of January 24, 1901, led to believe that the discussion was closed and that the other claimants would vindicate their rights in accordance with the procedure laid down in the legislation bearing on the special subject. At any rate and with a view of satisfying you as to the attention with which the Government has considered the general question of claims, it will suffice that I make a statement relative to this very concrete case of the German interests. Besides, paying to the Company of the Great Railway of Venezuela the sum of 113,527.44 bolivars for transportation furnished during the present administration and admitting, in its favor, the further sum of 887,632.90 bolivars on account of claims presented to preceding Governments, payments on that account in the amount of 290,000 bolivars, have been effected with the firm intention of continuing to extinguish the debt, according to the agreement.

The German firms of Steinworth & Co., Brewer, Moller & Co., and Van Dessel & Co., of San Cristobal, and that of A. Ermen & Co., of Puerto Cabello, which submitted their vouchers in good time, and with which arrangements were effected relative to their respective claims, have received the balance of the same, amounting for the four to 369,959.41 bolivars. The board of examination and classification created by the decree of January 24, awarded various amounts in favor of the German subjects Beckman & Co., Becker, Brun & Co., A. Ermen & Co., M. Freym, R. and O. Kolster, Lesuer Romer & Baasch, and Marcus & Co.

It is seen from the foregoing statement that, in spite of the trying circumstances that the Venezuelan treasury has undergone, General Crespo's Government has paid large sums of money on account of allowed claims of German subjects. If a few saw fit not to avail themselves of the provisions of the decree of January 24, 1901, it was probably owing to some defect in the evidence or to a purpose, wholly unacceptable, of seeking payment through a channel other than that of the constitutional law of the Republic, which would result in obvious injustice to the subjects of His Majesty themselves, since the change of procedure would suppose certain prerogatives in favor of those who have not observed the directions of the law as against those who have abided by its provisions.

In that decree justice and foresight were carried to the point of leaving the field open to those who might not adhere to the decisions that would befall their claims, for seeking the enforcement of their rights through the action natural in every case that can be prosecuted in accordance with the law. The supreme court of the country is precisely that which is entrusted with such action and thus its decisions afford, in advance and in a singular manner, the guarantee of the law and the security of justice. It would be impossible to take any other course without throwing in the utmost confusion one of the most important branches of the public administration. It would be enough to establish in that respect the slightest precedent contrary to the law of the country, to turn all the respectable legations accredited to the Republic into mere bodies of ascertainment to the detriment of their own high functions and to bring down the Federal Executive to the station of a mere payer of claims, adjusted by a power other than his, without further examination or proceedings. You are aware that, in the matter of claims, justice requires that all the circumstances connected with each case shall be investigated, that certain particulars shall be looked into comparatively, that the evidence shall be scrutinized, and that the other formalities shall be observed which, in default of the courts, can only be performed by special bodies, like that created by the decree of January 24, 1901.

As the Government can not find within the sphere of its powers the means of solving the question preferred by you in your note of the 31st of December, and as it believes at the same time that there may be valid claims that were not presented in good time for justifiable reasons, it has decided to lay the matter before the Congress at its next session. In the meanwhile and in view of the fact that the papers and other accompaniments sent by you are not originals but mere copies, they will be kept here as part of the note I have had the honor to answer.

Be pleased to accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my distinguished consideration.

MR. MINISTER: In reply to your excellency's note of the 8th of last month, which I have communicated to my Government, I have the honor to say, by its direction, as follows: My Government takes the standpoint that the provisions of the national law of Venezuela can not restrain it from presenting the valid claims of its subjects against the Venezuelan Government; it considers as valid the German claims presented in my note of December 31, and upholds them in all their import. As to the manner in which the Venezuelan Government will place itself in a position to meet its obligations, it is left for it to decide. With regard to the evident straightened circumstances of Venezuela, my Government is willing to have proper patience, for a short while. It expects, however, an early and full settlement of its claims, and reserves, therefore, to itself to soon take up the subject anew.

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
BUREAU OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAW,
Caracas, February 18, 1902.

SIR: Inasmuch as you say in your note of the 13th instant, No. 80, that your Government holds that the provisions of the national law of Venezuela can not restrain it from presenting the valid claims of its subjects against the Government of the Republic, it is to be presumed that the legation did not communicate to its immediate superior the reasons taken from international law, together with those taken from the law of the country, which this ministry submitted, in the name of the Executive power, to show the impossibility of withdrawing, even for a moment, the general class of claims from the action prescribed by the laws of Venezuela. There is reason to believe that if the arguments offered to you and your worthy predecessors had been considered by the Government of Berlin, it would not have taken so absolute a position, or at least would have prepared itself to refute the doctrine maintained by Venezuela.

In the intercourse of nations, especially when the relations are so cordial and of so long standing as those cultivated by the Republic and the Empire, it does not seem possible that each party can enforce its own ideas in regard to matters coming under the jurisdiction of the others. This would be tantamount to give to the will of the State that would advance such ideas extraterritorial effects, in entire contradiction of the doctrine established and upheld in a categorical manner by public law. And, if it should happen that the nation advancing such pretensions be one of the greatest in population and resources, the intent would prove even more incomprehensible, for it would mean that, in the reciprocal intercourses of nations, contrary to the rule proclaimed by civilization, the superiority of physical power annuls the political equality of States, without which principle all the rulings of international law would be illusory in effect.

Be pleased to accept, sir, the renewed assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

IMPERIAL LEGATION OF GERMANY IN VENEZUELA,

Caracas, May 5, 1902.

MR. MINISTERIAL DIRECTOR: By direction of my Government, I have the honor to say to your excellency, in reply to the note of February 18 of this year, which was communicated to it word for word, as were all the previous ones of the Venezuelan Government, as follows:

My Government, with a full knowledge of the arguments advanced by the Venezuelan Government has approved the position stated in my note of the 13th of February, and does not understand how the Venezuelan Government came to suspect that these arguments were kept from it by the imperial legation.

It insists, on the other hand, that the provisions of the national laws of Venezuela can not restrain it from pressing valid claims of its subjects against the Venezuelan Government. If the latter objects that the diplomatic prosecution of such claims constitutes an attack on the domestic legislation of the country and is therefore inadmissible under the principles of international law, my Government for its part, holds that the domestic laws of Venezuela which, in such cases, bar diplomatic representations, are not consonant with the principles of international law since, according to the view maintained by the Venezuelan Government, every form of diplomatic intervention could be barred by means of national legislation. My Government believes that the claims under consideration must be settled through the diplomatic channel, because the procedure adopted by the Venezuelan Government does not disclose adequate guarantee of a satisfactory settlement of those claims. Besides, on previous occasions, as for instance, the settlement of the claims growing out of the Venezuelan civil war of 1892, the German claims were settled by means of diplomatic arrangements between the two Governments.

My Government therefore maintains the demand it has made, and cherishes the hope that the Venezuelan Government will give satisfaction to the claims of the German claimants for their full amount, and in a manner consistent with the friendly relations that have heretofore existed between the two countries.

Accept, Mr. Minister Director, on this occasion, the renewed assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

VON PILGRIM BALTAZZI.

The Most Excellent Ministerial Director at the Ministry of Foreign Relations of the United States of Venezuela, MR. MANUEL FOMBANA PALACIO.

No. 619.]

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
BUREAU OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAW,
Caracas, May 9, 1902.

SIR: I have the honor to refer to your note No. 261, dated the 5th instant.

It deals with the subject of claims, and, as it might be said that on this point the Venezuelan Government has already sufficiently expressed its sentiment and set forth at great length the reason which justify it, the President, to whom I communicated without delay the contents of your note, believes that it will be sufficient to give a brief explanation of the three points or views therein indicated, in order to bring the Government of the Republic and the honorable imperial legation to a perfect accord in regard to the judicial impossibility to admit diplomatic intervention in matters defined, as that is, by the laws of the country. You say that, against the allegation of the Venezuelan Government that such intervention is contrary to the law of the country and therefore inadmissible under the international law, the Imperial Government holds that national laws which exclude diplomatic intervention are not in harmony with international law, because, according to the view of the powers of the Republic, all intervention of this character could be barred by means of municipal legislation. A consideration of this difference suggests the supposition that in the appreciation of the arguments advanced by Venezuela since the memorandum of March 19, 1901, no account has been taken, involuntarily, perhaps, of the correlative train of ideas, for the series of arguments used by the Government in the course of correspondence to demonstrate the validity of the statutes enacted by the Republic in this connection was, from the very first, taken from the international viewpoint even more than from the national. It would be tedious to reproduce here the doctrine of the European and American writers and statesmen who, together with the precedents established by the most sober and civilized nations, Germany among them, were invoked all along in support of the law that governs the general question of claims in Venezuela. It would be equally unnecessary to repeat the maxims and arguments that the ministers of foreign affairs had occasion to adduce in order to confirm the principle of sovereignty, unmovable of itself, with which the Venezuelan State inspired that part of its legislation.

Your language does not purport (at least we must think so) that there are two international laws, one for certain nations and another for the remainder. But even though it were so, to the shame of justice, it would still remain incomprehensible how Germany, after subscribing in her treaty with Colombia (art. 20) to the exclusion of any diplomatic intervention in claims or complaints regularly examined or prosecuted in accordance with the law of the country, should now deny to Venezuela (who has likewise subscribed to it with other European nations and has tacitly made it a part of its constitutional regulations) the right to maintain it in regard to one of the questions in which the fair and free application of the law is most needed in order to avoid damages and difficulties of mutual consequence, and even to strengthen the reciprocal interests relating thereto.

Another idea indicated in the note is that the procedure established by the Venezuelan Government does not disclose adequate guarantees of a satisfactory settlement. This discloses to a certain extent, besides an imputation, serious in its form and inadmissible, because baseless, a tendency to acknowledge that external action is more efficient than the legitimate vigor of the law. The German Empire is precisely one of the political states that have most justly won general applause and admiration for the spirit of harmony it managed to infuse in its common law in order to maintain in all its provisions that amount of respectability and importance that is commensurate with its purpose; and it is certain that the Government of His Majesty, charged with the duty of watching over the prestige of that legislation would never allow, without a protest, another power to claim for some foreign influence any superiority or priority over the domestic jurisdiction. Such might be the impression created by your language. For Venezuela to admit that diplomatic action is superior to the operation of her laws would be like a contravention of the privileges of her indispensable sovereignty.

You state, lastly, that on previous occasions, the claims of 1892 for instance, the German cases were settled by means of diplomatic arrangements between the two Governments. In this there must be some misapprehension, for there is no record whatever in the part of the archives of this department relating to the German Empire of any diplomatic convention concluded for that purpose. It appears, on the contrary, that on the 3d of December, 1893, this ministry represented to one of your predecessors the impossibility to intervene, as requested, for the payment of a claim presented by the German firms of Max Reinboth & Co., and Christian Ritter, of Puerto Cabello, on account of losses suffered during the war of 1892. The case was turned over to the board referred to in the decree of June 9 of that same year, 1893, by which the method of classifying such claims was established. With a view of finding what relation your statement possibly had with the facts, I applied for information to the department that had charge at that time of that class of business, and the data supplied by it showed that the cases presented by German subjects were classed by the board and settled with the same kind of bonds as those in which the debt of the revolution was converted. So that the proceedings taken in regard to the classification of those cases were in no wise different from those followed in regard to the claims of the Venezuelans; and if the legation eventually took any part therein it was merely that of receiving, in the currency provided for the payment of all, the amounts allowed and classified, without the slightest derogation to the decrees that regulate the examination and proof of the claims of that period. The action of the board and the validity of the decree of June 9, 1893, were then and there recognized, according to the record on file in the archives of the ministry of finance. The list presented by the imperial legation was nothing more than a copy of the corresponding part of the general books of the board of examination.

The President, who looks upon the German population settled in the Republic as an element of salutary influence, is positive that, if the protection of the Venezuelan legislation is appealed to, their action would not find the action of justice wanting. And as the greater right always carries in law the speedier adjustment, those who will adapt their pretensions to the dictates of equity, have little reason to fear unsatisfactory results. Moreover, there can never arise between governments so friendly united as those of Venezuela and Germany any occasion of quarrel from any decision that may be legitimately taken in conformity to proceeding consistent with the sovereignty of the nation.

Accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

No. 825.]

CARACAS, December 7, 1908.

MR. MINISTER: In the name of the Government of His Majesty the Emperor of Germany, I have the honor to make to the Government of the United States of Venezuela the following communication:

The Imperial Government, has in good time, taken knowledge of the note of the ministry of foreign relations of the Republic of Venezuela of the 9th of May last.

By that note the Venezuelan Government rejected the demands of the Imperial Government in respect to the payment of the German claims growing out of the civil wars from 1898 to 1900 and, in support of its negative attitude, referred to arguments previously advanced. The Imperial Government, even after considering those arguments anew, does not think it can recognize them as probatory.

The Government of the Republic argues, in the first place, that by reason of the domestic legislation of the country, the settlement by diplomatic action of the claims of foreigners growing out of the wars is not admissible. It thus sets up the theory that diplomatic intervention may be barred by domestic legislation. This theory is not in conformity with international law, since the question of deciding whether such intervention is admissible is to be determined not according to provisions of domestic legislation, but in accordance with the principles of international law.

The Venezuelan Government, aiming to demonstrate that the diplomatic prosecution of claims is inadmissible, further cites article 20 of the treaty of amity, commerce and navigation between the German Empire and the Republic of Colombia of the 23d of July, 1892. But this argument does not seem to have weight, first because the treaty is operative between the Empire and Colombia only, and besides, because section 3 of the said article in no wise opposes the diplomatic prosecution of German claims growing out of acts committed by the Colombian Government or its agents. The statement of the Venezuelan Government that foreign claims growing out of Venezuelan civil wars have never been settled by diplomatic negotiations is likewise incorrect. For, besides the respective agreements concluded by Venezuela with France in 1885 and with Spain in 1898, there was signed on the 6th of February, 1896, a formal agreement between the then German minister at Caracas and the Venezuelan minister of finance, both commissioned by their respective governments, for the settlement of the German claims growing out of the civil war of 1892.

No greater weight can be attached to the further objection of the Venezuelan Government—that is, that the diplomatic prosecution of the present claims is inadmissible because the said Government has left a way open for their settlement by the decree of January 24, 1901, for the procedure provided by the decree did not, as the Government has been repeatedly informed, afford a guarantee that those claims will receive a fair solution. In the first place, the claims originating at an earlier period than the 23d of May, 1899—that is, prior to the accession of the present President of the Republic—are not, under the decree, to be taken into consideration, whereas Venezuela will be materially held responsible for the acts of its preceding governments. Next, any diplomatic intervention in the decisions of the Commission is barred, no other resource than an appeal to the high Federal court being admitted, notwithstanding the fact that has been proved in various instances that the judicial officers are depending on the Government and, when the occasion arose, have been dismissed from their offices without any formality whatever. Finally, the payment of such of the claims as might be allowed, as established by the Commission, is to be effected in certificates of a new debt of the revolution to be created for the purpose, which certificates, judging from past experience, would be practically worthless.

As a matter of fact, the procedure followed by the Venezuelan Government has not brought about a satisfactory adjustment of the claims. In particular, the few German claims submitted to the Commission have been in part simply thrown out and partly cut down in an obviously arbitrary manner. There is more—the allowed claims have not been paid—but the aggrieved parties have been compelled to submit to a bill that was to be introduced in Congress.

After failing in various attempts to induce the Government of the Republic to amend the decree in the points herein mentioned, the German Government could do no less than to have the claims of the subjects undergo its own examination and to present at once to the Venezuelan Government those that it had found to be valid.

It is true that since then the Venezuelan Government held out the prospect of obtaining a favorable solution of the matter from its Congress. But the law passed by that body in the beginning of the year goes no farther than to repeat the insufficient provisions of the decree of January 14, 1901, and, in addition, only embraces the claims that could not be submitted to the Commission in good time.

Presently the Government conducted the subsequent correspondence in a quasi-insulting tone, and finally published the notes dealing with the subject, among which were some marked "Confidential," without the consent of the Imperial Government, accompanying the publication with a memorandum couched in offensive language.

Notwithstanding the Imperial Government's desire to maintain with the Republic of Venezuela the friendly relations that have existed heretofore, and while it is far from contemplating any disregard of the sovereignty of the Republic or any meddling in its domestic institutions, it can not but perceive in the course taken by the Venezuelan Government an intent to deny to the German claims the satisfaction to which they are entitled under the international law, and believes it, therefore, its duty to take positive action toward an immediate settlement of those claims.

In consequence, the Imperial Government has instructed me to ask that the Venezuelan Government will see to it, without delay, that the German claims which, according to my note of the 31st of December of last year, amount to 1,718,815.67 bolivars, shall be paid.

Furthermore, the treatment accorded by the Government of the Republic to the German claims growing out of the last wars, has led the Imperial Government to believe that the other claims of its subjects against the Republic require protection in order to arrive at a fair solution. As coming under this head there are to be considered the German claims growing out of the present civil war, the sums due to German firms on account of the construction of the slaughterhouse in Caracas, and the amount due to the Great Railway of Venezuela for interests on and amortization of the certificates of the 5 per cent Venezuelan loan of 1896, which it received by way of guarantee of interests. By order of the Imperial Government I have also to ask that the Venezuelan Government will forthwith make a statement in the sense that it recognizes, in principle, those claims as valid, and that it is disposed to accept the decision of a mixed commission for the purpose of having them determined and guaranteed in every particular.

His Majesty's Government hopes that the Government of the Republic will meet the just demands of Germany, and will not compel the Imperial Government to take the satisfaction of the same in its own hands.

At the same time the Imperial Government deems it its duty not to fail to mention that it has been acquainted by the British Government with the latter's claims against Venezuela, and that the two Governments have agreed to take joint action toward securing satisfaction of all their demands.

I have the honor to append a Spanish translation of the foregoing and avail myself of this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

VON PILGRIM BALTAZZI.

The Most Excellent R. LOPEZ BARALT,

Minister of Domestic and Foreign Relations of the United States of Venezuela.

No. 1436 bis.]

MINISTER OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
BUREAU OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAW,
Caracas, December 9, 1902.

SIR: On the evening of the 7th instant, a holiday, there came to my private residence the employee of the chancellery of your legation, charged to deliver in my hands an official note of that date, signed by you, marked with the number 825 and accompanied by a Spanish translation. It was through an act of extreme courtesy on my part that I accepted the delivery of that note under such circumstances.

The note refers to previous correspondence of this ministry with the imperial legation touching various claims of German subjects, and winds up with the conclusion that an immediate settlement is necessary and that Venezuela is to be constrained in that sense, in the name or by the order of the Government of Berlin. As the note consists of distinct parts, viz, that which contains the review of precedents and that which sets forth the conclusions, the Government of the Republic, after giving it the mature and earnest consideration demanded by its context, finds it unavoidably necessary to bring out in the forefront the points open to rectification before proceeding with a clear recital of the Federal Executive's purpose and wishes to reconcile the essential object of the note with the circumstances that jointly bear on the matter under discussion.

It takes up, as being the only argument of Venezuela against diplomatic intervention in matters of a certain nature, that which was concretely stated in the reply of May 9th, in which the whole doctrine set forth in the previous correspondence was passed by, because a repetition of it was deemed unnecessary. And inasmuch as the very highest principles of international law have precisely been taken for a foundation of the defense of the position of Venezuela presented in the memorandum of March 19, 1901, it was found with extreme surprise that you ascribed to the Government a purpose to consider the question in no other light than that of domestic legislation. When article 20 of the treaty between the Empire and Colombia was cited in the note of May 9 last, it was with no other intention than that of adding supplementary proof to that already adduced in regard to the assent given by Germany to the doctrines upheld by Venezuela.

The three cases now cited as precedents for agreements reached through the diplomatic channel are self-explaining. In 1885 an arrangement was made with France for the payment of allowed claims, and the examination of cases dating from much earlier periods. And proof of the fact that the doctrine maintained by Venezuela is therein fully recognized, is found in Article V of that convention, whose force has just been fully confirmed; that article inhibits the diplomatic agents of the two contracting parties from intervening in private claims or complaints relating to matters appertaining to civil or criminal justice, unless there should be some denial of justice. The agreement of 1898 with Spain appears to be the simple effect of circumstances, similar to those which brought about that which is termed by yourself the agreement of February 6, 1896, between the German minister at Caracas and the minister of finance of Venezuela. There was nothing in that instrument that was not contained in a list of claims previously classified within the precincts of the competent board; and the agreement solemnly recognized the validity of the executive decree that had regulated the examinations and the mode of payment of the cases of that period. Under head one, the agreement reads as follows:

"The Government acknowledges, in accordance with the decrees of June 9, 1893, and July 16, 1894, the 229,915.37 bolívares, amount of the claim preferred by German subjects as entered in the list submitted by the imperial legation."

The list there mentioned was that which comprised the cases examined and classified by the board, and the claims to which it relates were paid in the very kind of paper created for the settlement of debts incurred on account of the revolution of 1892 which had established itself as a government.

The reference to the strict limitation of the period within which the cases presented to the board had to come totally lacks weight, since the general law which establishes the course for the presentation and vindication of any rights against the nation is still in force. As regards the moral and political status of the judges in charge of such cases, it is impossible to admit, except as a mere supposition, apt to vanish of itself, the charge of lack of competence which, in point of impartiality, seems to be made in the text transmitted by the imperial legation. And if we pass from this to the estimate therein made of the value of the fiduciary paper which is intended to satisfy the debts accruing from the cases submitted to the board, we are left to infer as an inadmissible fact that the German subjects to whom payment was made in 1896 in certificates of the 6 per cent debt, for allowed claims growing out of the war of 1892, were of less exacting temper than the present claimants.

As for the action referred to the Congress, which your note describes as frustraneous, the Government holds that it was rather, as it will shortly prove to be, highly consistent with the principles of equity which prompted its introduction. This is proved by the way in which the resolution of the legislative body succeeded in removing, in favor of various claimants, the legal difficulty that stood in the way of retroactive action.

There is in your statement another point that has drawn the special attention of the Government, because of its affecting nothing less than the seriousness and propriety which it endeavors to impress upon all its acts. It is alleged that the subsequent correspondence was conducted by Venezuela in a quasi-insulting tone, and that the Government finally published the notes exchanged between the ministry and the imperial legation, some of which had been marked as being of a confidential nature. After a thorough examination of the record in the case, it was impossible to find in what passage there is any sentence of insulting significance, since such presumption can not be drawn from the simple statement of a doctrine, or from the mere elucidation of a principle of law. The Venezuelan Government would greatly desire to have such passages as may contain the slightest offense to the Empire pointed out to it, in the same way as it has had, in the course of correspondence, occasion to note several remarks somewhat unfriendly to the Republic, and it would hasten to give them their most polite significance.

The insertion in the publication of August of Dr. Schmidt Leda's memorandum of March 8, 1901, which was marked confidential, constitutes an act that can be abundantly explained. The ministry of foreign relations refrained from publishing that document and its reply even in its annual report to Congress; but when the memorandum of the ambassador in Washington, subsequently known to all the chancelleries in the world, took the matter out of its original sphere and made it common property, it was logical that the Republic, mindful of its privileges and responsibilities, should explain to friendly governments the true character of the case, which could not be done without publishing the whole of the correspondence. And it is proper to state that, as you know, a diplomatic note, for being marked confidential, is not supposed to be so held except in relation to the circumstances of temporary duration that require it; else the insertion in publications issued by nearly all the nations of the world of documents which originally partook of that character could not be understood. After the time during which it was expedient to withhold the note, its confidential character is devoid of purpose. No less was the surprise experienced by the Government at the assertion that the memorandum of the 17th of August last was couched in offensive language. Its mere perusal (such at least is the Venezuelan Government's opinion) shows that the document contains nothing but a brief statement of the views disclosed by the German ambassador in Washington, and a rejoinder made on a strictly legal ground and in the moderate tone that belongs to lawful rights.

Having thus offered the most indispensable remarks relative to that part of your note which sets forth certain antecedents, and hoping that this will serve for the desired rectification of the particulars therein mentioned, I now come to the statement of the views and positions of the Venezuelan Government in regard to your final conclusions and to the animus by which you were guided in presenting them on behalf of your superior.

The Imperial Government desires that that of Venezuela will see to it that the claims of German subjects growing out of the civil war be satisfied, and that, in regard to the other private parties or concerns in which they hold interests, the method of ascertaining and guaranteeing those interests in every detail, be determined by arbitration. The necessity of a statement to that effect is suggested; and as there can be no waiving on the part of the Federal Government touching matters dealing with engagements secured by stipulations placed under the protection of the law of the Republic, or with duties born of concrete provisions of that legislation, neither the first nor the second proposition contains any condition that is not in accordance with what might be provided for the adjustment of every difference with the Government of Germany. If the claims under discussion are just claims, the Federal Executive, as an honored and civilized power, hastens here and now to give the assurance that those claims will be examined and passed upon as such; and inasmuch as the proper board is already organized, there is no occasion for dilatoriness or the slightest departure from the rules laid down by the law in the conduct of the proceedings. In regard to the other particulars, every one of which comes under its regulating law, I need only call attention to the abnormal circumstances created by the war, which are paralyzing any action on the obligations connected therewith. The Government is considering the appointment of a fiscal agent who, by entering into direct communication with the interested parties, will help in making the satisfaction of those obligations easier and less protracted. It is only hoped that the work of pacification in which the Government is now deeply and earnestly engaged will enable it to reestablish the service of public credit.

The claims growing out of the war that is still desolating and devastating a part of the Republic will share fully in all the rights that are established by the law regulating the matter.

Having thus returned, in an essentially conciliatory and friendly manner, a reply to your note, I pass by, under special orders of the Government, that part which relates to the joint action of the Empire and United Kingdom; for a power like Venezuela, which needs not be urged and much less constrained to discharge, as far as it is in its power, its lawful obligations, will never, in its intercourse with the other civilized nations, look for anything that will not be in accordance with the principles of mutual respect and with the rules of reciprocal cordiality.

Accept, sir, the renewed profession of my distinguished consideration.

MR. MINISTER: Reserving the rights of His Majesty's Government and of His Majesty's subjects residing in Venezuela, as well as all possible future criticism or objections to the decree which appeared in the Official Gazette of the 23d instant, which decree provides that claims against the Government of Venezuela, referring to the war or other matters, shall not be investigated, considered, nor decided by the magistrates to whom they should be submitted, according to laws now in force, until six months after a decree in which the Chief Executive of the nation shall declare the reestablishment of peace, I take note of the declaration made to me by your excellency in our interview of the 24th of the present month that this decree is not applicable to claims prior to the date on which it was issued. I should also be glad if your excellency would kindly inform me to whom, in the absence of the ordinary protection conceded in friendly countries to foreigners by the courts of justice, which, as your excellency has repeatedly informed me, is the only possible means of redress, to say nothing of that protection which must be conceded to British subjects by treaty, which the Government of Venezuela now apparently repudiates—to whom must they address their application to obtain this protection during the time in which the magistrates are not authorized by law to grant it.

I should also thank your excellency if you would kindly inform me which are those matters, besides the claims relating to the war, which the magistrates are not authorized by law to take into consideration during this period.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurances of my highest consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAW,
Caracas, May 10, 1900.

SIR: In a communication from your distinguished predecessor, dated the 30th ultimo, received here on the 2d of the present month, and which treats of the decree regarding the filing of claims, it seems to be thought that because in that decree a time is fixed for the receipt, study, and consideration of said claims, the interests, whose validity the judiciary is called upon to decide, remain during all that interval without legal protection. The Chief Executive of the Republic regrets that a measure intended solely to prevent obstacles in the constitutional and harmonious adjustment of all the branches of the service, after the natural disturbances of the war and without injury to any private right, should have given occasion for that supposition. Your excellency knows that the law, as a protecting principle of rights, can never fail to exercise its good efforts, even when it is not possible to apply it simultaneously to all the rights that seek its protection. The fixing of the time in which the necessary proofs of each claim must be received and considered is not equivalent to a suspension of judicial functions until the arrival of said time. The mechanism of the administration continues its daily functions; the decree only treats of delaying, until the complete organization of all the branches of the Government, the consideration of the proceedings relating to alleged damages.

The phrase referring to matters foreign to the war, which your distinguished predecessor also considered as an ambiguous point, is due only to the natural foresight of every legislator concerning matters which it is impossible to decide when the whole administrative branch is included.

As to the assertion that the honorable Mr. Haggard thought he heard from my lips with respect to the claims to which the decree applies, it is not possible for me to own it, inasmuch as the decree of the Executive speaks in a general sense in referring to the circumstances of the war.

I beg to renew to your excellency the assurances of my highest consideration.

BRITISH LEGATION, Caracas, April 25, 1901.

MR. MINISTER: I have the honor to inform your excellency that the decree of January 24 of the past year, which creates a "commission for the examination and classification of credits," has received the careful consideration of His Majesty's Government in so far as it affects the claims of British subjects arising out of the last civil disturbances which have taken place in this country.

I now have the honor to inform your excellency that I have received instructions which cause me to entertain the hope that the method of adjusting the pending British claims, proposed in the decree mentioned, may give satisfactory results. At the same time, I have the honor to report to your excellency that the declaration communicated to the Government of Venezuela by Mr. Middleton, His Majesty's resident minister, in his communication of May 21, 1873, to the effect that His Majesty's Government reserves the right to object to any claim on the part of Venezuela at any future time to having released itself, by its own decree, from responsibility to Great Britain as to the injustice or damages caused to British subjects, for which Venezuela would be bound to give indemnization either by reason of the law of nations in general or by virtue of the provisions of treaties.

It is my duty, furthermore, to point out to your excellency that the limit of ninety days within which the claim should be presented, according to article 3 of the decree, is too short a period, considering the great extent of the Republic and the deficient means of communication, and to request, under such circumstances, that an extension of time be granted in those cases in which such a concession is justly requested.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurances of my highest consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAW,
Caracas, May 11, 1901.

MR. MINISTER: In your communication of the 25th ultimo, received by me on the afternoon of the 27th, your excellency announces that the decree of January 24, concerning the study and classification of claims arising out of the war which terminated in 1900, has been considered by His Majesty's Government under the impression or with the hope that it would give the claims alleged by British subjects satisfactory results. As the Executive decree in question was issued in strict accordance with the principles of justice, its effects can not fail to conform or be in harmony with the true nature of the rights that may be claimed. Therefore the view of His Majesty's Government in that particular is founded upon logical reasons.

The President, whom I informed of the entire contents of your excellency's communication, regrets not to be able to agree with you as to the opinion that your excellency expresses with respect to the reservations that one of your distinguished predecessors claims to have formulated on May 21, 1873, as to any pretense on the part of the Republic that may release it from all responsibility from injustice done or damages caused to British subjects.

The communication of the honorable Mr. Middleton, to which your excellency refers, did not express the slightest charge of a concrete character against the law of February 14, 1873, the object of which was to establish the manner of making claims against the nation. That distinguished British representative confined himself in the communication to an enunciation of said view in the same words or in the same vague form that your excellency now adopts; and inasmuch as Mr. Jacinto Gutierrez, in his answer of September 6 of that year, stated that a claim expressed in such broad and indefinite terms regarding laws passed by the proper national powers, without violating any public treaty or any principle of international law, was uncalled for and could not, therefore, produce any effect at the time, I have in turn to confirm said opinion or express it anew as a suitable answer to your excellency and in accordance with the instructions of the President of the Republic. On the other hand, the chief justice believes that no reservation of rights whatever concerning decrees issued in the name of the national sovereignty, and the effects of which include both natives and foreigners, is possible or acceptable. There is no principle of the law of nations, nor any assumption whatever in the stipulation which Venezuela should bear in mind concerning Great Britain, which binds the Government to establish discriminations in the protection of the interests which should be governed by internal legislation.

With regard to the period fixed for the filing of the claims arising out of the war of 1899 and 1900, a period which your excellency considered too short, I would respectfully remind you that article 3 of the decree of January 24 foresaw the unavoidable circumstances to which your excellency refers, and therefore acted before the legal remedy of its effects. Hence the interested party is he who is bound to prove whether he is included in the aforesaid case.

I beg your excellency to accept the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.
EDUARDO BLANCO.

His Excellency WILLIAM HENRY DOVETON HAGGARD,
Resident Minister of His Britannic Majesty.

[Translation.]

BRITISH LEGATION, Caracas, May 13, 1901.

MR. MINISTER: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of the communication of your excellency of the 11th instant, relating to the decree concerning claims arising out of the civil war of 1899 to 1900, in so far as said decree affects the rights of British subjects.

In my communication of the 25th of last month, I stated that His Majesty's Government, in entertaining the hope that the method proposed in the decree in question for settling the pending claims of British subjects might give satisfactory results, reserved to itself the right to "object to any pretense of the Republic of Venezuela at any future time of having released itself by virtue of its own decree of any responsibility to Great Britain with regard to any injustice done or damages caused to British subjects for which Venezuela would be bound to give indemnization either by virtue of the law of nations in general or by virtue of the provisions of treaties."

To this your excellency replies that the aforesaid right to object, which the Marquis of Lansdowne reserves to himself, "is uncalled for and has no relation whatever with the question," because "the temporary President does not consider that any kind of reservation of rights that may affect decrees issued in the name of the national sovereignty, the effects of which are applicable both to natives and foreigners, to be possible or acceptable."

Your excellency also states that "there is no principle of international law nor is there in the stipulations between Great Britain and Venezuela anything whatever that binds the Government to establish any discrimination in the protection of the interests which internal legislation is called upon to exercise." In the first part of this statement the Venezuelan Government would appear to be in direct opposition to that of His Majesty's, in setting forth that the reservation of right which I have had the honor to make in the name of the Government is uncalled for and has no relation whatever to the question, as presumably His Majesty's Government would not have arrived at such a decision had it considered it inopportune. The second part would appear so clearly in contradiction to the terms of the second paragraph of the ninth clause of the treaty of 1825, which says "that British subjects shall be exempt from all forced loans, military levies, or requisitions," thereby holding the Executive Government to that of His Majesty's in this respect, a responsibility which does not exist in the case of other nations.

This constitutes a marked difference, which it would have been deemed impossible to deny and which it is impossible to avoid. His Majesty's Government has never admitted, therefore, the contention of the Venezuelan Government, which is of long standing, that the claims of British subjects should be placed on the same footing as those of natives, submitting them to judicial intervention and decision to the exclusion of diplomatic intervention.

Under such circumstances it would seem that nothing is gained by my continuing the discussion, and without any loss of time I submit the views of your excellency to the consideration of His Majesty's Government.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurances of my highest consideration.

Minister of Foreign Relations of the United States of Venezuela, etc.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAW,
Caracas, May 25, 1901.

MR. MINISTER: On referring, in your note of the 13th of the present month, to the claims that some British subjects residing in Venezuela may have for damages arising out of the last war, your excellency disregards that which you had declared in your former communication concerning the vague reservations of rights formulated by one of your predecessors in 1873, and endeavors to establish only a certain counterview in the instructions which you say you have now received, and the answer which Mr. Jacinto Gutierrez, in his capacity as minister of foreign relations, then made to Mr. Middleton, of which your excellency only treats as a new or transitory matter. With all the respect due to the opinion of that honorable legation, and in spite of the interest which the Venezuelan Government has in agreeing with your excellency as to the matter of settling the rights of His Majesty's subjects residing in the Republic, I must advise you of my most decided dissent with respect to the application of such an interpretation of the matter under discussion, since it is not possible to forget what was then declared by Venezuela nor to overlook the time transpired, which amounts already to about three decades, in which the principle of judicial equality, established in the law of 1873 regarding claims against the nation, has acquired—if that were possible—greater strength. I find it necessary to express here a similar or analogous nonconformity in regard to the condition which, with respect to British interests, your excellency seems to deduce from the treaty of 1825-1834. But as said opinion affects a point of easy explanation, a slight examination of its circumstances by way of defining it, and to leave the desired agreement already established, may perhaps be sufficient.

It is a maxim of the law that neither governments nor individuals can grant that which does not belong to them or which for any reason is beyond their natural authority and control. Therefore no government has power to jeopardize the subsequent life of the country in whose name it contracts nor to alienate that which constitutes the essential basis of the political existence of the state that it represents. The rights which form that essential basis are those of autonomy, independence, free development, equal rights, jurisdiction and dominion, and representation, none of which can be renounced without impairing or falsifying the foundation of national existence. From these premises high authorities like Fiore hold (art. 696) as unlawful matter in treaties "that which involves a direct violation of the constitutional law of any of the contracting states;" and hence noted expounders like Hautefeuille (Disc. Prel. XIII) declare that a treaty comprising "the cession or gratuitous abandonment of an essential or natural right can not be considered binding."

The doctrine of authors on this subject corresponds in that respect not only to political conveniences, but also to the law of necessity. In order that an agreement between two nations may afford permanent features it must be in reasonable conformity with the internal condition of each of the states that celebrate it. It could not be conceived, for example, how an essentially industrial or manufacturing nation could treat with another upon the basis of a restriction in the exportation of its products, even though conditions imposed by fortuitous circumstances should intervene. Neither would it be possible to understand how a monarchy could enter into an alliance against the political principle on which it is founded, nor how a republic would subscribe to obligations contrary to its democratic spirit. And since the states are moral entities of continuous life, and to a certain extent perpetual, their duties must always conform to the progressive condition that gives them existence in the concert of nations.

The treaty of 1825-1834, which your excellency cites, is a law, as is every treaty, and could hardly be in open contradiction to the substantive law of the Republic. As far as possible, considering its antiquity, that agreement had to take into account in its clauses the natural change of certain conditions in the civil and administrative life of the two contracting parties, as is proved by the circumstances of mentioning therein (art. 6) export duties, afterwards abolished in Venezuela, and that of the two Governments binding themselves (art. 13) to prohibit their respective subjects from engaging in the slave trade, a trade the existence of which no one at the present day would even think of.

The equality of procedure, so far as interests and other particulars are concerned, is therein not only foreseen, but is also formally established for all time by the two nations, inasmuch as article 9 of said treaty, the same precisely which your excellency quotes, says that in everything relating to the administration of justice, the citizens who are subjects of the two contracting parties shall enjoy in their respective territories and dominions the same privileges, liberties, and rights as the citizens of the most favored nation. Nothing else is aimed at but the administration of justice when a high court takes cognizance of the claims against the nation for alleged injuries which are attributed to the action of the authorities in time of war; and although Venezuela has not up to the present time established with any country any judicial procedure that presupposes privileges, advantages, or preeminence over the natives of the country, it is inferred from this that the application of the law of 1873 to the claims of British subjects, far from being in contradiction with the provisions of article 9, is in conformity with it in a conclusive and unequivocal manner.

The equality of the procedure in civil cases for natives and foreigners, a principle contained in the law of 1873, and which is included in Venezuelan constitutional law, is based on a maxim universally recognized, namely, the obligation of him who goes to a foreign country to submit to the laws of the same. The ancient aphorism locus regit actum—the essential foundation of the administrative unity in every system of government—would be contradictory and inefficient if the existence of two laws were possible, one to protect aliens and the other to govern the interests of natives. This view of necessary equality was that which decided the enactment of the British law of May 12, 1870, by which (art. 2) an alien can acquire or possess property in the United Kingdom, either real or personal, in the same manner and in all respects as British subjects by birth; and that view was the inspirer of the categorical declaration which was signed on April 18, 1890, at the Pan-American Conference in Washington, by fifteen of the seventeen nations officially represented therein. The zeal shown by the American republics in guarding that principle seems to be such that there is scarcely one of them that has not adopted it, either in this or in some other form, in its constitution. The United States of America gave it explicit recognition in 1868 in the fourteenth amendment of its Constitution. The United States of Mexico proclaimed it in article 33 of its Federal constitution. Guatemala, Salvador, Nicaragua, and Honduras made it the object of very explicit articles in their present constitutions. Colombia, on adopting it, included it in its political code of 1886 even more as a right than as a duty, since it at once determined the obligation of natives and foreigners to live subject to the national legislation of the country. The United States of Brazil in the constitution of 1891 assured equally to natives and foreigners the inviolability of civil rights. Ecuador went so far as to subordinate to the acknowledgment of domestic laws the admission of foreigners to the Republic; and Peru made coessential the power of acquiring property in its territory and the fact of being subject to the duties that with regard to said property apply to Peruvians. The Argentine Republic established the absolute equality of rights in its constitution of 1860, and Paraguay did likewise, maintaining in its constitution the same principle that, as is observed, is the only one capable of insuring governmental rule, especially in nations called upon as these are to see their elements of life increased through immigration. And it should be borne in mind that such equality is justly looked upon as a means of attracting foreign subjects to the enjoyment of the national life and as a proof of the complete derogation or forgetfulness of the strange views of other times, which tended to consider every foreigner as an object of concealed suspicion or comparative distrust, and not like the friend that used to arrive, as he now comes to all countries, confident of a cordial reception, as well as respect and affection.

Furthermore, the object of the law of 1873 was to prevent the difficulties of various kinds, occasioned by the manner in which private persons filed their claims, oftentimes without a solid foundation, or complaints without adequate cause. The court designated to define the rights upon which the respective claims are based is the highest in the Republic, and the very fact of thus avoiding procedure or the appealing of cases by the interested parties from lower to higher courts shows that the legislator sought therein to facilitate the means of explaining each claim without any prejudice to other national laws.

To question now, after the expiration of almost thirty years, the right with which Venezuela enacted that law would be equivalent to doubt the efficiency and validity of all the principles on which the sovereignty of nations rests. In the exercise of its powers and by virtue of its privileges as a free and independent State, it legislated at that time without it being possible for it to establish the least difference, whether the claimants were natives or foreigners, regarding the manner of administering the laws relating to the matter. The general laws of the Republic can be but the same for all. Public law so establishes; the national constitution so determines; the civil code so provides in one of its first articles, and so must it always be considered without going so far as to oppose the clause of the treaty that your excellency quotes, inasmuch as it does not contradict it, nor could it ever be in opposition to the administrative standard which independent states always consult in all their agreements. The conditions or duties established by a public treaty like that of 1825-1834 constitute a part of the national law itself, and it is for the magistrates, to whom the occasion is presented of administering justice in the name of the Republic, in that respect to take cognizance of them in order to give them the proper application in conformity with the true judicial sense.

I present here these suggestions, impelled by a friendly and cordial desire of presenting on your excellency's mind the sincere statement of the reasons that the Government has for not accepting any reservation of right whatever of those indicated by that honorable legation by virtue of the claims of British subjects for alleged damages during the period of the war.

It is not the purpose of the department, as it is not that of your excellency, to continue the discussion concerning that point, which Venezuela finds, moreover, very clear, from the point of view of reason and right.

I beg your excellency to accept the renewed assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

BRITISH LEGATION, Caracas, December 25, 1901.

MR. MINISTER: His Majesty's Government has learned with regret, from the communications of Doctor Blanco of the 11th and 25th of May, that the Government of Venezuela refuses to recognize the reservations of rights made by His Majesty's Government in the question of British claims in the last and previous communications, concerning the right to object to any claim on the part of the Venezuelan Government at any time, of releasing itself, by its own decree, of responsibility with Great Britain with respect to damages or injuries caused to British subjects by which Venezuela would be bound to make indemnization, either in accordance with international law in general or in conformity with treaty obligations. These reservations include also the refusal of His Majesty's Government to recognize any limitation whatever by the national law of its right in accordance with the general principles of international law.

His Majesty's Government has refused more than once to admit that even a clause contained in a contract that excludes recourse to diplomatic intervention has any force whatever as an exception to the action of His Majesty's Government, should the latter deem it convenient to exercise such right.

This attitude has been adopted by His Majesty's Government not with special reference to the questions that are now being discussed with Venezuela, but as general principles and after mature consideration. This has been maintained on several occasions, and to this end communications have been addressed to a number of the South American republics.

The answers of Doctor Blanco to my representations have received due attention; but His Majesty's Government has not been able to find in the arguments advanced anything that may induce it to modify the opinion that it has already expressed, and it is my duty to advise the Venezuelan Government that His Majesty must maintain his reservations.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurances of my highest consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAW,
Caracas, January 4, 1902.

MR. MINISTER: In your communication of December 25 last, on referring to the motives of essential legal nature set forth by Venezuela to oppose the reservations of right of Great Britain, which your excellency quoted on April 25 last, relative to the legislation of the Republic in matters of claims, your excellency states, as the principal or only reason for same, that His Majesty's Government has refused more than once even to recognize the validity of the clauses of a contract contrary to diplomatic intervention, should said Government deem it convenient to take any action in that direction, and adds that, in the same sense, communications have been directed to several of the South American republics.

Such a declaration, which is sufficient by itself to define the view in which Great Britain holds the acts emanating from its own will or from its national convenience, tends, in a certain manner, to strengthen the idea of sovereignty which Venezuela maintained from the beginning for insuring the validity of the law of 1873, unless His Majesty's Government thinks possible to establish a doctrine of international law solely for application to the South American republics, which would naturally give rise to the question, Why not assume the same attitude in your relations with the republics of North America and the countries of the European Continent?

The Republic of Venezuela does not wish its legislation to have any supremacy over that of any other country, but to be governed by its legislation alone and maintain and comply with that which is provided for by the said legislation with respect to all the interests permanently existing in its territory, whether natives or foreigners are concerned. So that, even though your excellency says, in the latter part of your communication, that His Majesty's Government maintains in that respect its prior reservations of rights because of not having found in Doctor Blanco's answers anything that induces it to modify its opinion, this department, in accordance with instructions received from the President of the Republic, has to reiterate, as it does reiterate, its former view in the matter, not without respectfully calling attention to the fact of your not having, up to the present time, replied to a single one of the arguments upon which Venezuela relies for opposing the reservations aforesaid.

I take this opportunity of renewing to your excellency the assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

J. R. PACHANO.

BRITISH LEGATION, Caracas, January 12, 1902.

MR. MINISTER: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your excellency's communication of the 4th instant, concerning the reservations made by the Government of His Britannic Majesty denying to recognize the claim advanced by Venezuela of being able, by its own decree, to release itself of liability to Great Britain as to damages or injuries to British subjects, for which Venezuela would be bound to make indemnization, either in accordance with the principles of the law of nations or by virtue of formal agreements, and refusing to acknowledge any limitation by the national law of Venezuela of the rights of Great Britain according to the general principles of international law.

I shall not fail to communicate to His Majesty's Government this answer concerning said reservations.

Inasmuch as the reservations of His Majesty's Government are now duly and formally recorded, no good result would seem to be attained by any answer from this legation to your excellency's communication. I shall confine myself, therefore, to the final statement contained in your communication that not one of the arguments upon which Venezuela bases its claim of procedure with Great Britain in a manner contrary to treaty and to the law of nations has been answered.

I am inclined to think that, on second thought, your excellency will agree with His Majesty's legation that allegations or arguments in support of a claim so unusual need no reply.

I take this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurances of my highest consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
OFFICE OF PUBLIC FOREIGN LAW,

MR. MINISTER: In your communication of the 12th instant, your excellency referred to mine of the 4th and to previous communications from this department relating to the general subject of claims, in such a manner that one might be led to believe in the existence of some Venezuelan law opposed to public treaties and to international law. All of the correspondence maintained on account of the reservations that that legation transmitted tends exactly, on the part of this department, to prove or to demonstrate in that sense the conformity of previous legislation—token of national sovereignty—with the most substantial principles of the law of nations and with the respective stipulations of the treaty of 1825-1834; and hence I fail to conceive how you should have thought, unless through an involuntary error of interpretation, that on my referring to arguments unrefuted up to the present time I could allude to circumstances contrary to any public treaty or to claims opposed to the dictum of international law.

If your excellency would be kind enough to read anew the communications of my predecessor, and especially the one of May 25 last, you would undoubtedly find that the arguments therein contained are not of an inadmissible character, but precedents taken from the clearest doctrine of the law of nations and true and concrete conclusions arising out of the text itself of the treaty with Great Britain. What my predecessor then did was to establish the relation, logical and true, between the law of 1873 and the treaty of 1825-1834, in order to enter into other pertinent considerations not inspired by any whimsical or uncertain opinion, but of that which warrants, defines, explains, and interprets the principles of law followed by all civilized nations.

It is not to be assumed that your excellency—in whom the greatest zeal is always observed as to matters placed in your charge—on saying, with respect to the allegations and arguments quoted, that they “need no answer on account of being advanced in support of unusual claims,” should have wished to simply put aside all attempt at refutation, since in fact if you should think those arguments wholly inconsistent with public law, their complete refutation would be much easier for you. And inasmuch as in the communication of December 25 last your excellency informed this department that said arguments had received the due attention of His Majesty’s Government, it rather seems that at the beginning another character and importance was imputed to them. Whatever is worth attention is worth an answer, if all is not taken for granted, even when we do not assent entirely to what has been taken into consideration. The Government of Venezuela on its part continues to consider good those arguments and as unanswerable those allegations, and trusts that His Majesty’s Government, as well as your excellency, may acknowledge that it is not possible to consider in any other manner a point so clear and of such a definite nature.

I beg your excellency to accept the renewed assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

I have read with interest and attention your excellency’s communication; but as it does not seem to throw new light upon the question, it is my duty to request you to be good enough to excuse me from entering further into the subject, and to add anything to the remarks contained in my communications of the 4th instant and the 25th ultimo.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAWS,
Caracas, November 14, 1902.

SIR: From the note of your excellency of the 11th instant, the Government of the Republic might conclude, not without great sorrow, that the Government of His Britannic Majesty has not yet carefully considered the series of complaints and observations presented to the British legation on account of the acts committed by the Ban Righ from the time of her departure from English ports and of the attitude taken by the authorities of Trinidad, from the beginning of the revolution excited within the territory of said colony and which has just devastated Venezuela so seriously. If those charges had been examined, and they were thoroughly summarized up to the 5th of April in note No. 450, and to which, among others, there has just been added that of the dispatch of numerous sacks of mails for Ciudad Bolivar, a place controlled by a sedition against the legal power of the Republic, the Government of His Majesty would not have attributed to the mere will of Venezuela the proposition of the other questions, and would see, on the contrary, the logical result of a condition very foreign, indeed, to all that the Federal Executive could have presumed in the course of its amicable relations with the Kingdom of Great Britain.

When matters are considered seriously and impartially it will be seen, on the one hand, that the effort of the Government of His Majesty, or of the legation in Caracas, to discuss questions relatively of secondary importance, many of which may be considered as having been investigated and decided; and, on the other, the just, natural, and indispensable interest of Venezuela in seeing her rights cared for and respected, in view of the serious losses caused thereto by a vessel sailing from English waters, provided with British papers, and on account of the evident facilities encountered in the adjacent colony both within and without the vessel for the consummation of her plans inflicted all the losses suffered by the Republic from the month of January to the present time. The situation, therefore, mentioned in the note of your excellency can not be imputed to the Government of Venezuela even by an indirect act of her will.

The effects of that situation corresponds to a condition of things with which the Government of His Majesty itself is intimately connected. The said Government can not comprehensively and much less acceptably consider that another Government, acting under the inspiration of its rights and duty, submits to circumstances which it did not create or to necessities which it has not established. In this particular Venezuela does nothing capable of being considered a violation of any formula of courtesy or any principle of law. Her conduct is in entire harmony with the judicial status of the question, and for her nothing would be more satisfactory, in view of her strong relations of friendship with Great Britain, than to receive from the Government of the Kingdom some demonstration looking to the establishment of a mutual understanding in order to satisfy the losses caused by the steamer Ban Righ, and by the consequent conduct of the authorities of Trinidad. Until the present she can see nothing but the most unjust refusal on the part of Great Britain to discuss the subject; a declination aggravated by the fact so recent as that of your excellency not having even replied to the note addressed to you October 27, relative to the illegal dispatch of a heavy mail from Trinidad for places like the Ciudad Bolivar occupied by insurgents.

There has been given much thought here relative to the serious accidents, as the inevitable result of the acts of the Ban Righ, since last January, and by the attitude assumed by the authorities of the adjacent colony which caused loss to Venezuela. The Executive asks nothing of Great Britain which does not legitimately arise from the nature of the question; and, therefore, appeals to the spirit of justice and rectitude of the Government of His Majesty in order to place the matter upon the plane of mutual agreement, as the only means of changing the abnormal condition referred to in the note of your excellency and which the Government of the Republic is the first to lament most seriously.

Accept, your excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

BRITISH LEGATION, Caracas, December 7, 1902.

SIR: In reply to the note of your excellency of the 14th instant, I have the honor to inform you that I have received instructions from the Government of His Majesty to point out to the Venezuelan Government in writing that with respect to the steamer Ban Righ, the Government of His Majesty has given full explanations and has shown that in this regard there is no legitimate ground for complaint, nor does the Government of His Majesty consider that there is any justification in attributing blame to the authorities of Trinidad, who only acted according to instructions.

I have the honor to state also that the Government of His Majesty also laments the condition that has arisen, but that it can not accept the note of your excellency as a sufficient reply to my communications nor as indicative of the intention on the part of the Government of Venezuela to satisfy the claims that the Government of His Majesty has advanced, and that it should be understood that they include all the well-founded claims that have arisen as a consequence of the last civil war and of the prior civil wars and from the mistreatment or unjust imprisonment of British subjects, and also an arrangement of the foreign debt.

It involves upon me to request the Venezuelan Government to make a declaration that it recognizes in principle the justice of these claims; that it will immediately pay compensation in the marine cases and in the cases above mentioned and in those in which British subjects have been unjustly imprisoned or mistreated, and that with respect to the other claims it will consent to accept the decisions of a mixed commission with respect to the amount and the guaranty which must be given for their payment.

It is my duty also to express the hope that the Venezuelan Government will reply to these demands and not oblige the Government of His Majesty to take measures in order to obtain satisfaction.

I should add that the Government of His Majesty has been informed of the claims of the Government of Germany against Venezuela; that the two Governments have agreed to work together for the purpose of securing the settlement of all their claims, and that the Government of His Majesty will demand the immediate payment of a sum equal to that which in the first place may be paid to the German Government. Whatever balance there may be after the payment of the urgent claims shall be held for the liquidation of the claims which shall be passed upon by the commission.

I also have instructions from the Government of His Majesty to state clearly that this communication should be considered in the light of an ultimatum.

I embrace this opportunity in order to renew to your excellency the assurance of my highest consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAWS,
Caracas, December 9, 1902.

SIR: On Sunday, the 7th of the present month, a person whom I have not the honor to know officially called at my private residence in order to deliver to me in the name of your excellency the note bearing that same date relative to claims of British subjects which have been advanced on account of the last and former civil wars.

A sentiment of extreme courtesy on my part induced me to receive the note under those circumstances on that day.

This department has had a voluminous correspondence with the legation of His Majesty on account of the complaints which Venezuela had in due time presented to the Government of Great Britain, in view of the losses caused by the Ban Righ and by the partial conduct of the authorities of Trinidad relative to the revolution which has just devastated the Republic. Your excellency begins by referring to one of my notes, said to be of the 14th of the present month, and which no doubt is that of the 14th of the month last past. With reference thereto your excellency states that the Government of His Majesty has found no ground for the demands of Venezuela, as the acts of the Ban Righ (it is added) were fully explained, and the authorities of Trinidad did not act in other respects except in obedience to instructions. Your excellency then enters immediately upon the subject of British claims, and requests in the name of your Government that the Government of Venezuela declare the justice thereof, after which you speak of the necessity of their payment and of the joint action agreed upon between the United Kingdom and the German Empire in order to compel the Republic to make payment.

The Government has considered that note with the care which its contents demand without having found, in the relation of the antecedents cited, anything which justifies the present attitude or any motive which explains the omission of that reciprocal understanding that would avoid and foresee difficulties. The Government of the Republic begins by calling attention to the fact that the note of December 14, which is the one without doubt to which your excellency refers, had for its essential object to secure an immediate agreement with Great Britain relative to pending questions; and, therefore, it is with surprise that there is noted the evasion or apparent omission by Great Britain of the cordial and friendly views which were so recently set forth. With reference to the Ban Righ no action has been taken tending to remedy the tremendous damages which she caused the Republic; and with respect to the conduct observed by the authorities of Trinidad, far from having offered any reparation it appears now that they obeyed the express instructions of the British Government. This circumstance needs no explanation, for this alone is sufficient to fully justify all the demands that Venezuela has set forth in the correspondence carried on with the legation until the 14th of last November.

Ignoring the above, the essential part of the note of your excellency, or its real object, can not be other, according to the text itself, than the security of the interests of British subjects. There is found full assurance of such security without the Government departing, as it can not depart, from its administrative functions in order to harmonize the actual state of affairs with the desire expressed in the name of Great Britain. There could be no difficulty in the Federal Executive recognizing the justice of obligations that are recognized in the national laws, and in that sense there can be full assurance that the interests in question will always be protected and properly cared for.

As to claims, your excellency refers specifically to those enumerated in the note of February 20, last past, and which, in your judgment, amount to 36,401 bolivars, the claims commission created by a resolution of the national legislative body will examine and pass upon them according to justice. The other subjects of the correspondence not replied to relate to that which may become claims, of facts that are about to be investigated or defined, and to which competent authority is giving or will give attention. And as your excellency speaks of well-founded claims, it does not seem possible that such questions in their present condition or legal status can present the same aspect as those described in expedientes which set forth their character and form a basis for the order or decree of the proper court or body. The Government can find nothing more in the present request of Great Britain, although it has carefully studied and investigated the same; for the so-called foreign debt, which the note incidentally mentions, ought not to be and never has been a matter of discussion foreign to the national law of the public debt, in which it appears with all its legal guarantees.

The war which for the past year has devastated Venezuela has left the public treasury almost exhausted, and it has been impossible for the administration to attend for the moment to the serious necessities of the national debt.

Until the work of pacification, almost accomplished, is completed the difficulty will continue. When peace is declared, which will be soon, it will be unnecessary to remind the Government of the Republic of its fiscal obligations, as it as well knows its duty in this regard, without the necessity of compulsion or stimulus, as your excellency knows the laws of mutual respect and of sound friendship.

Accept, your excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

R. LOPEZ BARALT.

OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAWS,
Caracas, December 17, 1902.

SIR: Ever since the Government of the Republic first explained to the legations of Great Britain and Germany its explicit opinion as to how titles or the rights of their subjects should be discussed in matters affecting national liability, it was very careful to conform its opinion to the clearest principle of domestic sovereignty as well as to the sound precepts of international law. Under the action of this twofold legal power it endeavored to avoid unfortunate differences with those European states; and with the assurance of not having failed in any mutual agreement, but rather omitting to cover up any violation of the interests of the natives of the United Kingdom or of the Empire, it demonstrated in its correspondence with the respective legations the material impossibility, by law, of establishing for English and German subjects, as compared with the natives of the country, any difference as regards civil actions, as is evident would be the case to allow in some instances their persons and property to be exempt from the effects of domestic law in order that they might place themselves under the protection of a power foreign to the territory where said subjects exercise with advantage their ability and faculties.

On that line there was presented to the Imperial legation proofs and arguments taken from German legislation, and to the British legation there was set forth the exact equality which exists between the stipulations of her treaty with Venezuela (1825-1834) and that absolutely required by Venezuelan legislation in order to define any alleged right and to secure the same. In order to consider as just the pretensions of those two Governments with regard to their subjects, they could not fail to see the adequate guaranty of their interests, and it may be that this gave rise to the desire, and more than the desire, the extreme effort to make Venezuela accept as the only estimate the official value of other nations with respect to the nature, the origin, the legitimacy, and amount of the claims arising from acts performed or deeds executed within the territory of the Republic.

Justice, so far as relates to its essential character, is never diversified in its manifestations and effects, whatever be the ground on which it may be shown or the country in which it is analyzed. Its power is always in direct line with the circumstances which engender it or in the quality of the titles to which it is applied; therefore the determination of those two Governments to throw aside Venezuela's opinion as to her domestic authority and the international law which supports that same sovereignty is incomprehensible. No less surprising was the disinclination on their part to examine the question on a truly judicial basis, as Venezuela had done from the beginning. When affairs were in this condition, both nations unexpectedly resolved to appeal to the extreme recourse of force in order that the Republic consent to what she could not in any degree consider in harmony with the prescriptions of justice. The pressure came and was brought to bear when the country is still involved in the disasters of a civil war and the Government dedicated to the task of pacification, through which alone can the Republic recover from her terrible distress. This coercive action comes when the country is feeling the sad results of certain deeds with which, unfortunately, are associated a number of circumstances from which arose, with justice, the series of claims and complaints presented by Venezuela to the Government of Great Britain since last January. And, furthermore, this armed action comes soon after Venezuela had solemnly protested to the Imperial Government against the action of a vessel of the German navy in the waters of the Republic during the months of October and November, both against the rights of the people and international agreement. The Republic has all the force of justice on her side; she feels that she is in the full possession thereof; but the Government is convinced of the futility of her efforts to refer the solution of the difficulty to the calm path of justice, and is obliged to accept the only remedy at hand in order to avoid new disasters to the nation. But if the circumstances of the moment, to whose weight alone she bows, force her to such a sacrifice, she does not admit that the imposition thereof is equivalent to a diminution of the judicial rights of the Republic, victoriously sustained throughout the correspondence relative to the German and British claims. One thing is admitted under the pressure of force, at a certain time, under an exceptional title, and under a solemn protest, and another is that which unites to itself the immutable and permanent life of national interests.

The Government of the Republic, without separating itself in the least from the doctrine of the rights of the people and from constitutional rights, with which its correspondence with the legations was inspired, and constrained only by the pressure of present circumstances, superior to all force, and which could not have been foreseen, sufficiently authorizes your excellency to accept in its name and representation, all necessary authority to peacefully settle the question, and admits, as an exceptional case, without it constituting in any manner a precedent, the recourse of a mixed commission for the examination and determination of that which may be decided upon. Both the formation of said commission and the method of payment shall be the subject of a future agreement, which will be celebrated by your excellency, whom the Government of the Republic had designated as its arbiter for the solution of the grave question even before the allied forces of England and Germany had committed the first aggressive act. That appointment by Venezuela, which was anticipated as much as possible, is an eloquent testimony of the conciliatory spirit which is found animating the Federal Government, and was prompted by the same motive which now fully empowers your excellency to abandon at once the question on the road to settlement in the best manner that circumstances will permit for the national interests.

Upon communicating to your excellency the final reply of the Government of Venezuela, as a result of the extreme coercion exercised against the Republic by two nations of great material power, I repeat the expressions of gratitude which are your due for the cordial and friendly manner shown by your excellency in your interposition in so grave a difficulty.

Accept, your excellency, the renewed assurance of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

LEGATION OF HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF ITALY,
Caracas, August 27, 1900.

SIR: Referring to the formal exceptions which I had the honor to present verbally to the lamented predecessor of your excellency relative to the decree issued by the national Executive April 23, 1900, with regard to the claims arising from the latter part of the war, I am now authorized to state to the Government of the Republic that the Government of the King of Italy can not attribute to the said decree of April 23, 1900, any value whatever, so far as the Government of Italy is concerned, or admit that it in any way can affect the action which, at the proper time, the Government of the King may exercise in the interests of Italian subjects prejudiced during the war of 1898 to 1900.

I have the honor to reaffirm to your excellency the assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

G. P. RIVA.

His Excellency Dr. EDUARDO BLANCO,
Secretary of Foreign Relations.

No. 1138.]

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
 OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAWS,
Caracas, August 30, 1900.

SIR: Your excellency refers in your note of the 27th (No. 372) to the exceptions which were verbally made to my predecessor relative to the executive decree of the 23d of last April, and of your being instructed by the Government of the King of Italy to state that no value can be attributed thereto so far as concerns said Government, or to permit that it can affect any action which at a proper time may be taken in the interest of Italian subjects which may have been prejudiced by the war of which Venezuela was the theater during recent years.

The spirit and form of that note has excited the serious attention of the Government, and in the name of the supreme head of the Republic I shall set forth, with the greatest respect to your excellency, the reasons why its contents have excited surprise.

It is an axiom of public law that all states should be considered equal in everything affecting their judicial capacity, the exercise of their powers, and the fulfillment of their obligations. The eminent Italian, Pascual Fiore, one of the publicists who most categorically announces this principle of political equality, without which the equilibrium of international society would be impossible, and who, before setting this forth in article 143 of his codified law, states in article 113 that to each state is given the exclusive power to judge of the equity of its own laws and of their timeliness and efficiency relative to the protection of rights in all its manifestations. It may be said that in the correlation of such maxims is united territorial sovereignty, for the exercise thereof would clearly suffer limitations should it in any way be subordinated to the influence of foreign interests or be influenced by the force of desires foreign to itself.

The executive decree cited by your excellency did not refer to any certain cases, nor did it have in view any titles that might directly interest any particular nation. It was a provision of a general nature, issued in view of a domestic necessity. Articles 9 and 10 of the constitution of the Republic, furthermore, do not allow the least difference between natives and foreigners in measures of this sort; neither does international law allow the establishment of circumstances that would place persons who are natives of another country in a judicial position superior to the natives of the respective state.

"Every person who voluntarily goes to a foreign country," states Fiore, "is obliged to submit himself during his residence therein to the laws of safety and the police laws. He can not object because the application of said laws are more or less just or burdensome measured by the laws of his own country or those of other states, but is obliged to observe the same form of procedure and has the same rights and guaranties that exist for the citizens of the state." (D. I. C., art. 173; International Law Codified, art. 173.)

The analogy of the foregoing principle with the cases in which public necessity demands measures like those of April 23 is the best pledge of the right under which it was issued and the best title to its general acceptance.

Suppose, your excellency, that the legislator found it necessary, for every act related to public interests, to consult the opinion of corresponding legislation in countries from which foreigners resident in the territory have proceeded; and that such necessity referred to measures not opposed to international law, or, in other words, were in entire harmony with the principles of safety or domestic order which the nations have accepted and which the times sanction and approve. Imagine such a condition, your excellency, and I have confidence in your learned judgment as to the results. As there would be no way to establish the necessary harmony between the respective act and domestic legislation if it were obliged to obey for any reason the diverse opinions which form the constitutional order of other states, there would necessarily follow a series of contradictions in theory and of difficulties in practice which would render impossible or nullify every act of the administration. It was such a line of arguments that writers followed when they declared that "it is impossible to consider a state as sovereign and independent, unless it has the power to dictate its civil and penal legislation according to its convenience, its necessities, and its interests." (Calvo, D. I. T. P., par. 513.)

The equality of rights between natives and foreigners is, as your excellency knows, the pledge of order and a saving principle of justice, for otherwise the incorporation of strange elements into the national life would constitute, especially in countries with a sparse population, a motive for international discord, engendered by that natural sentiment in man which recognizes that the imposition of the same duties must correspond in like circumstances to the rights of all.

When the treaty of June 19, 1861, was celebrated between Venezuela and Italy, which is still in force, those principles and necessities were carefully guarded. In article 4 it was stipulated that "in case of revolution or civil war the citizens or subjects of the contracting parties shall have the right in the territory of the other to be indemnified for the losses and damages caused to their persons or property by the constituted authorities of the country in the same manner and according to the laws which govern or may govern in the event of natives having the right to indemnity." This provision was the complement or result of that contained in the beginning of the same article, according to which the citizens and subjects of the contracting states shall enjoy "the same rights and privileges that are granted to natives, submitting themselves to the conditions imposed upon the latter."

The principle which inspired that part of the Italian-Venezuelan covenant conforms perfectly with that stated by Bluntschli in article 387 of his codified international law. "No state," says he, "is obliged to concede to foreigners personal privileges or rights incompatible with the constitution or fundamental law of the country."

From the foregoing your excellency will no doubt understand the surprise with which the note of the 27th instant has been considered, and the zeal with which it solicits the rectification of the subject treated therein. The upright spirit of the Government of the King and the lofty judgment which distinguishes Your Majesty, encourages the Executive power to here declare with all sincerity that in international affairs it is impossible to accept the sentiments of said note, as it is opposed to the constitution of Venezuela, to the principles of jurisprudence previously invoked, and to the treaty at present in force between the Kingdom and the Republic.

Please accept, Your Excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

EDUARDO BLANCO.

THE LEGATION OF HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF ITALY,
Caracas, April 24, 1901.

SIR: Referring to the verbal exceptions which I had the honor to make to your excellency with respect to the decree of the executive power of January 24 of the current year relative to the claims against the State arising out of the last revolution, I now comply with the duty of informing your excellency that the Government of His Majesty the King of Italy has charged me to state to the Government of the Republic: That it absolutely can not admit the exclusion of the Italian claims prior to May 23, 1899, and which includes the entire revolutionary period from 1898 up to the date above cited; that it can not accept the exclusive competence of the high Federal court, to which is reserved the final decision of the claims in virtue of the decree of February 14, 1873, made operative again by the decree of January 24, 1901; that it can not accept the payment of claims to be made according to the provisions of article 12 of the decree of June 9, 1893, also revived by the above-mentioned decree of the 29th of last January.

I have also been instructed to add, as I hereby do, the most ample exceptions in favor of the rights of the Italian claimants.

I trust that the Government of the Republic will consider it worth while to take into account the equity and the propriety of the considerations that influence the Government of the King, and will have the goodness to recognize the advantage of making a dispassionate examination of the questions, so that a way may be found of arriving at a solution which, respecting all the prerogatives, may at the same time satisfy all the just exigencies of the occasion and all the varied interests discussed.

I am pleased to assure your excellency that you can count fully on my earnest desire and hearty cooperation in the effort to arrive at an equitable and satisfactory solution, which can not be other than the good desired by the efforts of all.

I have the honor to confirm to your excellency the assurance of my highest consideration.

G. P. RIVA.

His Excellency Dr. EDUARDO BLANCO,
Secretary of Foreign Affairs.

No. 542.]

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
 OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAW,
Caracas, May 2, 1901.

SIR: Upon your excellency referring on August 27, 1900, in note No. 372, to the decree of April 23 of that year relative to the period in which claims arising from the war should be presented, and which you presented in the name of your Government, exceptions analogous to those which were contained in your communication of the 24th of last month received during the afternoon of the 25th. And as this department in its reply at that time stated the reasons based both on domestic and international law which obliged it to declare said claims inadmissible, and also the entire legality of the power by which the Chief Executive issued the decree, I consider it proper to repeat at this time in all its details the contents of said reply, not, however, without enlarging upon some judicial opinions, in order that the learned judgment of your excellency and the wise opinion of the Government may reconsider the subject in accordance with the circumstances and its real character.

It is noted with surprise that your excellency considers unacceptable the exclusive jurisdiction of the high Federal court as to the claims of Italian subjects, as though the intervention of such an elevated tribunal on such a subject did not depend upon an old law dictated in the exercise of a sovereign power by the authorities of Venezuela and officially communicated upon the date thereof (1873) to all the States of the Republic and to foreign nations. To exempt a foreigner, on account of the fact that he is a foreign citizen, from the effects of a principle sanctioned both by the constitution of the country where he resides, included in the civil code, and specifically assured by a domestic law would be equivalent to the creation of a condition eminently calculated to engender great difficulties for the nation which opens its doors to just desires and honorable aspirations. The establishment of that difference, which in international law has come to be called "an exorbitant and dangerous privilege," might be assumed, as was very judiciously stated by the department of foreign affairs of Peru in the celebrated circular of October 26, 1897, when it said that governments according to this view are nothing more than "simple insurance companies against dangers and losses which are not caused by them and which in the majority of cases they could not prevent."

When natives and foreigners are equal as to the means of obtaining the recovery of a right or the determination of a title, the latter can have no cause to argue any lack of security, as it is not to be presumed that the legislator, by virtue of his office a representative of the national sovereignty, would sanction acts capable of operating in opposition to his own constituents.

The high Federal court, in its capacity as the first tribunal of the nation, becomes the most efficacious guaranty of justice for the case under discussion. Venezuela gave to the highest of its judicial bodies the examination and decision of those questions in order to facilitate the action of the party in interest and relieve him from applying to a number of courts prior to the final investigation of the alleged rights. In making equal the conditions for both foreigners and natives domestic sovereignty took into account the practices and principles of international law and the necessity of attracting elements that it would be profitable to assimilate, without prejudice to any sentiment of justice or any maxim of equity.

If it were within the power of all other states or any of them to ignore the laws and regulations which a country enacts relative to interests located within its territory, the employment of one of the most sacred powers of the people when constituted into an independent nation would be rendered difficult or at least problematical. It would be necessary for each act required or demanded by the public good to consult with foreign states who, by the exercise of such an abnormal prerogative, would be converted ipso facto into critics of the state that would thus consent to the limitation of its sovereignty. Therefore, Calvo says (par. 513) that "it is impossible to consider a state as sovereign and independent unless it possesses the power to dictate, according to its convenience, its necessities, and its interests, its civil and penal legislation." Further on (par. 514) he adds that "every state has just and legitimate jurisdiction over the persons and things found within its territory, as well as over the acts performed therein, without reference alone to the native subjects of the state, but also with reference to the foreigners resident therein." This principle of international law, which your excellency will find denied by no writer nor questioned by any organized body, is sufficient to describe the condition of affairs and demonstrate that in the law which gives to the high court general jurisdiction over the claims against the nation, there is nothing to throw aside or of doubtful application.

For the courts of justice to take cognizance of claims arising from damages caused by war is neither new in civil life nor unknown to international law. Without piling up citations upon this point I consider it sufficient to recall, with the eminent Fiore, that "when a conference met in Paris in 1869 for the purpose of passing upon the difficulties between Turkey and Greece, one of the important rules established by the declaration of February 15 was that Ottoman subjects were obliged to apply to Greek courts in order to claim indemnity for the losses caused by the acts of individuals and for those suffered during the war." (New International Public Law, According to the Necessities of Modern Civilization, par. 653.) It should be mentioned that in paragraph 648, when the learned Italian referred to the duty of protecting the citizens themselves, he establishes under a letter a the first rule, as follows: "Protection is illegal and unjustifiable when its purpose is to secure for the natives resident in a foreign country a privileged position." This maxim or precept assumes the highest importance, because action contrary thereto would often oblige the state in which the foreigner resides to consider him not as he is in reality and as the industrious Italian ever will be considered in Venezuela, an element of progress or a factor which enjoys the advantages of life on a level with the natives, but as a sort of increasing danger capable of gradually constituting the greatest of dangers to the public administration and to the national sovereignty.

Nor is the formal invocation of the judicial maxims to which Venezuela appeals in claiming it to be inadmissible for diplomacy to consider questions relative to claims of this class a new thing in the diplomatic correspondence of nations. The Italian legation itself, in treating of a similar subject in a note which was addressed to the royal department of foreign affairs in Rome, August 30, 1894, set forth the result of a free investigation, from which was deduced the existence of a certain uniform decision to refuse to insert anything of the kind or anything foreign to the equality of treatment established by each code of domestic law.

Here are the paragraphs to which I refer:

"The Italian school, having advanced the principle that judicial opinions deduced from natural law are those which should serve as a rule for the solution of questions which refer to the liability of a state for losses which may be the object of an international claim, has opened the way for an indefinite variety of solutions of the complex problem.

"And the jurisprudence presented is not less uniform and explicit. When the liability of Chile with regard to the losses suffered by neutral foreigners during the war with Peru was discussed, while the Italian Government affirmed that it was its opinion 'that all losses not caused by force majeure or by the necessities of war should be considered as subject to obligatory indemnization,' it was the right of the local government to pass upon any losses suffered by foreigners. The Government of France declared that, according to the doctrine it had always held, 'the losses which neutrals suffer in war in strict justice are not to be indemnified and that indemnity can only be requested by appealing to sentiments of equity.' The English Government, even more zealous of the principle of noninterference announced the maxim that 'the foreign subjects who suffer the consequences of war have no more right to secure compensation than the natives of the country.' The Spanish Government, assuming an attitude of absolute reserve, stated that 'rather than occupy herself with the interests of her subjects prejudiced by that war she should occupy herself in maintaining amicable relations with Chile so as not to injure the political and economical interests of Spain in her ancient colonies;' and, finally, the Cabinet of Berlin absolutely evaded the expression of an opinion on the question that in any way would compromise it with the claimants, not, however, without manifesting its determination of not departing from the rule which Prince Bismarck clearly defined when he said: 'The Imperial Government does not consider itself obliged to protect its subjects who for business reasons go to a foreign land except so far as the general interests of the Empire permit.'

"The truth is, and the history of diplomatic questions during these past years clearly demonstrate it, that at the close of this century, while thinkers are making greater efforts to find in the indefinite sphere of theoretical ideas the conciliation of human differences, the government of states show more than ever a marked tendency to draw the rule of their procedure from positive opinions of practical utility."

The American Republics on their part, in defense of their rights and interests, have dedicated all their efforts against what they call an excess of diplomatic protection in support of foreign claims.

Your excellency knows that with reference to claims there are, as in all human business susceptible of investigation, opposing interests whose examination pertains alone to those who have in their hands the direct springs of justice.

To take such questions from their proper sphere in order to carry them to that of the executive power where opposing action can not be raised or admitted would be to change the natural order of things and even mix attributes and powers to the detriment of the very right alleged or to the intrinsic nature of all the circumstances in the case. A little consideration given to such a delicate question would produce the conviction that to observe such proceedings without any protest would reduce the executive departments to mere bureaus of information, and the foreign legations to mere agents, and the orders of the heads of bureaus and secretaries to the simple exercise of powers analogous to those employed without recourse in the ordinary course of civil affairs.

Fearing such an abnormal condition and careful to avoid it, governments often define in special treaties the condition of equality, so far as relates to the protection and security of persons and property, that should exist between their own subjects or citizens and those of the other contracting nation.

Forty years ago, in a treaty still in force, Italy and Venezuela so agreed. Article 4 provides the most complete parity between the subjects of the Kingdom and the citizens of the Republic living in the territory of the other, and explicitly provided such parity so far as regards the manner of obtaining indemnity for losses or damages arising from domestic discord. Therefore, in addition to the general principles of law from the principle immanent in sovereignty and the eternal and unchanging precepts of justice, there is that special reason why the Government of Venezuela should respectfully declare in reply to the note of your excellency the impossibility of accepting any of the exceptions therein enumerated relative to the claims of Italian subjects. The decree of January 24 last past, so far as it relates to such claims, and the other provisions therein cited, in so far as they are applicable, constitute the only rule which those interested can employ for the examination of the rights or titles which they allege.

Accept, your excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

EDUARDO BLANCO.

Resident Minister of His Majesty the King of Italy.

LEGATION OF HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF ITALY,
Caracas, April 19, 1902.

MR. MINISTER: By order of my Government, and referring to the communication which I had the honor of addressing to your excellency's predecessor the 24th of April, 1901, No. 246, I hasten to transmit to your excellency a list of 123 claims presented by Italian subjects for the purpose of obtaining indemnity from the Government of the Republic for the damages occasioned by the civil wars during the period from 1898 to 1900.

The claims of which it treats were admitted by this royal legation after being conclusively proved in accordance with the judgment and instructions of the Government of the King, and it having recognized only the actual damages and losses, with the exclusion of moral injuries and of the loss of revenue.

The total value of the claims amount to 2,810,255.95 bolivars, for the effectual payment of which I request the Government of the Republic to deign to take the steps necessary to this end.

If the National Congress, now convened, should come to any decision relative to the adjudication of the claims of the same title presented by the imperial legation of Germany, the Government of the King requests that the identical favorable measures which that Congress shall eventually determine upon for the adjudication of the German claims or of those of any other nation shall be applied to the Italian claims.

I have the honor to inform your excellency that all the original documents in support of each of the claims will be found in this royal legation, ostensibly for the examination by a delegate of the Government of the Republic, but to facilitate such examination on the part of the Government I have ordered them copied, and I reserve the transmittal to your excellency of the 123 records until the copying of the documents in the respective cases be finished.

I have the honor of renewing to your excellency the assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
OFFICE OF PUBLIC FOREIGN LAW,

MR. MINISTER: I submitted to the constitutional President of the Republic your excellency's courteous note of the 19th instant, received in this department with a list of claims of Italian subjects for damages which they allege were occasioned by the wars which occurred in the Republic between 1898 and 1900.

In view of the fact of your excellency's beginning by referring to a communication from the honorable legation in your charge, dated the 24th of April, 1901, and using it as the subject-matter for your present communication, when the former had been answered the 2d day of May following, with a full explanation of the doctrine averse to procedure in such matters other than determined by the legislative body of the country, much surprise has been occasioned to the supreme magistrate that the request should now be presented in this form when no objection whatever had been offered to the arguments which were then advanced in the name of the national sovereignty, in support of the maxims of public law applicable to the case, and of the stipulations of the treaty in force between Venezuela and the Kingdom of Italy, in order to prove the impossibility of admitting any intervention whatever in that direction other than that foreseen by the laws which regulate it.

Your excellency knows that neither public nor private laws contain any ambiguity with regard to the setting forth of a just claim, and when this is based on approved facts and on defined circumstances all new proof or argument in its support becomes superfluous. Venezuela has legislated on this point without considering other principles than the equality of civil conditions between natives and foreigners—principles universally respected and to the practice of which the worthy Italian nation reassented in signing the treaty of June 16, 1861.

It is opportune to here state, according to the data filed in the department relative to these cases and verified by the publication made in No. 8262 of the Official Gazette, that in the name of many Italian subjects there was presented to the "junta calificadora" (board of examiners) created by the decree of January 24, 1901, the records relative to certain alleged damages, and that that body, in the exercise of its legitimate rights, recognized such of them as appeared to have been based on those conditions which are essential to make the title valid.

In view of the foregoing and of the other antecedents which bear on the case, and to which this department has already referred in its correspondence with your honorable legation, the President considers it unnecessary to unfold other proofs in support of the impossibility mentioned; and he has given me instructions to reiterate to your excellency the manifestations made in the notes of Señor Blanco of the 30th of August, 1900, and of the 2d of May, 1901, not without adding, by way of information, that the Congress of the Republic, deferring to a suggestion made by the same supreme magistrate in his recent message, will arbitrate, perhaps very shortly, the manner for determining the matter of the claims which, through fortuitous circumstances, failed to be presented to the junta especially created for the study and qualification of those arising from the war begun in May, 1899.

The list forwarded by your excellency will be filed in this office as part of the communication of the 19th, which is here answered.

I pray your excellency to accept the renewed professions and assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAW,
Caracas, June 30, 1902.

MR. MINISTER: My predecessor in referring, on the 24th of April last, to the list of claims of Italian subjects mentioned by your excellency in the note addressed to me on the 28th instant, under No. 299, received to-day, reiterated the arguments adduced by this department in a previous correspondence in order to show the impossibility of accepting in this respect any direction other than that determined by the legislative body of the country.

All the surprise occasioned by the presentation of the list in a form considered as unacceptable was at that time expressed, and there was adduced in explanation of this surprise the reason that not the least objection had been made to any of the arguments advanced in the name of the national sovereignty, supported by the best-known principles of general law and by the stipulations of the treaty in force between Venezuela and Italy, in order to prove the impossibility of admitting any intervention in the direction of claims other than that specifically provided by the legislative body of the country.

If there was surprise then, as the legation was informed, much greater has been that occasioned by the note of the 28th instant, to which your excellency attached a series of documents of which it is impossible for this department of itself to assume charge, for the reason that they treat of affairs pertaining to a different sphere of administration as, previously demonstrated.

On this account, and in accordance with recent instructions from the President, I reiterate to your excellency in a most respectful manner all that has been set forth in the communications of the 30th of August, 1900, of the 2d of May, 1902, and of the 24th of April, 1902, communications sufficiently explicit as to the precedents which support the rights of Venezuela in this matter, the doctrine which strengthens and the opinions which corroborate it. And inasmuch as it relates to nothing less than one of the first attributes of the state, greater must be the obligation to declare categorically and most imperatively the necessity of sustaining it in all its fullness. None of the legitimate interests which grow or are developed under the vigilance of the laws of a country can, without detriment to the most elementary principles of law, pretend that appeals of different origin from those which submit themselves to the respective regulations of the country aid in any way in their exposition or adjudication. This would be tantamount to foregoing in the present case one of the stipulations of article 4 of the treaty of 1861, and to relinquishing on certain points the operations of domestic sovereignty which alone is called upon to give the most befitting judicial solution in cases of a judicial nature, whatever may be that class to which these cases may belong.

The documents remitted by your excellency with regard to this matter can not be acted upon by this department, and must therefore remain as part of the communication of the 28th, which is here conclusively answered.

Accept, your excellency, the renewed professions and assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

LEGATION OF HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF ITALY,

MR. MINISTER: In the communication of the 24th of April, 1901, No. 246, I had the honor to inform the minister of foreign affairs of the Republic that in the adjustment of the Italian claims relating to the revolutionary period beginning with the Hernandista movement, in March, 1898, and closing with the advent of General Castro to power, in October, 1899, the Government of His Majesty the King of Italy could not accept the regulations established by the decree of the Federal Executive of the 24th of January, 1901, and the Government of the King mentioned that determination, notwithstanding the argument set forth in the note of the honorable minister of the Republic, dated the 2d of May, 1901, No. 542.

Therefore the royal legation, conforming itself to the instructions of the Royal Government, examined, agreeable to the standards prescribed by the latter, the claims presented to it for the above said period, and with the communication of the 19th of April, 1902, No. 167, I had the honor to transmit to the minister of foreign affairs a list consisting of 123 Italian claims for the total sum of 2,810,255.95 bolivars, praying the Government of the Republic that it deign to take measures tending toward its payment.

By command of the Government of the King, I now address anew to the Government of the Republic the prayer that it deign to order without delay the payment of the sum of 2,810,255.95 bolivars, the amount of the Italian claims for the revolutionary period of 1898-1900, claims examined and adjudged valid by the royal legation.

I have the honor, moreover, to state to your excellency that the Government of the King expressly reserves all claims which, subsequent to the period mentioned, were or may be presented by Italian subjects, whether for damages resulting from the civil war begun in 1901, or from any other title or credit or action against the Government of the Republic, and asks, therefore, that the Government of the Republic be good enough to declare itself disposed to give to such claims the attention which may put an end to further discussion, accepting the opinion of a mixed commission.

Finally, I discharge the duty of signifying to your excellency that the Government of the King, believing that the Venezuelan Government will satisfy its demands, reserves, however, all further action in the event of the Italian claims not being equitably adjusted.

I have the honor to reiterate to your excellency the assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAWS,
Caracas, December 13, 1902.

SIR: The Government of the Republic considered yesterday the note of your excellency sent to this department on the 11th instant at 6 p. m. relative to the claims of Italian subjects, which have been the subject of correspondence with the Italian legation. Your excellency will remember the dates referring to the official regulations of Venezuela relative to that subject and also one of the numerous occasions upon which this department stated the arguments against the opinion formed upon the subject by the Government of the Kingdom. There accompanied the note a list of the claims presented on the 19th of April of the present year, and after requesting that without delay provision be made for the payment of the amount thereof, explicit exceptions are made in the name of the Government with reference to other claims that may be presented corresponding to a period later than that included in the list mentioned. The note concludes by asking for special procedure with respect to those other claims, and indicates that further action shall be reserved in case the claims of Italian subjects should not be satisfactorily arranged.

In order to fully follow the correlation of ideas relative to this subject, and which define the same, it will be necessary to repeat what Venezuela has set forth relative thereto in all the notes directed to your excellency from August 30, 1900, up to the one addressed to you June 30 of the present year; but as said correspondence has as yet been productive of no good, it will be sufficient to demonstrate, in harmony with the note of day before yesterday, that there is really no difference between the wishes of the Italian Government and the legal possibility of assenting thereto on the part of Venezuela, providing that what is desired is the security of the interests that are really identified with said claims. It is not to be presumed that the ideas of the Government of His Majesty can be different; and as every judicial opinion advanced by Venezuela in the course of the correspondence relative to this subject, far from attempting in any way to evade the fulfillment of obligations foreseen by the national laws, conformed exactly thereto according to the essential nature of each claim, as can be proved by another examination of the notes of August 30, 1900, of May 2, 1901, and of April 24 and June 30 of the current year, and the Executive power believes that there is no room for a difference, even looking at the subject from the specific point of view to which the communication of your excellency wishes to confine it, when said obligations are defined as to their character and prosecuted according to the treaty of 1861 between Italy and Venezuela. The action of the Government of the King can not go contrary to that treaty, nor can the Government of the Republic violate the same; so that in its provisions can be seen by all an efficacious guarant of the interests of Italian subjects in the particular case mentioned by your excellency. The Government, therefore, sees no reason to take the question from its natural sphere, especially at a time when the Federal Executive is using every effort to put an end to the difficulties arising from the war and others of an unforeseen nature which have embarrassed action which he has already initiated for the purpose of restoring to a normal condition the different branches of the public administration. One of these branches is precisely that to which the note of your excellency refers and to which has been given all possible attention in accordance with the provisions specially adopted by the last Congress in favor of claimants for losses caused to their persons and property by acts of the constitutional authorities of the country. As soon as the Federal Executive assured the Government of the King through his legation in Caracas of the strict application of the clauses of the treaty of 1861 the subject, which was the object of the note of day before yesterday (an application entirely in harmony with the antecedents cited), no reason for disagreement could arise serious enough to change the cordial relations that have ever been maintained between the Kingdom and the Republic.

Please accept, your excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

SIR: I have the honor to advise your excellency, for the information of the Government of the Republic, that the Government of His Majesty the King of Italy, as a result of the reply of your excellency of the 13th instant, No. 1460, relative to the claims of Italian subjects, has resolved to retire from Caracas its resident minister, together with the personnel of the royal legation.

I also have the honor to advise your excellency that, by virtue of the orders of his excellency the secretary of foreign affairs, I have intrusted to the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America the protection of Italian subjects and of Italian interests in Venezuela.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAWS,

SIR: His excellency the minister resident of His Majesty, the King of Italy, on the 11th of the current month, after the combined squadrons of England and Germany had already committed their first acts of hostility against Venezuela, addressed an official note to the Federal Government in order to secure the immediate payment of various claims of Italian subjects similar to those presented by the two nations mentioned with a manifestation of armed force, and, furthermore, said note was intended to secure the submission of other claims, arising at another time, to the examination and decision of a mixed commission. On the 13th the secretary of foreign affairs replied in accordance with the prior correspondence with the legation, a correspondence in which was sufficiently defined the judicial aspect of the question, after which there was set forth in the reply the formal and friendly declaration that in the judgment of the Venezuelan Government the claims should be absolutely referred to the explicit provisions of the treaty in force between the Kingdom and the Republic, and was far from opposing the perfect harmony long maintained between the two nations. The treaty to which I refer contains in article 4 a provision whose literal meaning is as follows:

"In case of revolution or civil war, the citizens and subjects of the contracting parties shall have the right, in the territory of the other, to be indemnified for the losses and damages caused to their persons and properties by the constituted authorities of the country, in the same manner, and according to the laws in force therein, by which natives themselves would have the right to claim indemnity."

Yesterday, on the 16th of the current month, while the Government was deeply engaged in searching for a solution to the grave emergency raised by the attitude of England and Germany, the representative of His Majesty Victor Emanuel III addressed another communication to the Federal Executive in order to advise him that as a result of the reply of the 13th, a reply prompted by the broadest spirit of conciliation, the Royal Government decided to withdraw its legation from Caracas and commended to your excellency the representation of Italian interests in the Republic, a power immediately granted by the Government with the temporal condition of which your excellency is now informed and in harmony with the note of your excellency received this morning.

The act of the Government of Italy, so serious in itself, and even more serious on account of the occasion selected for its execution, not only indicates but demonstrates the existence of another conflict raised against the Venezuelan nation, as if from her poverty of material means of defense—unfortunately very far from corresponding to the magnitude and strength of her rights in the questions of claims—three powerful states of Europe have desired to make simultaneously said weakness a means of giving power to material force or to a position to which is necessarily opposed to all principles upon which rest the common peace of the people. Before that show of force, before that purpose, which seriously wounds the political equality of cultured states, Venezuela must bow, but without the claims of Italy, carried so far, and against which the Venezuelan Government solemnly protests, constituting any precedent whatsoever, in the sense of debilitating the lofty maxims, the universal principles, the foundations of judicial order, with which the executive power of the Republic was supported from the beginning of its correspondence with the legation, in order to find in the procedure provided by national laws and by the treaty in force between Venezuela and the Kingdom the only possible solution of the subject.

After the above statement, which justice demands and national sovereignty requires, the Government of the Republic fully authorizes your excellency to accept in its name and representation whatever may tend to the pacific adjustment of the question, and admits as a strictly exceptional measure the recourse of a mixed commission, after which examination shall decide the other claims of a like nature belonging to another period to which reference has been made.

Upon thus stating to your excellency the decision which the Government has absolutely been obliged to adopt by a show of force with respect to the Italian claims you are requested in the name of the Venezuelan Government to exercise the petitioned intervention in order to remedy a very grave difficulty.

Please to accept, your excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

Result of the debate of the National Congress on the three protocols of the 13th of February.—Report of the high commission of foreign affairs, charged with the consideration and report of the protocols signed in Washington by the Commissioner of Venezuela and the representatives of Germany, Great Britain, and Italy.

CITIZEN PRESIDENT OF THE CONGRESS:

The three protocols which the Federal Executive has just presented to the Congress as the termination of the question under dispute against the Republic by the German-Anglo-Italian alliance, can not be considered as the equal of those international agreements of normal and just character in which reciprocal interests and the mutual convenience of the contracting parties are carefully guarded. To attribute to those protocols the qualities virtually foreseen by the constitution in No. 16 of article 54 is absolutely impossible, inasmuch as they are based on conditions which the Executive power, with great courage and patriotism, in keeping with the greater abundance of knowledge, has just repelled as being contrary to the radical principles of our constitution. The agent of Venezuela subscribed to those conditions under the compulsion of force in the very moments when the waters of the Republic were occupied by the squadrons of the alliance.

The agreements then obtained are the work or effect of circumstances which do not appear to have been anticipated in any part of our legislation. They have their origin directly in events beyond all normal engagements; not in stipulations concerted under the desire of reciprocal benefit. To submit them to the constitutional procedure for examination by the Congress would be to withdraw them from the sphere of imposition in which they were prepared and signed, in order to raise them to a legal plane absolutely foreign to their peculiar nature.

Article 15 of the constitution of Venezuela forbids the Government to conclude with other nations any treaty which impairs the principles established in its articles 13 and 14; and as in none of the three protocols do those articles appear to be consulted, but, rather, manifestly omitted, one is forced to conclude that the agent of the Republic did not have in view their acceptance, but only to modify the violence of the circumstances which menaced the country under the irresistible power of the armed coalition. The condition created by those protocols is not, then, properly speaking, a lawful condition. Treating of a state of affairs truly abnormal, and itself abnormal, far from establishing any law, it excludes the application of all.

Note most clearly those irregularities on the part of the Italian portocol, wherein it refers to the treaty of June 19, 1861, since therein, at the same time that it is ratified and confirmed, its clauses are essentially modified, as if its only object were to substitute some stipulations for others, without regard to the process which is indispensable in order to give them validity. To modify a treaty in a sense contrary to that established and observed conformable to the same, for more than forty years of international life, is to annul it in all its parts, especially when it coincides in the possible coexistence of two clauses which are contradictory, by reason of containing regulations or principles diametrically opposed. If the fourth article of the treaty established, since 1861, that in the matter of indemnifications for damages resulting from civil war the subjects or citizens of one side could not have better claims than the natives of the other—the phrase introduced now in article 26, with entire confusion of ideas and of circumstances, results in establishing a difference between the two, which, to the destruction of the original stipulation, demolishes the general covenant of which it formed a part. The evident discrepancy between two articles renders impossible the existence of the treaty in which it is desired that both be contained.

The Commission deems that, given the nature of the three protocols, it is not incumbent on the Congress to exercise in respect to them the faculty conferred by No. 16 of article 54 of the constitution; and if, as seems just and necessary, it may be desired in some way to strengthen the action of the Executive in that which conduces to their inevitable fulfillment, the legislative body may limit his intervention to a faculty of concrete and exceptional character, to the end that from the abnormal circumstances which determine at this point such obligations there may never be deduced the least precedent for the political life of the Republic.

The Commission also holds that the subsistence of the treaty with Italy is neither logical nor acceptable after that established by the protocol, and that it is necessary to urge the Executive power to use the authority with which he is empowered in article 27 of the same for its immediate denunciation.

Caracas, March 30, 1903.

92d—45th.

CITIZEN PRESIDENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS, PRESENT:

With your official letter of the 27th instant, No. 271, I received the three protocols which the agent of Venezuela with the representatives of Germany, England, and Italy signed in Washington the 13th of February last.

And I have the honor to state to you that after their discussion in the session of the 26th ultimo, the Congress sanctioned the two resolutions which I herewith remit to you.

God and federation.

J. A. VELUTINI.

The Congress of the United States of Venezuela:

Whereas the protocols drawn up in Washington the 13th of February last by the agent of Venezuela and the representatives of Germany, Great Britain, and Italy were concluded and signed in the midst of a situation of force created in the Republic in a manner as unforeseen as it was abnormal; and

Whereas such documents can not on that account be considered according to the form established for diplomatic negotiations begun, followed up, and concluded in the regular way:

Be it resolved, To withhold from the aforesaid protocols the sanction of the constitutional procedure pertaining to diplomatic treaties and to limit its action in regard to them to authorizing the Federal Executive that he put them in operation, without permitting that any of their clauses establish the least precedent in the political life of the Republic.

Given in the Federal legislative palace, in Caracas, the 28th day of March, 1903, the ninety-second year of independence and the forty-fifth of federation.

The Congress of the United States of Venezuela:

Whereas the interpretation given in the protocol, signed with Italy the 13th of February last, to the treaty of the 19th of June, 1861, and the amplification or modification of some of its clauses render impossible the subsistence of said treaty, inasmuch as it is in flagrant contradiction to some of its original stipulations and of the principles which by virtue of the same were mutually observed by both parties:

Be it resolved, To urge that the Federal Executive with the utmost dispatch make use of the power contained in article 27 of said treaty with regard to its denunciation.

Given in the Federal executive palace, in Caracas, the 28th of March, 1903, the ninety-second year of independence and the forty-fifth of federation.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,

Caracas, December 31, 1901.

SIR: By decree issued yesterday, and which your excellency will find in the Official Gazette inclosed, the Executive power declared as pirate the vessel which under the name of Libertador navigates in the waters adjacent to Venezuela and is notoriously in the service of the present disturbers of the interior peace of the country.

In communicating this measure I have the honor to ask that your excellency transmit it to the Government which you so worthily represent, with the request of the Executive power of Venezuela to the effect that at the arrival of said vessel in port or waters of Great Britain or her colonies it be detained, in conformity with the principles of international law applicable to the case, while the Executive power substantiate effectually the proof of the circumstances which have placed the said ship in that condition.

I renew to your excellency the assurance of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

BRITISH LEGATION, Caracas, January 3, 1902.

MR. MINISTER: The articles of the decree which accompanied your excellency's note of the 31st of last month attribute to refugees in the Antilles conspiracy against the peace of Venezuela even to the point of arming a vessel of war, and present as proof assertions to that effect—advanced by General Matos in an address made on board that boat, presumably the Ban Righ, or Libertador.

I have seen the address of that gentleman in the papers and I can find no such assertion from which such inference could be drawn. It is, moreover, a well-known fact that General Matos came recently by steamer directly to Martinique from Europe and that the Ban Righ also came directly there from Europe without touching, as I can affirm, above all, at Trinidad.

That decree, immediately declaring the Ban Righ a pirate, says that it should be punished as such, and offers a reward or prize to the war ships of all nations for her capture, as well as to all private ships provided with a license to sail in Venezuelan waters.

The only reason given in the decree for this declaration is that the Ban Righ, which had changed its name to that of Libertador, is not provided with the license of any nation and therefore forfeits its right to navigation.

Without entering into the question as to whether or not this constitutes a sufficient motive for its being declared a pirate, I am in position to state to your excellency that the Venezuelan Government has evidently been misinformed with regard to finding this boat unprovided with papers, as I have just learned officially that the Ban Righ carries the English flag and is provided with British papers. As, therefore, the basis of this declaration is not exact, the declaration itself falls ipso facto to the earth. It is not, then, a pirate, nor in any way conformable to the conditions for such qualification which are set forth by the Venezuelan Government in this decree.

The Government of His Majesty has informed me that I might indicate to your excellency that it approves the language which I had the honor to officially address to your excellency the 31st of last month, advising the Venezuelan Government, in a most friendly and at the same time most serious manner that it avoid any infraction of international law with regard to British lives and properties in case of the capture of the Ban Righ.

As this notice was given when, as the Government of His Majesty knows as well as your excellency, I was not certain as to whether or not the Ban Righ was a British ship, and as I now, moreover, not only know that it is of British nationality, but likewise that it in no way complies with the condition stated by the Venezuelan Government by which it may be considered as a pirate, this approval would now seem to have double force.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurance of my highest consideration.

BRITISH LEGATION, Caracas, January 5, 1902.

MR. MINISTER: In your excellency's note of the 31st of last month, you inform me that a boat named El Libertador, which is known to be in the service of some insurgents, is navigating in Venezuelan waters, and at the same time you ask that I communicate to my Government your excellency's request so that in the event of this ship's arrival in the waters of Great Britain or her colonies, it may be detained in conformity with the principles of international law.

I have the honor to inform your excellency, in reply, that without loss of time I shall forward this request. In the meanwhile, refraining, as in my last note, from entering into the general question as to whether in conformity with those principles this ship may be considered as a pirate—"hostis humani generis"—and without repeating the evidence contained in my reply that it is not a pirate, even according to the reasons advanced by the Venezuelan Government as proof that it is, I may assure the Venezuelan Government that that of His Majesty will proceed, as it always does in such cases, in conformity with the rules of British and international law.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurance of my highest consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAW,
Caracas, January 7, 1902.

MR. MINISTER: The President of the Republic found your excellency's note of the 3d, relative to the revolutionary ship which, under the name of Libertador, is navigating in waters adjacent to the coast of Venezuela in an attitude hostile to the constitutional power, deserving of most serious consideration. Your excellency says that you have official information to the effect that this ship carries the British flag and is provided with British papers.

The fact of a steamer manned by persons inimical to the Government of Venezuela and notoriously employed in revolutionary operations being found under such circumstances is so grave a matter that its existence could scarcely be conjectured were it not testified to by that worthy legation.

The cordial relations which the Government of this Republic cultivates with that of His Majesty induce the belief that the British authorities or agents who held some part in the commission of the ship could not have proceeded with a precise knowledge of affairs, or have operated perhaps in an indirect way, since otherwise there would attach to them a very grave responsibility for which your excellency's Government would be held answerable in the spirit of justice with which every civilized nation like Great Britain surrounds its acts and in conformity with the sincere sentiments which characterize its relations with this Republic.

The Government desires frankly to go into the earlier phases of this delicate subject, and with this end in view counts upon the friendly attitude of Great Britain.

As to the condition in which its own operations have placed the ship, and of which the decree of the 30th of December treated, the Government feels unable to accommodate itself to your excellency's view, as stated in the aforesaid note as well as that of the 5th instant.

The opinion set forth in the matter by your excellency is at variance not only with that held by other countries, but with the jurisprudence established by Venezuela and which was the same in an analogous case accepted by Great Britain. I give here the precedent:

On the 15th of May, 1882, Gen. Guzman Blanco, in his character of President of the Republic, issued a decree based on circumstances similar to those which obtain at present and of which information was given to the British legation for reasons also analogous to those which called forth my note of the 31st of December. The honorable Mr. Malo O'Leary replied on the 17th of that month, informing me that he had referred the subject to London and to Puerto España, without adducing any reason against the measure nor even by way of reserve. And while at the very time the minister of Venezuela at the court of His Majesty might have been recommending that action be taken there was received from Lord Granville the reply, a copy of which is inclosed to your excellency in order that it may please you to consider how different an opinion then guided the action of the British Government and how differently it regarded the request of Venezuela. The principles of friendliness between the colonies and the Republic were more in evidence then than now, although for the moment the cause of the difference which the legation has wished to establish is not discovered.

Thus, in view of the foregoing and of the fact that the hostile attitude of the steamer Barrigh, called now Libertador, is clearly established, the President of the Republic hopes through your excellency to see categorically accepted the opinion, not only by the Venezuelan Government but likewise that of His Majesty, said boat is a pirate, and with so much more reason, inasmuch as said boat in making use of the English flag, as it is now doing in acts contrary to international maritime law, it is deserving of repression and punishment on the part of Great Britain and by virtue of its own internal laws.

Accept, your excellency, renewed protestations and assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

J. R. PACHANO.

His Excellency Mr. WILLIAM HENRY DOVETON HAGGARD,

MR. MINISTER: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 22d of last month, in which you call my attention to the proceedings of a steamer known under the name of Cantabro, alias the Colon, which, as you inform me, does not carry National papers and has committed several acts of piracy in the waters of Venezuela and on the heights of the Venezuelan coast.

In reply I take the liberty to state to you that you may inform your Government that, in view of the reports which have been sent to the metropolis by the agents of His Majesty relative to the movements of the boat, orders have been given to the commander in chief of the North American station and the Antilles, to the commodore at Jamaica, and to the first naval officer in the Barbados to the effect that if any of His Majesty's ships meet it, they should take measures to verify its papers and its nationality. The report which has been received with respect to this boat has also been communicated to the governor of Trinidad and to those of the other British colonies in the Antilles.

I have the honor to be, Mr. Minister, with the highest consideration,

Your very obedient and humble servant,

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAW,
Caracas, January 14, 1902.

MR. MINISTER: On the 3d instant your excellency notified the Government of the Republic that you had received official information to the effect that the steamer Ban Righ, which had changed its name to that of Libertador, and which the executive power has recently declared a pirate, flies the English flag and is provided with British papers. Such circumstance was considered as of the utmost gravity, inasmuch as the Government was possessed of categorical proofs of the hostility of the boat and sufficient reasons for believing that it was sent to Venezuelan waters in the manifest connivance with the rebels existing in two of the Venezuelan States. The proclamation sent to the ship amounted to a full confirmation of the above statement, notwithstanding the slight significance which is attributed by your excellency to this act of rebellion against the National Government.

Shortly afterwards the sloop Santa Clara arrived in the neighboring port of La Guaira, with the work of death wrought by this same pirate boat, and subsequently it was learned that the crew of the latter had sheltered the revolutionary refugees at Trinidad and Curaçao, as is general and notorious in said Antilles, with a view to conducting them secretly to the coast of Venezuela and there facilitating their disembarkation.

Although the British nation, from whose ports, according to your excellency's own report, the aggressive ship sailed, counts among its laws such adequate measures as that entitled "Foreign enlistment act of 1870," the Government has heard nothing of its purpose to bring to judgment and punishment those who contributed to its armament. And if, as we are obliged to suppose, the Government of His Majesty does not uphold the conduct of the privateers and crew of the ship, it is to it to whom, primarily, seems to belong the promotion of justice in their consequent punishment. Neither maritime law nor any concrete principle or maxim of international law can protect a boat placed in such abnormal conditions; and as the Government of Venezuela has ordered that a part of the national fleet go in search of it and give it chase or destroy it, according to the necessities of natural defense, the President desires that your excellency be thoroughly acquainted with the recent acts confirmatory of the culpability of the ship, for the reason that subjects of His Majesty incorporated in its crew fall beneath the natural and just action of the hostilized country.

At the same time the Government wishes to solemnly protest against the unusual fact of there having been armed, equipped, and dispatched in British ports a ship directed to the injury of Venezuelan commerce and to the disturbance, by means of piratical operations, of the tranquillity of the Republic.

The circumstance of the aggressive movement having been prepared in His Majesty's waters, while the British Government and that of Venezuela are cultivating relations distinguished for their cordiality, gives greater force and significance to said protest.

In order that your excellency may better understand some of the acts consummated by the pirate ship, I inclose herewith a certified copy of the depositions made in regard to the attack upon the sloop Santa Clara, depositions in which your excellency will find other circumstances which show the revolutionary character of the ship in contradistinction to that of lawfulness which, according to the reports of your legation, might be attributed to it.

Please accept, your excellency, new protestations and assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

J. R. PACHANO.

His Excellency Mr. WILLIAM HENRY DOVETON HAGGARD,
Resident Minister of His British Majesty.

[Translation.]

BRITISH LEGATION, Caracas, January 11, 1902.

MR. MINISTER: I should be much indebted to you if you would inform me definitely if the ship to which you allude in your notes of the 31st of last month and of the 7th of the present month under the name of Barrigh and Libertador is the same boat as the Ban Righ.

My reason for asking information on this point is that, though I had the honor in my note of the 3d instant of alluding to the discrepancy in the names, in your note of the 7th you again speak not of the Ban Righ, but of the Barrigh, called at present Libertador.

Now I know nothing of any boat of that name, or of those names, except through allusions and accusations against it contained in the decree of the 30th of December and in your excellency's notes.

But if you will do me the honor to refer to my note of the 3d instant, you will see that I state officially that the Ban Righ carries the British flag and is provided with British papers.

This information reached me on the same date from the consul of His Majesty at Martinique, who said, just as I thought, that the Ban Righ, which carries the British flag and was provided with British papers, had sailed from Fort Royal on the 1st instant.

Consequently it could scarcely be found unprovided with papers the 30th of December, date of the decree, as happened with the Barrigh or Libertador, as it is there called; it could not, therefore, be a pirate on that date nor even conform to the very unusual, not to say insufficient, definition given by the Venezuelan Government. Wherefore, if the report of the consul is exact, until the first of the year or after the Ban Righ was at Martinique with the British flag and British papers. Supposing, therefore, that the Venezuelan Government designated this boat by the name of Barrigh, I informed it, as soon as possible, that the assertion of the decree of the 30th, to the effect that on that date it was not provided with papers, was not exact.

Of its subsequent movements I know nothing.

If in your excellency's supposition to the effect that "the British authorities or agents who had to do with the dispatch of the boat could not have proceeded with an exact knowledge of the facts," your excellency sought to express that there may have existed some irregularity as to the way in which the Ban Righ left England, I think that on this point your excellency may be at rest, since always when a boat is dispatched from English ports everything must be regular and orderly. Your excellency, moreover, may be perfectly sure that if it be proved that the boat is a pirate, not only in the opinion of the Venezuelan Government but in that of international law and of the Government of His Majesty, the last would be charged with the responsibility which your excellency says belongs to it, as the alternative of the fault of dispatching the boat, and that the piratical career of the boat would be cut short if it were to encounter one of His Majesty's ships.

Your excellency mentions that in raising the British flag it is committing acts contrary to international maritime law. If your excellency will submit to me proofs of this assertion, I will transmit them to His Majesty's Government, who, without doubt, will investigate the subject without loss of time.

In the meantime, in order to assist the Venezuelan Government in the consideration of the question relative to the degree of responsibility actually incumbent upon the Government of His Majesty in this case, according to international law, I ask if Venezuela is at present at war with another nation, and if it is, if Great Britain has been made a base of military supplies by its opponent.

If the Ban Righ were unprovided with papers, as is erroneously stated in the decree, that would not constitute it a pirate occupied in "robbery or violent depredation on the sea, animo jurandi;" a legal description cited to your excellency by my American colleague in his note of the 4th instant, as the legal definition of piracy. Mr. Bowen in using this generally received definition of this "detestable and atrocious crime," and in arguments founded on it, seems to have proved that the United States at least is not among those countries which, as your excellency says, dissent from my opinion in regard to the character of that crime. I think that your excellency will find that the legations of the United States and England are not in any way singular in our opinions.

Your excellency may add that my opinion is averse to the jurisprudence of Venezuela. Of that I do not know, but you will pardon me if I observe that piracy is preeminently a crime which should be treated with reference to the precepts of international law, according to which the pirate is described as hostis humani generis; that is, essentially an enemy, not only of the Venezuelan people, nor of any one other country, nor even of any one part of such country; wherefore the jurisprudence of Venezuela would not come into account in any way in the consideration by other nations as to what might constitute an act of piracy, except so far as it may be in accord with the principles of international law.

With reference to your excellency's statement that the Venezuelan Government does not agree with my note of the 5th instant, consulting that document, I find it difficult to understand to which part of it you refer.

The object of the note was to state that I would defer, without loss of time to your excellency's request, directing me to inform His Majesty's Government that it was hoped that in the event of the arrival of the ship in the waters of Great Britain or its colonies, it would be detained in accordance with the principles of international law, and to assure your excellency that the Venezuelan Government might be certain that that of His Majesty would operate in conformity with the precepts of British law and with those of international law. The Venezuelan Government can surely make no objection to that.

Should I understand, therefore, that this objection of the Venezuelan Government is applied to the parenthesis and that it maintains in favor of the jurisprudence of Venezuela that a ship must be considered a pirate by other nations simply because it desires that it be so considered, against all international law, and, as I have shown, even against the proved fact of the inexactitude of its own and singular assertion in support of its pretension—that of the lack of papers—or is it that the Ban Righ and the Barrigh are two distinct boats?

Your excellency goes on to cite a previous incident, and is good enough to inclose me the copy of a note from Lord Granville to Senor Rojas, dated the 6th of July, 1892, as applicable, in the opinion of the Venezuelan Government, to the present case.

But I find in that note, besides the identical assertion advanced against the Barrigh or Libertador, that the Cantabro or Colón was not provided with national papers; that Senor Rojas had complained that the latter boat had committed various acts of piracy, and that Lord Granville in his note informed the Venezuelan minister that "in consequence of the reports sent to the metropolis by the agents of His Majesty, orders had been given" to the persons whom it concerned that, "if it is encountered by any of His Majesty's ships they are to give it chase in order to verify its papers and nationality," not—observe this—that it be treated as a pirate, nor even that it be brought to port in order to be judged.

In the present case, however, as I previously demonstrated, the only definite charge made against the ship by the Venezuelan Government—that of being unprovided with papers—was evidently, at least at the time when it was made, inexact. That accusation has not been repeated since, and there is no allegation of their having been committed any piratical act, even from the Venezuelan point of view. There is, therefore, no initial analogy between the two cases. Moreover, your excellency will observe that the instructions to verify the papers and the nationality of the boat, if it be met, were sent out in consequence of the "reports of the agents of His Majesty, relative to the movements of the boat," and therefore not until or until similar reports reach the Government of His Majesty in this matter—of which I am altogether ignorant—there is no similarity whatever between the two cases on this point either.

Therefore the analogy which your excellency may have wished to establish between the two cases falls to earth.

Your excellency says it is hoped by the Venezuelan Government that the opinion that the boat under discussion is a pirate—not only in the eyes of the Venezuelan Government but also in those of the Government of His Majesty—may be accepted, but it seems that the only ground for such an opinion is that it "is navigating in waters near the coast of Venezuela in an attitude hostile to the constitutional power (Venezuelan) manned by persons inimical to the Government of Venezuela, and notoriously employed in revolutionary operations."

All this may serve to indicate that the boat under discussion may be engaged in fomenting a revolution, but what evidence of piracy is there in this? And yet your excellency desires and asks that the Government of His Majesty may treat as guilty of piracy a ship against which you could not yourself present not only any proof, but not even any well-founded accusation of its being guilty of such a crime. I can, however, assure your excellency that, if the Ban Righ—if it is an English ship or otherwise subject to our jurisdiction—commit any piratical crime whatsoever against international law, just measures will be taken in the case, and that, although on one hand the Government of His Majesty can do nothing contrary to international law nor interfere in any way in the internal affairs of Venezuela (which, to judge from opinions so often expressed by the Venezuelan Government on this point, is, I am convinced, the last thing that your excellency would desire), on the other the Government of His Majesty could never countenance any illegality or crime against the principles of international law committed by British subjects against the Venezuelan Government, in the same way that it could not fail to resent any illegal violence whatever committed against the subjects of the King.

I shall avail myself of the first opportunity to transmit the opinions of your excellency to my Government, which will be pleased, no doubt, as your excellency requests, to aid in elucidating the antecedents of this delicate subject and to exercise its good will toward Venezuela in this matter, according to, of course, and subject to, the dictates of British and of international law.

I avail myself of the opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurance of my highest consideration.

W. H. D. HAGGARD.

BRITISH LEGATION, Caracas, January 17, 1902.

MR. MINISTER: It is not the object of this note to answer that which your excellency did me the honor of addressing to me on the 14th instant, but to correct an erroneous assertion contained in the latter.

Your excellency alleges that I have advanced the assertion that this "hostile boat" was sent from the ports of Great Britain.

I regret that your excellency should have attributed to me in an official note assertions which I not only have not made, but which would have been impossible for me to make, since the only knowledge which I have on this subject is that which I get from the newspapers, where I have seen, on the contrary, that the Ban Righ was equipped and subsequently dispatched not in the port of London but in that of Antwerp.

If this is the case, "the solemn protest of the Venezuelan Government against the unusual fact of the equipping and dispatching from English ports of a ship with the purpose of injuring Venezuelan commerce, and of disturbing by piratical operations the peace of the Republic, etc.," can in no way apply to the present case.

Your excellency seems to have confounded the fact of a boat's possessing English papers with its equipment and subsequent dispatch from English ports—two very different matters.

Nevertheless, even supposing that the boat should have been equipped and dispatched from an English port, I should not enter into the question of the unusual responsibility which, even though on the part of Venezuela no declaration of war has been made, nor have the parties engaged in the revolutionary contention been recognized as belligerents, the Venezuelan Government attributes to the Government of His Majesty, founded on the strength of an evidently erroneous allegation, as therefore I have already informed your excellency I have done with your previous communications, I shall transmit this note without loss of time to the Government of His Majesty, which will give it the most careful consideration.

Therefore I wish only to avail myself of the opportunity to inform you that until its instructions are received in the matter I do not propose to enter into any further correspondence on this subject, but in view of the circumstances contained in your excellency's note to which I reply that you speak somewhat enigmatically of the fate which may befall British subjects in case they be incorporated in the crew, if it is captured, I shall limit myself to again insisting that if the crew is captured and in it any British subjects are found, they can not be treated as pirates.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurance of my highest consideration.

W. H. D. HAGGARD.

VENEZUELAN YELLOW BOOK, PAGES 249-256.

No. 115.]

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAW,

MR. MINISTER: Your excellency begins your communication of the 11th instant, received in this office the 15th, with an expression of doubtful opinion concerning the name of the ship lately declared a pirate by the Government of Venezuela, and even asks if the Barrigh and Libertador are the same Ban Righ which recently sailed from Martinique carrying the English flag and provided with British papers. As your excellency charges himself to recall that in your communication of the 3d the discrepancy in the names was incidentally referred to and bases the present inquiry on the circumstance of this department's having later designated the ship in the same way as in the decree of the 30th of December, it seems useless to confirm here that which my silence in respect to that rectification was and is clearly demonstrating.

Your excellency then proceeds to deduce that the ship referred to was not a pirate on the date of the decree, inasmuch as it sailed from Martinique on the 1st instant, according to the reports of the consul of His Majesty, still provided with British papers; but as such a deduction appears unacceptable—unless the ship be considered as a trader, to the exclusion of artillery, ammunition, and of the revolutionary people which it carries—it is necessary to withdraw from that inference in order to enter into the consideration of the facts conformable to the actual circumstances.

Maritime law, in whichever of its branches it treats—private, public, administrative, or international—has fixed rules from which it is not possible to depart without injury to the general interests of commerce and without declaring one's self in open rebellion against the laws of all civilized nations.

The papers of navigation which constitute, as it were, the moral nature of each ship give testimony of its legality or show, as the case may be, its vicious condition. If they have been issued for the exercise of a lawful traffic, and the ship which carries them afterwards brings confusion to an established country by collecting raw recruits for the purpose of landing them in deserted places, in carrying munitions of war from one point to another, and in boarding ships on the high sea, the use of these papers, however legitimate may be their origin, is equivalent to a transgression of extreme gravity, uniting fraud to the other acts committed.

The change of name is, in itself alone, a strong indication of culpability, especially if it occurs in papers issued by Great Britain, where, as in France, the prohibition of change of name is absolute. (Prad. Fod., sec. 2, 287.) Such a change is not probable unless there be designs opposed to the general tranquillity of commerce. The attitude of the ship Libertador can not be considered legal by any nation, and least of all by Great Britain.

With regard to the manner in which the Ban Righ (Libertador) may have left England, your excellency says that the Government can be entirely at rest, because, inasmuch as it sailed from English ports, it presents conditions of regularity. Against that assertion, which the Republic can only accept for the present occasion with all possible reservation, your excellency states that if the ship is considered a pirate, not only in the opinion of Venezuela, but conformable to international law and according to the judgment of the British Government, the latter would accept the responsibility of the case; moreover, that its piratical course should be stopped if the boat were encountered by one of the ships of the British navy.

This last is exactly what Venezuela has asked; and as that legation already has proof of the acts of piracy committed by the ship, the necessity of further solicitation or the presentation of other data for the usual procedure could not be understood. The same, in effect, occurred in 1882. Lord Granville accepted the opinion of Venezuela with regard to the Cantabro and dictated the required orders for its examination on the high seas and the verification of its papers. The difference which your excellency seems to find between that case and the present one rests on a basis or principle very easily removed. Your excellency says, in the first place, that the British orders were issued then in consequence of reports sent to the capital by agents of the Government of Her Majesty, and adds that they referred only to the examination of the papers and to the nationality of the ship. To this I will observe that if at the present time reports entirely analogous to those of 1882 have not been communicated to the capital, it must be through the negligence of the British agents and not through the fault of Venezuela; and that if the orders of that time were not extended from the beginning to the capture and sentence of the Cantabro, it must have been due to the gradation natural in every affair or circumstance of that kind, which commences always by verifying the facts in order to determine thereby the proper mode of procedure. A ship not accused of culpability is never detained nor its papers examined.

In order to ascertain the nature of the responsibility which may fall to the share of Great Britain in the matter, your excellency asks if Venezuela is actually at war with another nation; and if so, if Great Britain has been made a center of supplies for the enemy. The question causes surprise, as your excellency well knows, through my communication of the 31st of last month, that the declaration of piracy was not made with respect to any ship of a foreign navy, but with relation to a boat given up to illegal forays in connivance with the disturbers of the internal peace of the Republic. But, notwithstanding the surprise which it occasions, the question of your excellency gives rise to certain considerations into which I enter at once, in compliance with command of the President, in order to define, with the concurrence of your excellency, a point which appears to present the gravest international interest.

According to the expression of your excellency, or to that which it suggests, the hostile attitude of a ship, in such conditions as the Libertador is found to be, would, during a state of war with another country, be a more serious matter and deserving of greater punishment than under the present circumstances. This, in my opinion, is new in the law of nations. The state of war between two countries produces the effect of belligerency and with it the duties of neutrality well understood and known. One of these duties consists in not permitting the departure of armaments or expeditions to aid any of the belligerents. England stretched this duty to such a point during the Franco-German war (1870-1871) as to order the detention in the Thames of a boat—the International—which was carrying aboard the submarine cable with which France thought to connect Dunkirk with Cherbourg, Brest, and Bordeaux. The request or complaint of Count Bernstorff, ambassador of Prussia, was immediately heeded. Three hours after it was presented the vessel was detained. If such were the strict practice exercised on this point by reason of the contention between two countries who operate, respectively, from the firm seat of their own sovereignty, what must be the result to those who have no representation, either national or international, who wander through the seas without justifiable purpose, and are given up to revolutionary deeds against defenseless coasts? What privilege, what exemption, what prerogative can legalize such difference to the point of leaving the pirate in superior conditions to a ship of the government and powers which proceed in their mutual hostilities according to the customs and laws of warfare? I would respectfully invite your excellency to explain this point so as not to leave established an opinion vague and uninterpretable in regard to so delicate a matter.

If the Libertador is to cross the seas, enter foreign ports, go aboard or destroy vessels, and make landings without regard to any of the restrictions which international law imposes in time of war even on the naval ships of a belligerent power, one will be forced to conclude that to the interest of commerce and liberty of navigation a new danger has arisen, the more alarming inasmuch as it does not originate from the contention of two nations, but from the individual will of everyone who wishes or is able to equip a ship of revolutionary character and perform hostilities with it against any organized country. The treatment due to piracy would be the only remedy for so great an offense. A ship under such conditions can be nothing but a pirate.

"Privateers (says Masse) are different from pirates in that they are authorized by their respective rulers to cruise the seas in time of war, while the pirates overrun the seas at all times without commission from any power. Privateering is a delegation of the right of war made by a sovereign to his subjects against the subjects of an unfriendly nation, or one that is supposed to be so." (Droit commercial, vol. 1, sec. 154.) And now is the time to ask: What ruler has ventured to authorize the ship called the Libertador to receive munitions and carry them to the coast of Venezuela in a stealthy manner, or to collect in the Antilles, also in a secret manner, people destined to disturb in the territory of this Republic the usual industry and commerce? Which government has conferred on it the right to detain at seas, as it did with the sloop Santa Clara, vessels employed in peacefully transporting fruits or merchandise to Venezuelan ports?

Recourse to any treaty of extradition among those recently concluded by Great Britain would suffice to show that it includes deeds similar to those committed by the Libertador among the acts of piracy. One of the treaties, that arranged with the Argentine Republic the 22d of May, 1889, and ratified the 15th of December, 1893, scarcely eight years ago, in enumerating the transgressions which shall be cause for extradition, says as follows:

"22. Piracy and other crimes or transgressions committed at sea on persons or things, and which, according to the respective laws of the two high contracting parties, may be extradition offenses, punishable with a sentence of more than one year."

Without attempting to discern if the British law does or does not consider the deeds committed to the present time by the ship Libertador crimes for extradition, it would be sufficient, according to the understanding of that article, that the other party consider them as such in order to require of Great Britain the consequent procedure.

In the treaty of March 15, 1839, between Venezuela and the United Kingdom, entered into for the purpose of abolishing the slave traffic, the two nations agree (art. 4) to establish by additional convention the acts which should constitute piracy, including the traffic of slaves, and requiring, after said convention, the legislative power of both countries to enact laws for the punishment of said acts committed by the subjects or citizens of each. Now your excellency will see how the essential acts which constituted piracy were to be punished by each of the two countries, with regard to the subjects or citizens of the other. The understanding which prevailed in that treaty does not appear to be the same which now guides the legation.

With regard to your excellency's not understanding to which part of the communication of the 5th mine of the 7th made objection, I think it sufficient to refer to the very communication which I am now answering, which in respect to the point mentioned reads as follows:

"I must understand, therefore, that the objection of the Venezuelan Government is applied to the parenthesis."

If you excellency, yourself, found the explanation, it would seem unnecessary to explain it, except to call attention to the fact that the jurisprudence invoked by Venezuela was admitted by an English statesman so well known as Lord Granville.

Here the response to the communication received the 15th might be ended, and the appreciation of the fact left to the Government of His Majesty, were it not that another communication from your excellency, that of the 17th, obliges me to consider a point in it which your excellency considers an error on my part. Your excellency bases the mistake which he there attributes to me upon the connection between an understanding of the communication of the legation dated the 3d and the protest presented through this Department on the 14th, in consequence of the boat declared a pirate of having sailed from the ports of Great Britain. A little reflection on the subject will explain the supposed error. In the communication of the 3d your excellency said he had official information that the vessel carried the English flag and was provided with British papers. Such were the words of your excellency, and now the question arises: What does the provision of English papers signify? Does it mean that the ship proceeds from ports foreign to the English authorities and that its patent of navigation, its roll, etc., may have been issued by a simple British deputy in some strange place? Such supposition is impossible. Your excellency knows what the said papers of a ship represent (papier de bord; lettres de mer), and also knows that its patent of navigation can not be certified except by an officer authorized by the Executive. (Calvo, sec. 429). This officer, whatever his position, can only be within the territory from which the ship was originally dispatched. A vessel sailing thus from British ports may stand in shore at other points more or less near, and complete in them its cargo without this exempting either him who equips it or the authorities interested in its dispatch from the responsibility attending the destiny or the irregular employment to which the ship may give itself. Wheresoever the ship may go, its papers will be the only proof of its legality. The relation between them and the conduct of the ship can not at any time whatever be interrupted or falsified without grave responsibility. If it were otherwise, the universal rule established for the recognition of vessels under certain conditions by means of the examination of their papers at sea would have no object.

If it were treating of a boat belonging to regular lines of navigation, which on its return from any of its respective terminal points should take aboard arms destined to harm a friendly people, the conception of the responsibility would be different; but the simple putting in at Antwerp to take goods of one class or another is not an act which would change the original sailing point. In the protest of the Venezuelan Government no point was designated; it simply spoke of the sailing from English ports. The citing of that of London, which your excellency now does, is a new subject, the explanation of which does not concern the Government of the Republic, but His Majesty's legation itself.

From the assertion made in your excellency's communication of the 3d, one might presume that the boat had been constructed in the dominion of His Majesty's and the owners of it, or some of them, were British subjects, and that the captain and at least three-fourths of the crew or mariners were of the same nationality. If on investigation the circumstances of the ship are found to be without precedent, to the previous responsibility there could be added that imposed, ipso facto by article 7 of the treaty of 1825-1834, in which are established those conditions by which Venezuela may consider a ship as British. To the acts of piracy committed by the ship would be added another of such irregularity as the raising by her of the British flag without the intrinsic right which the case would require. So that among the investigations asked by Venezuela it is necessary to include those relative to the place of construction, to the person or persons who own the ship, to the nationality of its captain, and to that of three-fourths of the crew.

Even though your excellency declares there will be no more correspondence on the subject, the Government expects the categorical explanations to which it is entitled owing to the friendly relations which it entertains with that of His British Majesty, and proving as it does, that the ship referred to has committed acts of hostility and piracy against the Government of Venezuela and its commerce, for which it has made use of the commission of that of His Majesty and the English flag.

Accept, your excellency, further protestations and assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

MINISTER, SIR: As I had the honor to inform your excellency, verbally, this morning, I have received instructions from His Majesty's Government to inform you, relative to a conversation which I had with your excellency on the 21st instant and which I communicated to the Marquis of Lansdowne that the Ban Righ left England in November, and that the Colombian minister, who was in London, having shown that the vessel was destined to the service of his Government, and that no war existed between Colombia and any other Power, there was no reason whatever for detaining the ship.

I avail myself of this opportunity to reiterate to your excellency the assurance of my highest consideration.

MINISTER, SIR: The note of the 25th, No. 115, had been already written when that of the 24th from your excellency was received confirming the information relative to the sailing of the Ban Righ (Libertador) in the month of November last from English ports. As I was unable to acknowledge in mine the receipt of your letter by this office, I do so now, and at the same time I have the honor to reiterate to your excellency the assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

BRITISH LEGATION, Caracas, February 6, 1902.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your excellency's note of the 25th instant, relative to the Ban Righ. It is unnecessary for me to follow your excellency in the arguments of common law as applied to this case, as they have already been adduced by the minister of the United States in his note of the 17th ultimo, in which he fully explained to your excellency international law as generally accepted by civilized countries upon this subject.

As regards the responsibility of His Majesty's Government upon this subject there is nothing further to add to the note of the 24th ultimo, which, by order of His Majesty, I addressed to your excellency in view of the statement made by the Colombian minister that the Ban Righ was destined to the service of his government, and that Colombia not being at war with any other power there was no reason to prevent the vessel from leaving England. The subsequent movements of the vessel is a matter which does not concern His Majesty's Government.

I avail myself of this opportunity to reiterate to your excellency the assurance of my highest consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAW,
Caracas, February 12, 1902.

MINISTER, SIR: The Venezuelan Government, in considering the note of the 6th in reply to a letter of the 25th of January last, addressed by this office to His Majesty's legation, finds it strange that your excellency refers to the opinions and decisions of another public minister in regard to the general case of the Ban Righ, as it does not seem that such can offer the slightest relation to the affair referred directly to your excellency, because, according to information received from your excellency, the vessel had sailed from ports of the United Kingdom under the English flag and provided with British documents. As regards the applicability of the doctrine of international law to the case, the Executive believes that it can only be cited on the point sustained by Venezuela in this correspondence, while it offers no opportunity for denial on the part of the legation.

Your excellency says that the free exit of the Ban Righ from British ports was due to official information communicated to the Government of His Majesty by the Colombian legation in London, that the vessel was destined to the service of the Government of that Republic. It appears that, in the opinion of your excellency, such act absolves Great Britain from all responsibility; but in regard to this it might be asked whether or not the fact of a steamer which leaves English ports with war materials for another country, changing her name before arriving at her destination and which opens hostilities against the government and commerce of another nation, friendly to Great Britain, using the supplies which she has aboard, constitutes a violation of the laws of the United Kingdom. In the opinion of the Venezuelan Government there would have been no grievance if it was a case of the simple shipment of a supply of arms and ammunition which arrived, without change, at their destination; but as the vessel, instead of following out her itinerary changed her status on arriving in these waters and commenced acts of hostility against a nation friendly to that from which she came, that responsibility, far from diminishing by her departure, was increased, and far from lessening the gravity of its character, it is substantiated by the preceding circumstances. The violation of British law is manifested by the mere change of name (Libertador), and the transgression of international law is obvious by the use of a flag during acts of hostility against a nation friendly to that to which she belonged. Therefore, in compliance with the express commands emanating from the President of the Republic, as passed by the council of ministers, the protest of the 14th of the past month is hereby reiterated, and your excellency is informed that the Venezuelan Government will continue under the unfavorable impression, naturally produced by the omission of a debt of amity on the part of Great Britain, until some conclusion is had pursuant to an act so serious and unusual. Your excellency will please accept the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

BRITISH LEGATION, Caracas, February 14, 1902.

MR. MINISTER: As the subject of your excellency's note of the 7th instant and of previous correspondence is a "decided matter," I limit my note of this morning to expressing the honor of acknowledging the receipt of the former, which I will transmit to His Majesty's Government as soon as possible. Nevertheless, I think it proper to call the attention of your excellency to a statement made in that note by which it would appear that you desire to signify that the Libertador had committed acts of hostility against Venezuela by carrying the English flag.

The only specific "act of hostility" charged by the Venezuelan Government before His Majesty's legation, referred to the collision with the Santa Clara, and in the official statements, upon which your excellency bases the so-called act of piracy, and which your excellency forwarded to me in regard to this matter, I observe that the whole crew of the Santa Clara alleges that the Libertador did not carry a flag during the occurrence, but that afterwards it "raised a white flag with a blue ball in the center." It is clear, therefore (according to the testimony upon which your excellency's charge is based), that no English flag was raised during the incident nor after it occurred.

Your excellency's letters have been so courteous that I am unable to suppose that, had you been in a position to mention any other occasion upon which the Ban Righ or Libertador carried a British flag while committing what the Venezuelan Government could have, in any way, considered and represented as an act of hostility against Venezuela, you would have called my attention to the same.

I would not consider it worth while to refer to this statement if, in your previous note, of the 25th of January, you had not said that I alleged in mine of the 11th of this month that the Ban Righ had sailed from Martinique still carrying the English flag and provided with English papers, when what I said in that note was as follows: "Therefore, if the statement of the consul is correct, up to the first of the year, or after that date, the Ban Righ was in Martinique carrying the British flag and had British papers * * * of her subsequent movements I know nothing."

In my note of the 17th ultimo, I had occasion to call the attention of your excellency to an error contained in your's of the 14th ultimo, relative to the wording of my note of the 11th; and now that the aforesaid errors are being referred to, I will also call your excellency's attention to another error contained in your note of the 25th ultimo, in which you say that I said: "I must, therefore, understand that the objection of the Venezuelan Government applies to the parenthesis."

Now, then, what I did say was: "Shall I understand, etc.?" which is asking a direct question instead of making the assertion attributed to me by your excellency. I can not understand how this error could have occurred, for it only needs a very rudimentary knowledge of the English language to comprehend the difference between the assertion "I am" and the question "Am I?"—(Debo He y Debo yo? Must I? Am I?).

I take the liberty of hoping that these frequent wrong quotations may not be made even by mistake, and that no arguments, protests, or anything else, susceptible of disturbing the propriety, if not the harmony, of the diplomatic correspondence may be based upon them.

I avail myself of this opportunity to reiterate to your excellency the assurances of my highest consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAW.
Caracas, February 28, 1902.

MR. MINISTER, SIR: Your excellency's note of the 14th convinces the Government that all discussion, moral and legal, relative to the matter of the Ban Righ (Libertador), would be inefficacious and without result, since your excellency seems determined to establish between your own judgment and the acts charged by the Republic a connection obviously contrary to that which might be suggested or advised by the cordial friendly relations existing between England and Venezuela.

Here is the condition of affairs:

About the close of last year there sailed from waters of the United Kingdom a vessel carrying the English flag and British papers, from which a person, said to be chief of a certain revolutionary movement, declared himself in rebellion against the Venezuelan Government. The vessel being declared piratical by the National Government against which she had prepared to commit acts contrary to maritime international law, your excellency endeavored, in conference with me, to relieve her from the charge, and went so far as to say in one of your notes, that of January 3, that at that time you had warned the Venezuelan Government in the most friendly, but at the same time, most serious manner, to avoid any infraction of international law in regard to British lives and property in case of the capture of the Ban Righ. At the same time you declared that your Government had approved the language of your excellency in the conversation with me to which I have just referred.

Vain were the proofs which the Government presented of the obvious violation of the very British laws by the insurgent vessel; vain were its endeavors to have the same course pursued which England and herself had taken on former occasions; vain were the requests and protests presented by the Government in the name of the injured country.

As the only explanation which your excellency made in a note of January 24, after the vessel had committed depredatory acts and secretly disembarked on the shores of the Republic, armed expeditions for the purpose of inciting the war in the interior, was that the vessel sailed from English ports for the Government of Colombia. The presentation of this fact lent greater seriousness to the incident, the guilt of the ship was increased. The responsibility of the crew before the very British laws was rendered greater, and, nevertheless, your excellency, in your note of the 6th instant, in order to shift the burden from the authorities of the United Kingdom, limited yourself to saying: "That the movements of the vessel subsequent to her departure was not a matter of interest to the Government of His Majesty."

Without having changed her papers, which she could not do, and with successive change of flag, name, and course, the steamer Ban Righ (Libertador) continued her acts of depredation in the waters and on the coast of Venezuela. The so-called chief of the rebellion continued aboard, issuing proclamation of war and revolutionary communications, in one of which, published in the El Imparcial of Curacao and in other newspapers of the island, he spoke of the complete destruction of a Venezuelan vessel called Crespo by the guns of the rebel steamer. To this act might be added, as a fresh proof of the guilt of the Ban Righ, the fact of bombarding Cumarebo and causing great damage to the town.

Among the credible proofs held by the Government of the hostility exercised against the Republic by the vessel, which sailed from British ports under an English flag, are the autograph letters written on the vessel by the rebel chief—letters intended to incite and promote sedition in the interior of the Republic in simultaneous or combined action with the pirate vessel. The state of things produced by the presence of the Ban Righ in Venezuelan waters can not fail to affect in a very sensitive manner the responsibility of those who placed the ship in position to reach the center of her insurrectionary operations without obstacle. To deny such responsibility, which proves itself, is, up to a certain point, equal to not recognizing the Government which invokes the power to judge of matters injurious to it, with the freedom consequent upon the possession of a perfectly defined right.

The President does not, therefore, think that such a condition should exist, and still less can he accept the opinion of your excellency that the matter has been already decided (chose jugée).

In virtue of which he has ordered me to state most respectfully to your excellency that he awaits the result of his requests in regard to the Ban Righ, so as to be able, free from all annoying impressions, to continue the consideration with your excellency, upon bases of mutual cordiality, the other subjects of reciprocal interest to the Venezuelan Government and the legation of Great Britain.

Your excellency will please accept the renewed protestations and assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

MR. MINISTER: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the 28th ultimo from your excellency relative to the Ban Righ, or Libertador, and to inform you that, as in the case of all your previous communications upon the subject, I will take great pleasure in forwarding the same by the first mail for the consideration of His Majesty's Government.

I avail myself of this opportunity to reiterate to your excellency the assurances of my highest consideration.

MR. MINISTER: His Majesty's Government having learned that the authorities of the Venezuelan Government have arbitrarily taken possession of the control and equipment of the Bolivar Railroad and that, at the risk of their lives, English subjects in the service of the company have been obliged by the authorities to render service for military purposes, I am commissioned to inform the Venezuelan Government that His Majesty's Government reserves to itself in the fullest measure all its rights in British interests and in the British subjects connected with said railroad. At the same time I must inform your excellency that it is possible that, later, a formal statement upon this subject will be made by His Majesty's Government to the Government of Venezuela.

I avail myself of this opportunity to reiterate to your excellency the assurances of my highest consideration.

OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAW,
Caracas, March 8, 1902.

SIR: I read to the President of the Republic your excellency's communication of the 25th ultimo, relative to a complaint instituted by the Bolivar Railroad plant, and I received instructions from the Chief Magistrate to inform your excellency that, as in the conclusion of the note of the 28th of the same month, No. 288, he had said that he awaited the result of his requests in regard to the Ban Righ, in order to be able, without any annoying impressions, to consider, upon bases of mutual cordiality, subjects which are of reciprocal interest to the Venezuelan Government and to the legation of His Britannic Majesty, it is impossible for the executive power to undertake this matter or to proceed to its investigation during the existence of that other incident which daily becomes more serious by reason of the notorious damages which the insurgent vessel continues to inflict on the Republic and its commerce. This very day, after the damage done to the steamer General Crespo on the coast of Cumarebo, the vessel was found near to the island of Trinidad, attacking the coast of Guiria and the vicinity.

The situation caused by the dispatch of that vessel is plainly contrary to the spirit of true friendship and strains the existing relations between the Republic and the United Kingdom; hence the Government of Venezuela is unable, while this condition exists, to treat with propriety the other questions which your excellency submits to its consideration.

Your excellency will please accept the renewed protestations and assurances of my highest and most distinguished esteem.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAW,
Caracas, March 13, 1902.

SIR: To the proofs accumulated by the Government, which are daily augmented, relative to the damages sustained by the Republic from the dispatch of the Ban Righ from English ports, the President has decided to add proofs of the indifference manifested by the authorities of Trinidad in respect to the acts of said steamer, and the still graver charge of toleration with which they saw preparations being made in the island for armed expeditions and the public departure of the same against the Venezuelan States which are near to the colony. Your excellency will not have forgotten the earnest appeal made to the legation a short time ago, to prevent the island of Trinidad from serving as a center for plans against the public peace of Venezuela, and although there was not obtained from your excellency, nor from the new governor of the colony, all the good will which might have been expected, in accordance with international law, and which has just been voluntarily shown by another British officer (the governor of Grenada), the Government could never have supposed that the indifference to the tranquillity of a friendly country would have reached such a height in the minds of His Majesty's agents as to attract the attention of the very inhabitants of the Antillian trinity and constitute a theme of reproach in the local press of that place.

Without considering any other proofs than those which it directly possesses, the Government of the Republic finds that a vessel, proceeding from England, arrived in these waters under the British flag with materials of war, and that for more than two months it has been a constant damage to Venezuelan commerce; and that after it had destroyed national vessels and discharged cannon on open and unprotected places it received and openly shipped from the territory of that island, or, what is the same thing, from one of His Majesty's dominions, supplies of men and arms for the continuation of its work of destruction. Such a state of things is abnormal as obviously opposed to a condition of friendly relations which Venezuela cultivates with Great Britain.

As the simple application of certain laws of the Kingdom seems sufficient to prevent these damages, as well as those which relate to the acts of the steamer in her expeditions from Trinidad, the Government, taking this view and seeing that this incident has resulted in an ominous neglect of the most elementary duties of good friendship, and reserves the right to claim compensation for the damages done to the national interests through said omission.

At the same time the proposal heretofore made to defer the consideration of all reciprocal matters of importance to both countries until a situation so irregular, from the point of public law, and so contrary, above all, to the cordial spirit which governs the relations of Venezuela with the Kingdom of Great Britain, is hereby reiterated.

Your excellency will please accept the renewed assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

Caracas, March 24, 1902.

SIR: I have just learned that the insurgent steamer Ban Righ (Libertador) has anchored at the Port of Spain without any opposition or difficulty whatever on the part of the colonial authorities. Venezuela protested at the time to the honorable legation against the acts of hostility committed against the Government by the said vessel on the coast of the Republic, to the detriment of general security. Later it protested against the attitude of indifference or toleration assumed by the governor of Trinidad in the presence of revolutionary movements openly prepared in the territory of the island against the constitutionally established authorities of the Estados del Oriente. Herewith, in conformity with a special charge from the Constitutional President of the Republic, I present in this note, with all the energy demanded by the case, a new protest against the unusual act of the colonial authorities, who, after the proceedings had before this respectable legation, harbored said steamer without taking into consideration, to judge from the development of affairs, the aforesaid proceedings.

With the earnest request that you will please take cognizance of this new protest from the Government of the Republic, and of the grave circumstances which occasion it, I offer to your excellency new assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

BRITISH LEGATION, Caracas, March 20, 1902.

SIR: In the note from your excellency of the 13th instant you spoke of the "toleration with which the governor of Trinidad had witnessed the preparations for armed expeditions in the island, and the public and notorious departure of the same to operate against the peace of the Venezuelan States which are near to the colony.

I observe, also, that your excellency speaks, in your note of the 24th instant, of having protested against the "indifference or toleration shown by the governor of Trinidad toward the revolutionary movements notoriously prepared on the island to operate against the constitutionally established authorities of the Estados Orientales."

The only testimony presented by your excellency in support of these general but serious charges is that of some communication contained in the local press. Unfortunately the liberty of the press is no guarantee of its correctness, as this case has proved, and it will be as satisfactory to the Venezuelan Government to know, as it is to me to communicate to it, that I have received from his excellency, the governor of Trinidad, a dispatch in which he informs me that there does not appear to be any foundation whatever for the statements made in the local press to which, apparently, your excellency alludes.

It also seems from the reports transmitted to this office that the police had received instructions to keep a watch upon all places frequented by Venezuelans and to report to his excellency, who has been on the alert; and that the revenue police also patrol between 6 p. m. and 6 a. m., and that, so far as they know, no armed party has left Trinidad for Venezuela or for any other place.

His excellency also informs me that he has received no communication whatever from the Venezuelan consul upon the subject.

I avail myself of the opportunity to reiterate to your excellency the assurance of my highest esteem.

BRITISH LEGATION, Caracas, March 27, 1902.

SIR: In my note of the 24th instant I had the honor to inform your excellency that I had communicated without delay to His Majesty's Government the protest of the Venezuelan Government to the presence in Port of Spain of the insurgent steamer Ban Righ (Libertador), without any objection having been made by the colonial authorities.

I am now instructed by His Majesty's Government to inform that of Venezuela, that as it now appears the said vessel is at present, at least ostensibly, a Colombian warship, carrying the Colombian national flag, he can not with propriety order any proceedings whatever against her.

Such procedure would constitute an act of war against Colombia if the vessel is a Colombian public vessel.

It is my duty to state that His Majesty's Government is not responsible for any act of depredation committed by the said vessel. Besides, the circumstances under which she was allowed to sail from England are of such a nature that the Venezuelan Government can not properly bring any charges of neglect whatever.

If, since her cruise to Martinique, she has made use of the British flag, it has been simply an unjustifiable act for which the Government of His Majesty is in no way responsible.

On the other hand, His Majesty's Government would not allow the vessel to make use of any British port as a base of hostile operations against Venezuela, and the governor of Trinidad has been so instructed that he will not permit her to coal and has requested her to leave the port at once.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurance of my highest consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAW,
Caracas, April 5, 1902.

SIR: Since the statement made by you on January 3 last, in your own and in the name of your Government, that the vessel (carrying an English flag and provided with British papers) declared by Venezuela to be outside of international maritime law, up to the receipt of your note of March 27, in which, in accordance with instructions also emanating from London, you stated that the said vessel was a Colombian warship, against which it was impossible for Great Britain to adopt any proceedings whatever, the agents of the Kingdom had shown so little interest in appreciating the justice of Venezuela's rights, and such a tendency to shirk the responsibility, natural in similar circumstances, as almost to raise the presumption of the preexistence of a judgment not altogether impartial and entailing consequences of a grave and painful nature, affecting the mutual duties of nations. In order to prove this irregularity it is sufficient to refer to the correspondence with your legation during the three last months.

The note of the 3d of January, referred to, was followed by one of the 5th, in which your excellency gave assurance that your Government would proceed in the matter in accordance with the regulations of British and international law. In the reply made by this office to both communications, there was expressed the natural surprise produced by the fact of finding an English vessel engaged in hostile operations against the Republic, to which was added a written proof that in 1882 His Majesty's Government, through Lord Granville, had assented to the course pursued by Venezuela under exactly similar circumstances to those which have just occasioned the decree relative to the Ban Righ or (Libertador). The damages done by the aforesaid British vessel caused the Government, on the 14th of January last, to make its first protest against the unusual fact of a vessel sailing from English waters for the purpose of injuring the Republic; at the time that the protest was made proofs were sent to the legation of an attack made by the vessel on a Venezuelan sloop with other proofs of irregularity of her change of name and flag.

In the note prior to that from this department, which was received too late, your legation had endeavored to explain the condition, antejudicial, under which the Ban Righ openly sailed, and even proofs were requested, in order to transmit them to your Government, to show that the vessel was committing acts contrary to international maritime law. In referring, afterwards, to the protest made by Venezuela, your excellency denied, in a note of the 17th, that you had said that the vessel had been dispatched from English ports; that her possession of British flag and papers, and her equipment and dispatch were, in your opinion, two different things. To that note and to the previous one this department replied on the 25th, confirming all its assertions, fully sustained by the doctrine of international law upon the subject; in one respect this affirmation was unnecessary, as your excellency had already stated that the vessel had left England last November bound for the Colombian Government. On February 6, your excellency reiterated said information and added that the acts of the Ban Righ subsequent to her leaving British waters, did not concern His Majesty's Government.

In the reply made to your excellency on the 12th, all the preceding circumstances were recapitulated (the sailing of the vessel under an English flag and with British papers, the illegal change of name and destination, the hostilities in which she engaged against a nation friendly to Great Britain, and other no less serious acts), in order to reiterate the protest of the 14th of January, and to put in evidence the unpleasant impression which the attitude assumed by Great Britain had made on the Venezuelan Government. Your excellency replied by a simple acknowledgment, without even announcing the transmittal of the communication to the Government of His Majesty; afterwards, in a note of the 14th, after some explanations relative to the literal meaning of one of your phrases, which you considered badly translated, you took for granted the judgment (chose jugée) of the case under investigation, and called attention to the fact that the vessel had raised an unknown, and not a British flag, after boarding the Venezuelan sloop, which you found to be the only definite act of hostility of which the vessel had been accused.

Another recapitulation had to be made to the legation on February 28, without omitting among the acts the Ban Righ, her secret shipment of armed expeditions for the purpose of inflaming the war in the interior of the Republic. And as at this time your excellency had, in a tone almost threatening, made complaint of the alleged use of a certain railroad belonging to an English company, for the mobilization of military equipments. The President, in a note of March 8, at once declared a suspension or delay in the consideration of all matters of mutual concern to both governments, while the unusual situation created by the dispatch of the Ban Righ and the hostile acts of the said vessel continued to exist, although the situation was so serious the British Government had only lent it a very lukewarm or meager interest. The subsequent conduct of the authorities of Trinidad, so propitious to the operations of the vessel, as well as to the plans in which she became the principal factor or medium, obliged the Government to make new protests only answered finally in the ambiguous form which appears in your excellency's note of the 27th of last March.

Very little thought is needed upon the foregoing recapitulation in order to deduce the vacillation or lukewarmness with which the British Government and its representatives conducted this delicate matter, which might almost be interpreted in a spirit contrary to friendly obligations and the rights of the State as maintained by Venezuela, while it can not for a moment be credited that the English authorities did not recognize the vulnerable motives of the Ban Righ, as she sailed from waters of the United Kingdom and took aboard materials of war.

The nationality of a vessel is estimated and defined according to the circumstances to which she is subjected and the proofs which the vessel is obliged to present. The ships of the State is one case, and those belonging to individuals only engaged in commerce, another. In speaking of this subject, relative to British legislation, Cabro

(sec. 393) mentions that the owner of an English vessel must be a subject of the United Kingdom, by birth or naturalization, or must have secured special authority and done homage to the Crown. The person who acquires ownership of the vessel is obliged to make declarations similar to those exacted from the first owner.

All vessels must have a name, which, according to all writers, is the best way of designating her, following her, and engaging her under certain conditions. One she has been named no change is admissible. Pradier Fodéré, in making the foregoing statement, explains that in England and in France any change of name is absolutely prohibited (2287). This is not the case in Austria-Hungary, nor in Norway, where there are exceptions to the rule. According to Venezuelan law, if the owner of a vessel decides to change her name he must take out a license just the same as when the shape of the vessel is changed, with the difference that in the latter case new measurements, new certificates, and new securities are required.

The British Government might follow two opinions in judging the case of the Ban Righ as a vessel sailing from its ports—the opinion of domestic law and that of international law. According to the former the sudden change of name was sufficient to render the condition of the vessel illegal; under the latter enough reason might have been found in the attitude assumed by the steamer on her arrival in these waters to render her liable to pursuit and capture for violation of the principles of maritime law, to the observance and compliance of which all nations are obliged.

According to Ortolan (Teodoro), the sea is a theater so vast and difficult to subject to supervision or place under a sufficient number of police to guarantee life, property, and common rights, that it is not too much to demand, in order to obtain such security, that each vessel should be under some special nation. Such nation might be more or less barbarous or civilized, more or less a stranger to international relations and the cultivation of the same; but if they do not follow common and human law, they must be made to follow some law. And if the nation to which the vessel belongs, or is connected, is an organized State, knowing and practicing the rights of man, its authority and the guarantee of its public officers constitute elements of security, and therefore the vessel is placed under the rights of man, according to the regulations observed by the State to which she belongs. (Book II, Chap. IX.)

If the Ban Righ opened hostilities against Venezuela while carrying the British flag, the duty of England seems to be well defined by the circumstances of the act and the time of its accomplishment. If later she raised a flag unknown to anyone, she violated international law and the consequent punishment. The vessel being consigned to Colombia did not relieve Great Britain from subsequent responsibility, unless the possibility is admitted of one country arming a vessel with her own flag and license for the military service of another government without requiring any explanations as to her ultimate operations against a nation in friendship with that which had equipped the vessel for sailing. Had the Ban Righ sailed from English waters under the official name and flag of Colombia, as the vessels which Balmaceda's Government bought sailed under the flag and name of Chile in 1891, and endeavored to impede the representatives of the junta of Iquique, there might be, perhaps, some opportunity for argument; but as the steamer was provided with the papers and flag of Great Britain the responsibility of the government that fitted her out officially for her voyage must obtain as to the vessel, especially if, through her illegal change of flag and name, there resulted serious damages to another State, or evident violations of the provisions of public law. The change of route and of destination constituted another proof of culpability.

To use the flag of a foreign country without its authority to do so, is, and has always been held by the rights of man, to be a fraudulent act, deserving of punishment, as well by the country whose flag has been used, as by any other country. In the case of the Ban Righ there would have been nothing criminal in such act until after her arrival at Port Ambers or at Fort de France, as the action of the British Government was equally provided for and defined. If the vessel now carries the Colombian flag, Great Britain might be able to explain how it passed into the possession of another country, causing, from the time of its arrival in the Antilles, such serious and extraordinary damages to Venezuela.

The colony of Trinidad has contributed to augment this situation by the easy manner in which vessels, destined to supply the insurgent ship, enter and leave the port, as was done by the schooner Aguila de Oro, and by the departure from the island of armed expeditions for the eastern coast of the Republic.

Although these expeditions ferment a perturbing nucleus and are recognized by the colonial authority as belligerent rights, against all valid antecedents and to the discredit of the most rudimentary principles of the rights of man, it must still be supposed that in their toleration the magistrates of Trinidad completely forgot the regulations upon which neutrality is founded and the evident violation of legislation passed by Great Britain upon this question.

In 1877 the foreign enlistment of 1870 was, as now, in force; it was an extension and modification of the act of 1819; the British Government on opening the Russo-Turkish war (Crimean) nevertheless believed it her duty to publish a new act (London Gazette, April 30) to expressly prevent the enlistment of soldiers in her territory and to prohibit the use of her waters as a base for warlike operations. Later, during the war in Tonkin, the cabinet of St. James declared coal contraband of war, and yet that precedent has not been used by the neighboring colony who allows coal to be supplied to a vessel which, far from being belligerent, has been declared beyond the terms of international law by the Government of a nation friendly to England.

The famous Bluntschli says that vessels armed as corsairs to destroy the ships of foreign nations, devastate the coasts of the State to which they belong, and enter the country by fire and bloodshed, not so much with the intention of making an advantageous expedition, but to satisfy their spite and vengeance (sec. 343) must also be considered pirates.

The destruction of the ship Crespo and the bombardment of Cumarebo, de Guiria, de Carúpano, de Juan Griego, de Porlamar, and of other ports of the Republic might have served the British authorities sufficiently to have confirmed the official opinion of the Venezuelan Government for them to have acted in accordance therewith.

In your note of the 27th of March, your excellency stated that on the occasion of the vessel having anchored in Port of Spain she was, ostensibly at least, a Colombian warship, and that any proceedings against her would constitute a bellicose act against Colombia. Your excellency limited your reply of the 31st to the reproduction of the ostensible condition to the great surprise of the Government, as the real condition of the vessel could not be unknown to the British authorities, as none is in a better position than the Government of His Majesty to know whether the English vessel, dispatched from his ports by his employees in the branch of the commercial, marine, or navy department really transferred to a foreign navy, and how it was done. And as your excellency added that you had given orders not to permit the steamer to coal in Port of Spain nor to remain there, it may be asked if Colombia, as is well known, is not at war with any nation, and the ships legally belonging to her navy may, therefore, have access to all ports of supply, against whom is the order directed?

If not against Colombia, why then argue of the difficulty in proceeding against a steamer evidently under illegal conditions? In order to measure the legal extent and international significance of the first statement in the note of the 27th, it would be necessary to determine the circumstances of the second.

Still further: It is well known that the said steamer committed, during the early part of March, piratical acts in English waters against a merchant vessel dispatched from Trinidad to Ciudad Bolívar. One of the principal newspapers of the colony called the attention of the governor to this matter although the vessel was only able to continue her voyage after a delay of from eight to ten hours through orders from the chief of the rebels, a circumstance which might be considered mortifying to a grave and circumspect colonial authority said to be friendly to Venezuela.

The reciprocity regulations established by England and the United States in article 6 of the treaty of Washington, in 1871, makes it obligatory to employ all measures to prevent, in the ports, the equipment and armament of any vessel which might be thought destined to hostile operations against a friendly power, and to employ the same measures to prevent the sailing of any vessel called to take part in said operations, if they had been prepared wholly or in part for war purposes within the respective jurisdiction. The essential idea of said regulations was published by the Institute of International Law in the session at The Hague (1875), and there is hardly a nation that fails to observe these regulations as worthy of general respect and universal application.

The United States offers, on its part, in section 5283, Revised Statutes, the regulation that any person within the territory who equips or arms or attempts to equip and arm any vessel destined for hostilities against a foreign prince or State, or against any colony, district, or city with which the United States is at peace, will be considered guilty and punished by fine or imprisonment as shall be determined.

Viewed impartially by a calm mind, whether intrinsically or outwardly, the public acts of the Ban Rich which have occurred from the time of her clearance to her recent arrival in Port of Spain, as well as the facilities in Trinidad, upon which the insurgent Venezuelans counted for carrying out their plans and operations, must point to two circumstances, the most serious and extraordinary being that Great Britain bases her opinion of her irresponsibility upon the assertions of the official minister of a third State; and the Government of His Majesty, or his representatives, holding a mere revolutionary nucleus, without headquarters or flag, in a superior condition to that of a nation recognized as belligerent. The first is a detriment to international harmony, for nothing would be easier than to charter war vessels in any country to disturb the seas, under the pretext that they were destined to the military service of a constitutional government. The second is equal, in a certain way, to legalizing the action of any band sworn to attack the institutions of a country and the authority representing them. These two circumstances have engendered, upon this occasion, great injury to the Republic of Venezuela, the effects of which have extended to the commerce and industries in all spheres of public wealth and private property. It is sufficient to mention the loss of one of the best vessels of the national navy, the destruction of buildings, both private and municipal, in unfortified ports by the Ban Righ, the money expended in the mobilization of the troops to garrison the places attacked and to repel the insurgents, the present instability of the Government funds and consequent depreciation of public bonds, the loss of the crops, the destruction of fruit trees, and the cumulation of resulting difficulties which have overwhelmed Venezuela from the sailing of the vessel from British ports, with papers from the United Kingdom and an English flag, to her arrival in these waters, in unsettled condition, when she found a center of supplies and military resources in one of His Majesty's colonies, near to the Republic.

It is proper to mention here, in corroboration of the partial spirit shown latterly by the authorities of said colony, that while the Ban Righ found port and harbor, free from all encumbrances in the waters of Trinidad, the Venezuelan warship Bolívar had neither access nor entry on account of a sudden quarantine—as if to put in a measure difficulties in the way of her watchfulness.

It is also the time to express the surprise to which the assertion transmitted by your excellency in the note of March 29 has given rise, that the governor of Trinidad had not received any communication from the consul of Venezuela relative to the revolutionary operations of which that island is the center. In the document, which this department has compiled with regard to this grave matter, will be seen a protest made by Mr. Charles Benito Figueredo, consular agent of Venezuela in Port of Spain, on the 6th of March, to the governor on account of the liberty enjoyed by the insurgent ship and the immunity which enabled her to carry out her numerous plans on the soil of the island to conspire against the peace of this territory.

There is also proof of the protests previously made to the governor by the official agent of the Republic relative to the new acts which have occurred on the island against the tranquillity and the institutions of Venezuela. I inclose copy of the same.

The foregoing confirms the ample justice which the Venezuelan Government has for claiming, as it will do at the proper time, the compensation for the damages and injuries occasioned by the steamship Ban Righ and augmented by the manifest partiality shown by the neighboring colony.

Meantime, in accordance with the express orders of the constitutional President of the Republic, decided in the council of ministers, the contents of the note of March 13, No. 363, is hereby reiterated.

I renew to your excellency the assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

BRITISH LEGATION, Caracas, April 8, 1902.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's communication of the 5th instant, expressing the view taken by the Venezuelan Government in regard to the Ban Righ, or Libertador, and the various questions connected with said vessel which refer to the relations between Trinidad and Venezuela.

I will avail myself of the first opportunity to forward this note for the consideration of His Majesty's Government.

At the same time I have the pleasure to inform you that the friendly intentions of His Majesty's Government towards Venezuela—shown by the order given to the said vessel to leave Port of Spain immediately after it was known that she had entered the port—having been frustrated from the fact that said vessel was completely unrigged, I have just received from the Marquis of Lansdowne, first secretary of state to His Majesty in the office of foreign affairs, notice that His Majesty's Government had instructed His Majesty's minister in Bogota that, unless satisfactory assurances were given, in the first place, that the said vessel is the property of Colombia, and, in the second place, that it will not be allowed to take part in the illegal hostilities against Venezuela, in which she is said to have been engaged, she will not be permitted to repair and be made seaworthy.

I have also the pleasure to communicate to your excellency that the Colombian consul in Port of Spain, having requested permission to transfer, presumably from the vessel referred to, 5,000 rifles and 3,000,000 bullets to one of the Liverpool line of steamers for the transportation to Carthagena, the governor of Trinidad will be instructed (he has doubtless received the notice by this time) that such permit can not be conceded.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurances of my highest esteem.

W. H. D. HAGGARD.

His Excellency Gen. J. R. PACHANO,

The English minister presents his compliments to the minister of foreign affairs, and has the honor to request that he have inserted, at the conclusion of the note of this date relative to the Ban Righ or Libertador—after the word conceded—a new paragraph, as follows:

"It will be necessary to await the result of the communications with the Colombian Government."

This paragraph will then be the end of that note. It was a part of the instructions received from His Majesty's Government, but was accidentally omitted in the copy.

W. H. D. Haggard avails himself of this opportunity to reiterate to His Excellency Gen. J. R. Pachano the assurances of his highest esteem.

SIR: By order of the constitutional President of the Republic, in relation to the subject-matter of the two notes from your legation of the 8th instant, I have to inform your excellency, by virtue of knowledge which has come direct to the Government, that the arms and ammunition held on board of the revolutionary steamer were nearly all removed and forwarded in clandestine manner to the Venezuelan coast. As proof of so grave an act is the fact that a great many of the said arms and ammunition were captured in the flight which followed the occupation and pacification of Guaira by the national troops.

The President desires that His Majesty's legation should take note of this circumstance for the purposes expressed by the Government in the course of the correspondence relative to the Ban Righ.

Your excellency will please accept the renewed professions and assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

SIR: Without delay I transmitted to the governor of Trinidad the note from Dr. Fombona Palacio, of the 24th of April, which stated that "the greater part of the arms and ammunition which was aboard the revolutionary vessel—presumably the Ban Righ or Libertador—had been removed and clandestinely forwarded to the Venezuelan coast," and as proof of the same the fact that "some arms taken in the fight which resulted in the occupation and pacification of Guaira by the national troops."

I have the honor to inclose copy of the reply of his excellency by which it will be seen that the arms and ammunition referred to are still aboard of the said vessel.

Upon receipt of your letter I instructed the customs collector to request permission of the Colombian consul to inspect the hold of the Ban Righ. This permission was immediately granted and the inspection having been made it was found that the arms and ammunition are still on the Ban Righ.

BRITISH LEGATION, Caracas, July 4, 1902.

SIR: In my note of April 8, I had the honor to inform the predecessor of your excellency of the friendly intentions of the Government of His Majesty toward Venezuela relative to the Ban Righ. These are in brief, unless the Government of Colombia should give security that—

First. That the vessel in question is a public vessel of Colombia; and Second. That in the future it shall not be permitted to take part in any hostile action against Venezuela, that it shall not be allowed to be repaired at Puerto España, and in a verbal note dated the following day I added that it would be necessary to await the results of the communications addressed to the Colombian Government.

I have the honor to advise your excellency that I have learned from the Marquis of Lansdowne, secretary of state for His Majesty in the office of foreign affairs, that the result of those communications is that the Government of His Majesty has received satisfactory assurances from the Colombian Government, first, that the Ban Righ belongs to Colombia, and in the second place, that as long as a war does not exist between Venezuela and Colombia the use of said vessel will not be authorized to commit hostile acts against this country.

I have also been advised by His Excellency that orders have been issued for the vessel to proceed to Colombian waters and be stationed there, and that instructions have been given to the governor of Trinidad to allow said vessel to be repaired at Puerto España and then to proceed to those waters.

I take this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurance of my highest consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,

Caracas, July 16, 1902.

SIR: In the communication which your excellency directed on the 4th instant to General Ferrer, there was transmitted to the Government of Venezuela by direction of His Majesty, the result of a report relative to the vessel Ban Righ which your excellency had promised this department on the 8th of April. The Vice-President in the exercise of the executive power has made note of the ample assurances now given by the Government of His Majesty relative to said steamer; but while said reports do not change the opinion which the Government of Venezuela has held from the beginning relative to the status of said vessel, and which now moves the Government to protest solemnly against the recognition of said vessel by Great Britain, as though treating of a vessel not placed beyond the pale of international law.

Neither can the aforementioned assurances limit or diminish in the least the rights advanced by Venezuela by reason of former circumstances, from the departure of the Ban Righ from English ports, with a British flag and British papers till the consummation by said vessel, now declared a pirate, of acts directly prejudicial to the commerce, the peace and general interests of the Republic.

Accept, your excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

BRITISH LEGATION, Caracas, July 30, 1902.

SIR: I have the honor to advise your excellency that I have been informed by the Government of His Majesty that it has seriously considered a series of cases in which the Venezuelan Government has prejudiced the property and liberty of British subjects in an absolutely unjustifiable manner.

It enumerates the following cases which have occurred since the beginning of last year:

That of the capture and deportation by the Venezuelan gunboat Augusto of British subjects; that of the capture of the boat and property of John Craig, on the island of Patos; the case of the Buena Fe, which involved a similar injury and a violation of territory; that of La Maria Teresa, that of the Pastor, that of La Indiana, and that of the In Time.

None of these cases have been satisfactorily explained.

The confiscation of the British bark Queen seems to the Government of His Majesty the most flagrant case.

The Government of His Majesty finds it impossible to tolerate the continuation of a course of conduct which, in the incident last mentioned, reached the limit, and therefore has given me instructions to present a formal protest relative thereto, and to indicate to His Excellency the President, and to the secretary of foreign affairs in terms, with respect to which there can be no doubt, that unless the Government of His Majesty receives explicit assurances that such incidents shall not recur, and that unless there be paid promptly full compensation to the persons prejudiced wherever it is shown to the satisfaction of the Government of His Majesty that such compensation is justly due, it will take such steps as it may consider necessary in order to demand the reparation which it has the right to demand in those cases, as well as the claims of the British railway companies of Venezuela for any loss sustained by the conduct of the Venezuelan consul at Trinidad, for which there is no possible justification.

I embrace this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurance of my highest consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAWS,
Caracas, ———, ———.

SIR: The note of your excellency, dated July 30, which I received the 1st of the present month, contains in brief the complaints and claims relative to a number of subjects, many of which, as per example, the capture of the boat of John Craig and the proceedings against the sloop Maria Teresa, was considered by the Government of the Republic as entirely closed. Another of those questions, that relating to the little isle of Patos, has been for some time defined by Venezuela without any judicial argument on the part of Great Britain; and the other questions have already been explained or are being explained, even though the reply to them has been delayed by force of circumstances, so it is unnecessary to go over them again, as the legation of His Majesty is well acquainted therewith. Therefore the Chief of the executive power is surprised at the manner in which your excellency sets forth those facts, as well the general character of the note; but without considering it a proper time, and notwithstanding all the objections which are suggested against it, the Government has decided to reply thereto immediately, in view of the reply given to the questions of that or of a similar character, and because of the losses occasioned by the Ban Righ and the partiality shown by the authorities of Trinidad in their action against the peace of Venezuela.

The surprise of the Chief of the Government is all the more justifiable by the fact that there is now brought into the discussion questions of various kinds, some already decided, and at a time when the legation could not consider it proper to investigate pending questions, as the complaints and claims presented to Great Britain on account of said vessel and the attitude assumed by the authorities at Trinidad are still unsettled. Your excellency knows that the arguments of Venezuela in this matter consists of evidence on file in the archives of this department; you know, also, according to the notes dated February 28, March 8 and 13, and April 5, that since then the treatment of the other questions with the legation were deferred, and attention was directed to the prompt solution of the former question in order to preserve friendly relations with the Government of His Britannic Majesty so earnestly desired by the Government of Venezuela.

This is therefore the opportunity to remind your excellency again that until the question of such great importance to the interests of both nations is satisfactorily decided this department can not take up other subjects entirely foreign thereto.

The conduct which in the note is attributed to the consul in Trinidad is a matter which may be considered as related to the partiality of the colonial authorities.

Accept, your excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

BRITISH LEGATION, Caracas, August 21, 1902.

SIR: At various times your excellency has said, and I have been informed that the Venezuelan Government has constantly asserted, that the arms and munitions remaining in the Ban Righ, or Bolivar, in Puerto Espana, had been taken from the vessel and transported to the mainland for the use of the revolution.

Your excellency knows from an official communication dated April 24, in which your predecessor stated that the greater part of those munitions had been taken from the vessel for that purpose; that the governor of Trinidad, with the permission of the consul of Colombia, made an examination which showed that the arms and munitions which the Venezuelan Government asserted had been taken to Venezuela were found on board.

The governor ad interim of the colony, with the consent of the Colombian consul, has now made another official examination to the collector of customs and reports that he also found on board a large stock of arms and munitions.

Your excellency should remember that, as stated by the collector of customs in his report, it is well known that the sources of supply for the revolution have been many.

He states, for example, that during the last three months the revolution has received both arms and munitions from Germany, through a Colombian port.

He mentions other sources of supplies with which your excellency is doubtless acquainted.

I take this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurance of my highest consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAWS,
Caracas, August 27, 1902.

SIR: The note of your excellency of the 21st having been considered by the Government, it finds that the reports of the administration of Trinidad relative to the arms carried by the vessel Ban Righ can not cause to disappear and much less destroy the basis of the claims and complaints of Venezuela, because to the evidence of deeds performed can not be opposed either in this, or in another like case, circumstances which occurred later. In order to strengthen such evidence it may not be out of place to mention incidentally, as a new argument, what the English captain, Willis, the seditious captain of the Ban Righ, said when the vessel was dispatched from British ports, a statement not yet denied and which appeared in a London paper, The Daily News, published the 7th of last July. The captain stated in that paper that the cargo carried by the steamer consisted of 175 tons of Mausers, 180 tons of munitions, a large number of pieces of artillery and campaign carts; which is very far from being the small amount which seems to be referred to in the last report of the acting governor of the colony.

With reference to the supply of arms which came from Germany, the Government considers that this is a mistake, as it is well known that the revolutionary supplies both in the beginning, as well as during these last months, have entered the Republic through the coasts adjacent to Trinidad and not through other avenues.

From the above it must be assumed that the Government finds it impossible to attribute to the report now communicated by your excellency any force contrary to the declaration made to your excellency in my note of the 16th ultimo, No. 935, which the Government hereby confirms and reproduces in all its parts.

The note of my predecessor, dated April 24, stated that the arms and munitions guarded on board the revolutionary steamer had for the most part been taken and dispatched in a clandestine manner for the coasts of Venezuela.

The report of the acting governor states that the collector of customs now finds on board of the Ban Righ a large quantity of arms and munitions. The existence of the latter does not exclude the former fact nor nullify the deductions that are logical or natural.

I inclose herewith for your excellency a copy of the Venezuelan Herald, in which is reproduced in Spanish the account attributed to Captain Willis by the London newspaper.

Please accept, your excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAWS,
Los Teques, October 27, 1902.

SIR: The government of the Republic has been careful to report fully to the British legation ever since last January, for the information of the Government of His Britannic Majesty, all the injury caused to the country by the expeditions and acts of the Ban Righ and by the conduct observed by the authorities of Trinidad with reference to the revolutionary events of which Venezuela has been the bloody theater, and does not wish to allow to pass without the necessary statement or the corresponding protest the recent fact of the post-office of that island having forwarded on the 7th of the present October in a foreign war vessel several sacks of mail to the Ciudad Bolívar, a place occupied by groups of rebels against the constitutional power. The forwarding of mail, through means foreign to those provided or established by the convention at Washington, June 15, 1897, was an act in violation of the Universal Postal Union, of which that colony formed a part, and the forwarding of said mail to a place in rebellion against the constitutional government of an adjacent country (a place furthermore included within the blockading lines) might even signify the purpose of facilitating communication with the revolutionary center, and thus render more difficult the repressive action which the agents of the law might exercise for the purpose of restoring peace.

The protest, which in view of this unexpected fact was presented on the 15th of the current month by the consul of Venezuela to the honorable colonial secretary, is confirmed by the present note, in which at the same time the Government desires to leave on record that the action of the postal authorities of Trinidad becomes a new and very serious proof of the facilities with which the Venezuelan insurgents have there found for their operations.

Not only in conditions created by a domestic sedition, like that of the Ciudad Bolívar, but in formal wars between belligerents, the transportation of documents directed to one of the contending parties is considered unfortunate and entirely inadmissible; and the British legation is well acquainted with the order issued by the English Government, March 28, 1854, in view of the eastern war, in which correspondence with the enemy is placed among the articles whose transportation is prohibited by neutrals. Therefore, the Government considers it doubly contrary to the principles of law and the rule of national comity, the action of the postal authorities of the British colony; and upon protesting against the above, the Government desires to add said protest to all other actions that influenced Venezuela to set forth the claims mentioned in the final paragraph of the note addressed to the British legation under date of April 5 last, and bearing No. 450.

Accept, your excellency, the renewed assurance of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN PUBLIC LAWS,

SIR: The document containing the complaints and claims of Venezuela prepared as a result of the action of the Ban Righ and of the attitude assumed by the authorities of Trinidad ever since the peace of the eastern markets of the Republic has been disturbed, has just been added to by an action of grave injury in view of its varied and transcendental importance. I refer to an official forwarding announced on the 12th instant by the post-office of Trinidad of mail for the Ciudad Bolívar, on the English war vessel Fantome, an action by which the post-office department of the colony in addition to violating the most elemental principles of law and the best-known rules of national comity, for it thus established direct communication between the island and a place occupied by revolutionists against which was operating the military force of the Government, it has compromised a vessel of the navy of His Majesty in an action clearly in violation of the Postal Convention of Washington of 1897, duly ratified both by Venezuela and by Great Britain.

On the 27th of last October the Government protested, in a note sent to the British legation, against the sending of mail from Puerto España to Ciudad Bolívar on a German war vessel, the Panther, and now with greater reason, there is room for a protest and a claim against the participation of the Fantome, a vessel of His Majesty, in an action which seriously injures the general interests of the public, because it directly favors the sedition in the Ciudad Bolívar, where the Federal Government is occupied in putting down the revolution.

This department trusts that your excellency will take account of the serious action referred to and of the new protest to which it has given rise for the purposes mentioned in the concluding part of the note of April 5 last, No. 450.

Accept, your excellency, the repeated assurance of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

UNITED STATES OF VENEZUELA,
Caracas, December 9, 1902.

MR. MINISTER: The Chief of the Government knows that your excellency is acquainted with the latest phase of the difficulty between Venezuela and Germany and Great Britain in regard to the settlement of claims for alleged damages to the subjects of the two latter nations during the civil war. The above-mentioned difficulty, in the opinion of the Venezuelan Government, has no valid foundation, as the precedents on which the Government bases its opinion arises from pure doctrines of law as well as from practical doctrines of indisputable validity. But as it has not been possible to convince the other parties of the justice of Venezuela's attitude, and as the Government desires to avoid, without impairing its decorum or its legal faculties, any conflict with nations it considers as friends and to which it is bound by the ties of civilization, it has deemed it proper to resort to the medium of arbitration, a medium resorted to by modern nations and approved by the constitution of the Republic. Consequently, the Chief of the Government, aware of your excellency's personal character and high order of intelligence, has instructed me to request your excellency to serve as arbitrator for the Republic in this question. Your excellency's consent, which I venture to hope will be given as soon as possible, will determine the nature of the proposals which the Government intends to make to the above-mentioned nations.

Caracas, December 11, 1902.

MR. MINISTER: I had the honor to inform the chief of the nation of your reply to my note of the 9th instant, in which your excellency not only kindly consents to serve the Republic in the present international imbroglio, but also informs us of the good will of the United States in permitting you to be arbitrator on the part of Venezuela in the difficulty that has arisen respecting the manner of settling the claims of Great Britain and Germany for alleged damages and injuries to their subjects during the civil war.

The President thanks your excellency sincerely for your friendly attitude, and at the same time desires you to convey to your Government the appreciation of Venezuela of the good will manifested by the United States in this question.

Accept, etc.,

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 16, 1902.

Mr. Hay informs Mr. Bowen that no reply has been received from Great Britain and Germany. He has repeated proposition to arbitrate, with strong recommendation, and will advise Mr. Bowen promptly of replies when received.

CARACAS, December 18, 1902.

Mr. Bowen has received the following official communication:

"The Venezuelan Government confers on Mr. Herbert W. Bowen full powers to enter into negotiations to settle in the most favorable manner possible to the interests of the Republic the present difficulty which has arisen with the United Kingdom of Great Britain, the German Empire, and the Kingdom of Italy.

"In witness whereof these presents are issued in Caracas the 18th of December, 1902.

"CIPRIANO CASTRO,
"Constitutional President.

"Countersigned:

"LOPEZ BARALT,
"Minister for Foreign Affairs."

Mr. Bowen requests that if Mr. Hay decides to authorize him thus to act for Venezuela, to notify Germany, Great Britain, and Italy and obtain their consent immediately and request them to issue orders for an immediate stay of proceedings in Venezuela. He thinks he should treat with the ambassadors of those three powers at Washington, and not with the naval officers in Venezuela nor with the plenipotentiaries sent to Caracas from Berlin, London, and Rome, but he begs Mr. Hay to arrange the time and place. He thinks there should be no unnecessary delay.

If he leaves Caracas he would proceed by the regular steamer to arrive in New York December 29, but if Mr. Hay authorizes his going on the Marietta he could arrive a week earlier.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 18, 1902.

Mr. Hay informs Mr. Bowen that he has cabled to London, Berlin, and Rome the Venezuelan proposition to empower Mr. Bowen to negotiate on the part of Venezuela for settlement of the pending difficulties of the three powers, and has inquired if they are disposed to assent.

Mr. Bowen to Mr. Hay.

[Telegram.—Paraphrase.]

CARACAS, December 20, 1902.

Mr. Bowen states that arbitration at The Hague is objectionable because very slow and expensive, and, in the present case, prejudicial to the interests of the Venezuelan Government, which wishes its war vessels returned at once and the control of its rivers and ports so as to prevent arms and ammunition from being imported by the revolutionists, who are so numerous that if they receive a good supply of arms and ammunition will make the reestablishment of peace more difficult. Mr. Bowen believes that Venezuela would be satisfied to pay a good sum in cash at once to the three powers, and would agree that a mixed commission should settle the amounts to be paid on claims, and that Venezuela would furnish ample guaranty that payment of such amounts will be promptly made. Mr. Bowen states that in the exercise of the full powers given to him he may decide that in the interests of Venezuela it is better to accept at once and in full the ultimatums of the three powers than to leave the matter to the tribunal at The Hague. He states that he of course prefers a modification of the ultimatums, if possible, concerning amounts of cash payments. He asks, if Hague arbitration is desired, what favorable proposition can be made to Venezuela by the powers? If they would release war ships immediately after and stop blockade? He adds that he is bound to act in the interest of Venezuela.

CARACAS, December 16, 1902—4.30 p. m.

To the Citizen President of the United States of Venezuela:

The undersigned having assembled for the purpose of trying to aid the Government in the present conflict caused by the aggressive attitude of Germany and England, and having been asked by you to submit our opinion in writing, we do so, as follows:

In view of the aggressive acts committed, of the absolute helplessness of Venezuela to oppose with force the combined action of Germany and England, and of the absolute lack of resources which civilization and diplomacy would advise to put an end to the conflict, and in view, further, of the fact that the Government and people of Venezuela have done all that the national decorum and dignity demand, we consider that the time has arrived to yield to force, with the proper protests; and in virtue of the foregoing, we respectfully suggest that full powers be given to the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of North America to take the necessary steps to arrange the difficulty in the manner least prejudicial to the country.

With all consideration and respect, we subscribe ourselves your very attentive and obedient servants.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 27, 1902.

The following is the British memorandum in regard to the terms of arbitration:

"His Majesty's Government have, in consultation with the German Government, taken into their careful consideration the proposal communicated by the United States Government at the instance of that of Venezuela. The proposal is as follows:

"That the present difficulty respecting the matter of settling claims for injuries to British and German subjects during the insurrection be submitted to arbitration. The scope and intention of this proposal would obviously require further explanation. Its effect would apparently be to refer to arbitration only such claims as had reference to injuries resulting from the recent insurrection. This formula would evidently include a part only of the claims put forward by the two Governments, and we are left in doubt as to the manner in which the remaining claims are to be dealt with. Apart, however, from this, some of the claims are of a kind which no government could agree to refer to arbitration. The claims for injuries to the person and property of British subjects, owing to the confiscation of British vessels, the plundering of their contents, and the maltreatment of their crews, as well as some claims for the ill usage and false imprisonment of British subjects, are of this description. The amount of these claims is no doubt comparatively insignificant, but the principle at stake is of the first importance, and His Majesty's Government could not admit that there was any doubt of the liability of the Venezuelan Government in respect to them. His Majesty's Government desire, moreover, to draw attention to the circumstances under which arbitration is now proposed to them. The Venezuelan Government have, during the last six months, had ample opportunities for submitting such a proposal. On July 29, and again on November 11, it was intimated to them in the clearest language that unless His Majesty's Government received satisfactory assurances from them, and unless some steps were taken to compensate the parties injured by their conduct, it would become necessary for His Majesty's Government to enforce their just demands. No attention was paid to these solemn warnings, and in consequence of the manner in which they were disregarded His Majesty's Government found themselves reluctantly compelled to have recourse to the measures of coercion which are now in progress. His Majesty's Government have, moreover, already agreed that in the event of the Venezuelan Government making a declaration that they will recognize the principle of the justice of the British claims and that they will at once pay compensation in the shipping cases and in the cases where British subjects have been falsely imprisoned and maltreated His Majesty's Government will be ready, so far as the remaining claims are concerned, to accept the decision of a mixed commission, which will determine the amount to be paid and the security to be given for payment. A corresponding intimation has been made by the German Government. This mode of procedure seemed to both Governments to provide a reasonable and adequate mode of disposing of their claims. They have, however, no objection to substitute for the special commission a reference to arbitration, with certain essential reservations. These reservations are, so far as the British claims are concerned, as follows:

"One. The claims, small as has already been pointed out in pecuniary amount, arising out of the seizure and plundering of British vessels and outrages on their crews and the maltreatment and false imprisonment of British subjects, are not to be referred to arbitration.

"Two. In cases where the claim is for injury to or wrongful seizure of property, the questions which the arbitrators will have to decide will only be (a) whether the injury took place and whether the sentence was wrongful, and (b) if so, what amount of compensation is due. That in such cases a liability exists must be admitted in principle.

"Three. In the case of claims other than the above we are ready to accept arbitration without any reserve. It would, in the opinion of both Governments, be necessary that the arbitral tribunal should not only determine the amount of compensation payable by Venezuela, but should also define the security to be given by the Venezuelan Government and the means to be resorted to for the purpose of guaranteeing a sufficient and punctual discharge of the obligation.

"Should the President of the United States be willing to undertake the task of arbitrator, the British and German Governments would avail themselves of his good offices with the highest satisfaction. If it should unfortunately prove impossible for the President to render this important service to the two Governments, they are prepared to refer the questions at issue to arbitration by The Hague tribunal."

Mr. Hay to Mr. Bowen.

[Telegram.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 27, 1902.

The German propositions in regard to preliminary conditions of arbitration are as follows:

"The Imperial German Government expresses to the Government of the United States its earnest thanks for its efforts to adjust the troubles with Venezuela. The proposition made by the United States to establish an arbitration appears to Germany, as well as to England, a suitable means by which to arrive at a just decision in regard to their claims. It is to be noted, however, that there are certain claims of Germany which can not be submitted to arbitration, namely, such claims as had arisen out of the civil war from 1898 to 1900, which were set forth in the memorandum addressed by the chancellor to the Reichstag on December 8, 1902. These claims have been assessed by Germany at an aggregate of three hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars, which must be paid immediately or sufficiently guaranteed by Venezuela. All other claims set forth in the ultimatums will be submitted to arbitration—that is to say, not only those arising out of the present civil war in Venezuela, but also, as far as Germany is concerned, the claims referred to in the above-mentioned memorandum, which are based on the failure of the Government of Venezuela to fulfill its obligations toward German contractors under treaty engagements. The arbitrator shall decide upon the claims submitted as well as on the mode of satisfying them, and the security to be given in the case of claims arising from damage to or illegal seizure of property. The Government of Venezuela also will be required to admit in principle its responsibility—that is to say, that this responsibility does not form the basis of the present arbitration, but that the arbitrator shall decide solely as to the injury to or illegal seizure of property, and shall assess the damages therefor. The Government of the United States will place Germany and Great Britain under profound obligation if it will use its good offices to induce the Government of Venezuela to accept these propositions. The two Governments would be grateful to the President of the United States if he would accept the position of arbitrator under the foregoing conditions. If, however, the President of the United States should, to the great regret of the two Governments, decline their invitation, then they are prepared to submit the case to The Hague tribunal."

Mr. Bowen to Mr. Hay.

CARACAS, December 31, 1902.

Mr. Bowen quotes the following answer received from the President of Venezuela: "I recognize in principle the claims which the allied powers have presented to Venezuela. They would already have been settled if it had not been that the civil war required all the attention and resources of the Government. To-day the Government bows to superior force, and desires to send Mr. Bowen to Washington at once to confer there with the representatives of the powers that have claims against Venezuela, in order to arrange either an immediate settlement of all the claims or the preliminaries for a reference to the tribunal of The Hague or to an American republic, to be selected by the allied powers and by the Government of Venezuela. Mr. Bowen would be duly authorized to settle the whole question as the representative of Venezuela.

"CIPRIANO CASTRO."

Mr. Bowen urges, in view of the foregoing, that the Secretary of State request the powers to raise their blockade at once.

Mr. Bowen to Mr. Hay.

CARACAS, January 6, 1903.

Mr. Bowen states that the attitude of the authorities in Caracas, both toward foreigners and the blockaders, has been exemplary since the 10th day of last December, when all the British and German subjects resident in Venezuela who had been arrested were set free. He reports that President Castro has done all in his power to come to a fair agreement with the allied powers; that he has been ready and anxious to settle his controversy with them; that he has believed that if he could send a representative to Washington to confer with diplomatic representatives there of the allied powers his representative could convince them that the terms he has to offer are reasonable and would be so satisfactory that it would be unnecessary to carry the controversy to The Hague; that the claims against him are purely commercial in character; that he acknowledges that he must pay such of them as are just; that he would have preferred to wait before paying them until he had reestablished peace in Venezuela, but since the allied powers have declared he must yield at once to their demands, he feels that he is obliged to bow to superior force. Mr. Bowen further says that President Castro, under the foregoing circumstances, desires a speedy settlement of the controversy, so as to put an end to the blockade of his ports, which deprives him of paying the expenses of his Government and which is oppressive to his people and to all foreigners residing in Venezuela. President Castro thinks it strange that, as he is willing to pay what he owes and to offer a good guaranty that he will satisfy his creditors, he should not be allowed to come to an agreement with them without delay, but is forced to carry the controversy before the tribunal at The Hague. President Castro has the greatest respect for that tribunal, but does not see why he should be forced to submit a controversy to it which could be settled at Washington quickly, easily, and at little expense. A proposition to settle in civil cases being always in order before the court renders its judgment, President Castro thinks that, as this is essentially a civil case, the allied powers should at least give his representative a courteous hearing; but if they are indisposed to do so and insist on The Hague, he feels that they ought to raise their blockade the moment he binds himself to abide by the decision of that tribunal. As he represents a weak nation, and can not enforce his views, he trusts to the Government at Washington to use its good offices to secure just treatment for him.

The following memorandum, being the reply of the German Government, was communicated to Ambassador Tower to-day:

"The German Government learns with satisfaction that the Venezuelan Government has accepted its demands in principle. Before further negotiations can be undertaken with Venezuela, however, it seems necessary that the President of Venezuela should make a definite statement as to the unconditional acceptance of the three preliminary conditions set forth in the German memorandum of December 22, 1902. He will also have especially to declare how he intends either to pay or to secure the claims set forth in paragraph 1. On receipt of a satisfactory assurance from the Government of Venezuela, the German Government will be prepared to instruct its ambassador in Washington to open negotiations with Mr. Bowen, as the representative of Venezuela, and to consider his propositions in regard to an adjustment. These propositions may relate to an immediate settlement, or to a reference to The Hague tribunal, of all claims, except, of course, those mentioned in paragraph 1. The German Government makes the condition, however, that the discussion of any proposition for immediate payment shall not prejudice the right of reference to The Hague tribunal.

"The German Government will be very greatly obliged to the Government of the United States if it will transmit the foregoing reply to President Castro."

Mr. Bowen proposes that all claims against Venezuela shall be paid out of the customs receipts of the two ports of La Guaira and Puerto Cabello, the percentage to be 30 per cent, each month, of the receipts. In case of failure on the part of Venezuela to pay the said 30 per cent, the creditor nations will be authorized to put, with the consent and without any opposition on the part of Venezuela, Belgian custom officials in charge of the said two custom-houses, and to administer them until the entire foreign debt is paid.

HERBERT W. BOWEN.

WASHINGTON, January 23, 1903.

Sir Michael H. Herbert to Mr. Bowen.

BRITISH EMBASSY, Washington, January 23, 1903.

DEAR MR. BOWEN: Immediately after you left the embassy on the 20th instant I telegraphed to my Government your formal request that the blockade of the Venezuelan ports be raised before the commencement of the negotiations in Washington.

I have now received a telegram from Lord Lansdowne in reply, setting forth the conditions which must be accepted by the Venezuelan Government before his lordship can comply with your request. They are as follows:

1. The claims (small in pecuniary amount) arising out of the seizure and plundering of British vessels and outrages on their crews, and the maltreatment and false imprisonment of British subjects, must be satisfied at once.

2. The other claims for compensation, including railway claims and those for injury or wrongful seizure of property, must be met by an immediate payment to His Majesty's Government or by a guaranty adequate to secure them. These claims can be, if desired, examined by a mixed commission.

3. An arrangement must be entered into to satisfy the claims of the bondholders, including a provision for definite sources of payment.

4. There must be an exchange of notes between His Majesty's Government and that of Venezuela, renewing the convention of October 29, 1834.

On learning that the negotiations have resulted in an agreement fulfilling the above conditions, His Majesty's Government will at once give orders that the blockade of Venezuelan ports shall be raised.

I hope to receive my full instructions, and all information relating to them to-morrow, when I shall be in a position to explain any points in connection with the above conditions which may not seem clear to you.

Believe me, etc.,

MICHAEL H. HERBERT.

Mr. Bowen to Sir Michael H. Herbert.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 23, 1903.

DEAR SIR MICHAEL: In answer to your letter of to-day, stating the conditions on which Great Britain will raise the blockade of the Venezuelan ports, I have the honor to inform you that I accept those conditions, as they are substantially the same as those already accepted by the Venezuelan Government.

I therefore request that your Government give orders at once to have the said blockade raised.

Believe me, etc.,

HERBERT W. BOWEN.

Count von Quadt to Mr. Bowen.

GERMAN EMBASSY, Washington, D. C., January 24, 1903.

MY DEAR MR. MINISTER: With reference to the conversation we just had, I beg to state that the blockade of the Venezuelan ports will be raised by the Imperial German Government immediately—i. e., at the same time as Great Britain does so—if you sign the document which is herewith annexed and undertake therefore all the obligations herein contained.

Believe me, etc.,

A. QUADT,
Imperial German Charge d'Affaires.

Document mentioned in the preceding letter.

I. As the Imperial German Government holds that the German claims, originated from the Venezuelan civil wars of 1898 to 1900, are no more apt to be submitted to arbitration, the Government of Venezuela has to acknowledge at once these claims, amounting to 1,718,815 bolivars circa $325,000, and either to pay the said amount cash without any delay, or, should this be impossible, to guarantee the speedy payment of them by warrants which are deemed sufficient by the Imperial German Government.

II. All the other claims which have already been brought to the knowledge of the Venezuelan Government in the ultimatum delivered by the imperial minister resident at Caracas—i. e., claims resulting from the present civil war, further claims resulting from the construction of the slaughterhouse at Caracas, as well as the claims of the German Great Venezuelan Railroad for the nonpayment of the guaranteed interest—are to be submitted to a mixed commission, should an immediate settlement not be possible.

III. The said commission will have to decide both about the fact whether said claims are materially founded and about the manner in which they will have to be settled or which guaranty will have to be offered for their settlement. Inasmuch as these claims result from damages inflicted on property or the illegal seizure of such property, the Venezuelan Government has to acknowledge its liability in principle, so that such liability in itself will not be an object of arbitration, and the decision of the commission will only extend to the question whether the inflicting of damages or the seizure of such property was illegal. The commission will also have to fix the amount of indemnity.

Mr. Bowen, having shown his full powers as representative of the Venezuelan Government, accepts herewith the three above-mentioned conditions without any reserve and agrees to give to Germany the same guaranties that Mr. Bowen has given to Great Britain, and which are stated in his letter to Sir M. Herbert, dated January 23, 1903, in confirmation whereof he has applied his signature under this document.

HERBERT W. BOWEN.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 24, 1903.

---

WASHINGTON, January 24, 1903.

The conditions of the German Government having been accepted, Mr. Bowen, as representative of the Venezuelan Government, will now have to provide at once for payment of the 1,718,815 bolivars mentioned under No. 1 of the conditions, or give an adequate guaranty for this amount. Should Mr. Bowen choose the latter way, the guaranty is to be specified distinctly. For instance, in case of a guaranty based on the customs revenues, as suggested by Mr. Bowen, it would be necessary to state exactly in which [way] payment will take place out of these revenues. The guaranty will have to be given de facto and without any delay.

Mr. Bowen's proposals relative to guaranty will first have to be cabled to the German Government.

HERBERT W. BOWEN.

Mr. Mayor des Planches to Mr. Bowen.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 24, 1903.

MY DEAR MINISTER: With reference to the conversation we just had, I beg to state that the blockade of the Venezuelan ports will be raised by the Royal Italian Government immediately—i. e., at the same time as Germany and Great Britain do so—provided you sign a document in which, in virtue of the full powers granted to you by the Venezuelan Government, you bind yourself to give to my Government, for the Italian claims of every kind, the same guaranty you have given to Germany and Great Britain.

Believe me, etc.,

E. MAYOR DES PLANCHES.

Mr. Bowen to Mr. Mayor des Planches.

WASHINGTON, January 24, 1903.

MY DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: In answer to your letter of this date I have much pleasure in informing you that I hereby consent and agree to give for the Italian claims the same guaranty that I have given for the British and German claims.

Believe me, etc.,

HERBERT W. BOWEN.

Mr. Bowen's agreement respecting the 30 per cent.

WASHINGTON, January 27, 1903.

I hereby agree that Venezuela will pay 30 per cent of the total income of the ports of La Guaira and Puerto Cabello to the nations that have claims against her, and it is distinctly understood that the said 30 per cent will be given exclusively to meet the claims mentioned in the recent ultimatums of the allied powers and the unsettled claims of other nations that existed when the said ultimatums were presented. At the end of each month the amount of the total income of the said two ports will be duly announced to the creditor nations and 30 per cent of that amount will be paid to them, even if the whole amount should be lost or stolen, for Venezuela in that case would be bound to pay the said 30 per cent even if she has to take it from other custom houses or borrow the said 30 per cent. It is further understood that the said 30 per cent is to be considered absolute and unchangeable and not to be diminished by any other agreements ever made, or ever to be made, affecting the customs receipts of the said two ports.

HERBERT W. BOWEN.

---

Mr. Bowen to Sir Michael H. Herbert.

WASHINGTON, January 27, 1903.

DEAR SIR MICHAEL: Please do not fail to state in your cablegram that I can not consent to give preferential treatment to the allied powers, because, if the matter were referred to the Hague, all the creditor nations would be put on the same footing. The allied powers, therefore, should not try to press the point, as it would be unfair to do so.

Believe me, etc.,

HERBERT W. BOWEN.

---

WASHINGTON, January 30, 1903.

I object to paying first the claims of the allies and the claims of the other nations afterwards because, first, I think it unjust and unfair and illegal to tie the hands of the said other nations for the period of five or six years that it would take to pay the claims of the allies; second, if I recognize that brute force alone can be respected in the collection of claims, I should encourage the said other nations to use force also; third, if the allied powers wanted preferential treatment, they should have asked for it in the beginning and should not now propose it after I understood clearly that all the conditions of the allied powers had been stated. If, however, this demand for preferential treatment is raised simply as a point of honor, I am willing to agree that the entire 30 per cent be paid to the allied powers for the first month.

HERBERT W. BOWEN.

---

Mr. Bowen to Sir Michael H. Herbert.

WASHINGTON, February 2, 1903.

DEAR SIR MICHAEL: I have given due consideration to your Government's proposition that two-thirds of the 30 per cent of the customs receipts of La Guaira and Puerto Cabello be given to the allied powers and that the remaining third be paid to the peace powers. That proposition I must decline. I can not accept even in principle that preferential treatment can be rightly obtained by blockades and bombardments. It would be absolutely offensive to modern civilization to recognize that principle and to incorporate it into the law of nations, as it would have to be if the allied powers and the peace powers should agree to it and acknowledge it. Furthermore, that proposition is objectionable because it would keep the allied powers allied for a period of over six years. Venezuela can not, I am sure, be expected to encourage the maintenance of alliances against her. On this side of the water we want peace, not alliances.

Now, as the question of preferential treatment is the only one on which we have not agreed, I hereby propose that we leave that question to The Hague. What we have already agreed upon we can hold to and stand by. We need only to add to it that we have decided to submit the question of preferential treatment to The Hague.

If this proposition is accepted—and I do not see how it can be declined—there would be, of course, no reason to continue the blockade.

This solution of the controversy is honorable to all parties, and I beg you to communicate it to your colleagues at your earliest convenience.

I am, etc.,

HERBERT W. BOWEN.

Mr. Bowen to Count von Quadt.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 5, 1903.

MY DEAR COUNT QUADT: I hereby agree that Germany shall be paid in cash the same amount (£5,500) that I have agreed shall be paid to Great Britain.

I am, etc.,

HERBERT W. BOWEN.

NOTE.—This cash payment of £5,500 shall be made within thirty days after the signing of the protocol, in case the cash can not be paid on the very day it is signed.

HERBERT W. BOWEN.

Same to Italy except that the cash payment will be made within sixty days.

Mr. Bowen to Baron von Sternburg.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 10, 1903.

DEAR BARON VON STERNBURG: I agreed to pay each of the allied powers £5,500 in cash, with the understanding that no other cash demand would be made. I therefore refuse absolutely to pay Germany's new demand for a cash payment of 1,700,000 bolivars and Italy's new demand for a cash payment 2,800,000 bolivars. Our agreement was that the 1,700,000 and the 2,800,000 bolivars were to be paid out of the 30 per cent of the customs receipts at the same time and in the same manner as were to be paid the claims of all the other creditor nations. The special agreement I concluded with Germany was that I should pay cash or give a sufficient guaranty. I gave the latter, and its sufficiency has never been disputed.

I am, etc.,

HERBERT W. BOWEN.

Mr. Bowen to Sir Michael H. Herbert.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 10, 1903.

DEAR SIR MICHAEL: I have much pleasure in accepting the British protocol, which is very satisfactory to Venezuela, and which, in my opinion, is very creditable to you and to the British Government.

I am, etc.,

HERBERT W. BOWEN.

A concession to Germany.

In consideration of the fact that Great Britain and Italy are willing to waive their claims to priority of payments in favor of Germany in regard to the payment of her first-rank claims, and also in view of the fact that there was a misunderstanding between the German embassy and German Government in regard to the interpretation of the latter's instruction prior to the arrival of the German minister, Mr. Bowen is now willing to pay to Germany, within three months of the date of the signing of the German protocol, one-half of Germany's cash demand.

This concession is made by Mr. Bowen in order to arrive at a settlement, although he considers that he would be perfectly justified, in view of the documents already signed during the negotiations, in standing on them and in absolutely refusing any cash payment other than that of the £5,500.

It is understood that the other half of the German cash demand, and also the whole of the Italian claims of the first rank, amounting to about 2,810,000 bolivars, shall not be subject to revision.

HERBERT W. BOWEN.

Our interpretation of the protocols was and is that the 30 per cent of the total income of the customs receipts of La Guaira and Puerto Cabello shall begin to be set apart on the 1st day of March, 1903, and continue to be set apart through the said month, and that the first payment will be due not the 1st of March but the 1st of April, 1903.

WASHINGTON, February 14, 1903.

British protocol.

Whereas certain differences have arisen between the United States of Venezuela and Great Britain in connection with the claims of British subjects against the Venezuelan Government, the undersigned, Mr. Herbert W. Bowen, duly authorized thereto by the Government of Venezuela and his excellency the Right Honorable Sir Michael H. Herbert, K. C. M. G., C. B., His Britannic Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States of America, have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I.

The Venezuelan Government declare that they recognize in principle the justice of the claims which have been preferred by His Majesty's Government on behalf of British subjects.

ARTICLE II.

The Venezuelan Government will satisfy at once, by payment in cash or its equivalent, the claims of British subjects which amount to about five thousand five hundred pounds (£5,500), arising out of the seizure and plundering of British vessels and the outrages on their crews, and the maltreatment and false imprisonment of British subjects.

ARTICLE III.

The Venezuelan and British Governments agree that the other British claims, including claims by British subjects other than those dealt with in Article VI hereof and including those preferred by the railway companies, shall, unless otherwise satisfied, be referred to a mixed commission constituted in the manner defined in Article IV of this protocol and which shall examine the claims and decide upon the amount to be awarded in satisfaction of each claim.

The Venezuelan Government admit their liability in cases where the claim is for injury to or wrongful seizure of property, and consequently the questions which the mixed commission will have to decide in such cases will only be: (a) Whether the injury took place and whether the seizure was wrongful, and (b) If so, what amount of compensation is due.

In other cases the claims shall be referred to the Mixed Commission without reservation.

ARTICLE IV.

The Mixed Commission shall consist of one Venezuelan member and one British member. In each case where they come to an agreement their decision shall be final. In cases of disagreement the claims shall be referred to the decision of an umpire nominated by the President of the United States of America.

ARTICLE V.

The Venezuelan Government, being willing to provide a sum sufficient for the payment within a reasonable time of the claims specified in Article III and similar claims preferred by other governments, undertake to assign to the British Government, commencing the first day of March, 1903, for this purpose, and to alienate to no other purpose, 30 per cent in monthly payments of the customs revenues of La Guaira and Puerto Cabello. In the case of failure to carry out this undertaking, Belgian officials shall be placed in charge of the customs of the two ports, and shall administer them until the liabilities of the Venezuelan Government in respect of the above-mentioned claims shall have been discharged.

Any question as to the distribution of the customs revenues so to be assigned, and as to the rights of Great Britain, Germany, and Italy to a separate settlement of their claims, shall be determined, in default of arrangement, by the tribunal at The Hague, to which any other power interested may appeal.

Pending the decision of The Hague tribunal the said 30 per cent of the receipts of the customs of the ports of La Guaira and Puerto Cabello are to be paid over to the representatives of the Bank of England at Caracas.

ARTICLE VI.

The Venezuelan Government further undertake to enter into a fresh arrangement respecting the external debt of Venezuela with a view to the satisfaction of the claims of the bondholders. This arrangement shall include a definition of the sources from which the necessary payments are to be provided.

ARTICLE VII.

The Venezuelan and British Governments agree that, inasmuch as it may be contended that the establishment of a blockade of Venezuelan ports by the British naval forces has ipso facto created a state of war between Venezuela and Great Britain, and that any treaty existing between the two countries has been thereby abrogated, it shall be recorded in an exchange of notes between the undersigned that the convention between Venezuela and Great Britain of October 29, 1834, which adopted and confirmed mutatis mutandis the treaty of April 18, 1825, between Great Britain and the State of Colombia, shall be deemed to be renewed and confirmed or provisionally renewed and confirmed pending conclusion of a new treaty of amity and commerce.

ARTICLE VIII.

Immediately upon the signature of this protocol arrangements will be made by His Majesty's Government in concert with the Governments of Germany and Italy to raise the blockade of the Venezuelan ports.

His Majesty's Government will be prepared to restore the vessels of the Venezuelan which have been seized and further to release any other vessels captured under the Venezuelan flag on the receipt of a guarantee from the Venezuelan Government that they will hold His Majesty's Government indemnified in respect of any proceedings which might be taken against them by the owners of such ships or of goods on board them.

ARTICLE IX.

The treaty of amity and commerce of October 29, 1834, having been confirmed in accordance with the terms of Article VII of this protocol, the Government of Venezuela will be happy to renew diplomatic relations with His Majesty's Government. Done in duplicate at Washington this 13th day of February, 1903.

Italian protocol.

Whereas certain differences have arisen between Italy and the United States of Venezuela in connection with the Italian claims against the Venezuelan Government the undersigned, Mr. Herbert W. Bowen, duly authorized thereto by the Government of Venezuela, and His Excellency Nobile Edmondo Mayor des Planches, commander of the Orders of S. S. Maurice and Lazarus and the Crown of Italy, ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary of His Majesty the King of Italy to the United States of America, have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I.

The Venezuelan Government declare that they recognize in principle the justice of the claims which have been preferred by His Majesty's Government on behalf of Italian subjects.

ARTICLE II.

The Venezuelan Government agree to pay to the Italian Government, as a satisfaction of the point of honor, the sum of £5,500 (five thousand five hundred pounds sterling), in cash or its equivalent, which sum is to be paid within sixty days.

ARTICLE III.

The Venezuelan Government accept, recognize, and will pay the amount of the Italian claims of the first rank derived from the revolutions of 1898-1900, in the sum of 2,810,255 (two million eight hundred and ten thousand two hundred and fifty-five) bolivars.

It is expressly agreed that the payment of the whole of the above Italian claims of the first rank will be made without being the same claims, the same sum submitted to the Mixed Commission, and without any revision or objection.

ARTICLE IV.

The Italian and Venezuelan Governments agree that all the remaining Italian claims, without exception, other than those dealt with in Article VII hereof, shall, unless otherwise satisfied, be referred to a Mixed Commission, to be constituted as soon as possible in the manner defined in Article VI of the protocol, and which shall examine the claims and decide upon the amount to be awarded in satisfaction of each claim.

The Venezuelan Government admit their liability in cases where the claim is for injury to persons and property and for wrongful seizure of the latter, and consequently the questions which the Mixed Commission will have to decide in such cases will only be:

- (a) Whether the injury took place or whether the seizure was wrongful; and,
- (b) If so, what amount of compensation is due.

In other cases the claims will be referred to the Mixed Commission without reservation.

ARTICLE V.

The Venezuelan Government being willing to provide a sum sufficient for the payment, within a reasonable time, of the claims specified in Articles III and IV and similar claims preferred by other governments, undertake and obligate themselves to assign to the Italian Government, commencing the first day of March, 1903, for this purpose, and to alienate to no other purpose 30 per cent of the customs revenues of La Guaira and Puerto Cabello. In the case of failure to carry out this undertaking and obligation Belgian officials shall be placed in charge of the customs of the two ports, and shall administer them until the liabilities of the Venezuelan Government in respect of the above-mentioned claims shall have been discharged.

Any question as to the distribution of the customs revenues so to be assigned, and as to the rights of Italy, Great Britain, and Germany to a separate settlement of their claims, shall be determined in default of arrangement, by the tribunal at The Hague, to which any other power interested may appeal. Pending the decision of The Hague tribunal the said 30 per cent of the receipt of the customs of the ports of La Guaira and Puerto Cabello are to be paid over to the representatives of the Bank of England at Caracas.

ARTICLE VI.

The Mixed Commission shall consist of one Italian member and one Venezuelan member. In each case, where they come to an agreement, their decision shall be final. In cases of disagreement, the claims shall be referred to the decision of an umpire nominated by the President of United States of America.

ARTICLE VII.

The Venezuelan Government further undertake to enter into a fresh arrangement respecting the external debt of Venezuela with a view to the satisfaction of the claims of the bondholders. This arrangement shall include a definition of the sources from which the necessary payments are to be provided.

ARTICLE VIII.

The treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation between Italy and Venezuela of June 19, 1861, is renewed and confirmed. It is, however, expressly agreed between the two Governments that the interpretation to be given to the articles 4 and 26 is the following:

"According to the article 4, Italians in Venezuela and Venezuelans in Italy can not in any case receive a treatment less favorable than the natives, and, according to the article 26, Italians in Venezuela and Venezuelans in Italy are entitled to receive in every matter, and especially in matter of claims, the treatment of the most-favored nation, as it is established in the same article 26."

If there is doubt or conflict between the two articles, the article 26 will be followed.

It is further specially agreed that the above treaty shall never be invoked in any case against the provision of the present protocol.

ARTICLE IX.

At once upon the signing of this protocol, arrangements shall be made by His Majesty's Government, in concert with the Governments of Germany and Great Britain, to raise the blockade of the Venezuelan ports.

His Majesty's Government will be prepared to restore the vessels of the Venezuelan navy which may have been seized, and further to release any other vessel captured under the Venezuelan flag during the blockade.

The Government of Venezuela hereby obligate themselves and guarantee that the Italian Government shall be wholly exempted and relieved from any reclamations or claims of any kind which may be made by citizens or corporations of Venezuela, or by citizens or corporations of any other nation, for detention or seizure or destruction of any vessel or of goods on board of them, which may have been or which may be detained, seized or destroyed, by reason of the blockade instituted and carried on by the three allied powers against the Republic of Venezuela.

ARTICLE X.

The treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation of June 19th, 1861, having been renewed and confirmed in accordance with the terms of Article VIII of this protocol, His Majesty's Government declare that they will be happy to reestablish regular diplomatic relations with the Government of Venezuela.

HERBERT W. BOWEN.
E. MAYOR DES PLANCHES.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 13, 1903.

German protocol.

Whereas certain differences have arisen between the United States of Venezuela and Germany in connection with the claims of German subjects against the Venezuelan Government, the undersigned Mr. Herbert W. Bowen, duly authorized by the Government of Venezuela, and Baron Speck von Sternburg, His Imperial German Majesty's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, duly authorized by the Imperial German Government, have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I.

The Venezuelan Government recognize in principle the justice of the claims of German subjects presented by the Imperial German Government.

ARTICLE II.

The German claims originating from the Venezuelan civil wars of 1898 to 1900 amount to 1,718,815.67 bolivars. The Venezuelan Government undertake to pay of said amount immediately in cash the sum of £5,500—137,500 bolivars (five thousand five hundred pounds—one hundred thirty-seven thousand five hundred bolivars) and for the payment of the rest to redeem five bills of exchange for the corresponding installments payable on the 15th of March, the 15th of April, the 15th of May, the 15th of June and the 15th of July, 1903, to the Imperial German diplomatic agent in Caracas. These bills shall be drawn immediately by Mr. Bowen and handed over to Baron Sternburg. Should the Venezuelan Government fail to redeem one of these bills the payment shall be made from the customs receipts of La Guaira and Puerto Cabello, and the administration of both ports shall be put in charge of Belgian custom-house officials until the complete extinction of the said debts.

ARTICLE III.

The German claims not mentioned in the articles II and VI, in particular the claims resulting from the present Venezuelan civil war, the claims of the Great Venezuelan Railroad Company against the Venezuelan Government for passages and freight, the claims of the engineer, Carl Henckel, in Hamburg, and of the Beton and Monierban Company, Limited, in Berlin, for the construction of a slaughterhouse at Caracas, are to be submitted to a mixed commission.

Said commission shall decide both whether the different claims are materially well founded and also upon their amount. The Venezuelan Government admit their liability in cases where the claim is for injury to a wrongful seizure of property, and consequently the commission will not have to decide the question of liability, but only whether the injury to or the seizure of property were wrongful acts, and what amount of compensation is due.

ARTICLE IV.

The mixed commission mentioned in article III shall have its seat in Caracas. It shall consist of two members, one of which is to be appointed by the Government of Venezuela, the other by the Imperial German Government. The appointments are to be made before May 1st, 1903. In each case where the two members come to an agreement on the claims their decision shall be considered as final; in cases of disagreement the claims shall be submitted to the decision of an umpire to be nominated by the President of the United States of America.

ARTICLE V.

For the purpose of paying the claims specified in article 3, as well as similar claims preferred by other powers, the Venezuelan Government shall remit to the representative of the Bank of England in Caracas in monthly installments, beginning from March 1st, 1903, 30 per cent of the customs revenues of La Guaira and Puerto Cabello, which shall not be alienated to any other purpose. Should the Venezuelan Government fail to carry out this obligation Belgian customs officials shall be placed in charge of the customs of the two ports, and shall administer them until the liabilities of the Venezuelan Government in respect of the above-mentioned claims shall have been discharged.

Any questions as to the distribution of the customs revenues specified in the foregoing paragraph, as well as to the rights of Germany, Great Britain, and Italy to a separate payment of their claims, shall be determined, in default of another agreement, by the Permanent Tribunal of Arbitration at The Hague. All other powers interested may join as parties in the arbitration proceedings against the above-mentioned three powers.

ARTICLE VI.

The Venezuelan Government undertake to make a new satisfactory arrangement to settle simultaneously the 5 per cent Venezuelan loan of 1896, which is chiefly in German hands, and the entire exterior debt. In this arrangement the state revenues to be employed for the service of the debt are to be determined without prejudice to the obligations already existing.

ARTICLE VII.

The Venezuelan men-of-war and merchant vessels captured by the German naval forces shall be returned to the Venezuelan Government in their actual condition. No claims for indemnity can be based on the capture and on the holding of these vessels, neither will an indemnity be granted for injury to or destruction of the same.

ARTICLE VIII.

Immediately upon the signature of this protocol the blockade of the Venezuelan ports shall be raised by the Imperial German Government, in concert with the Governments of Great Britain and Italy. Also the diplomatic relations between the Imperial German and the Venezuelan Governments will be resumed.

Done in duplicate in English and German texts, at Washington, this thirteenth day of February, one thousand nine hundred and three.

United States protocol.

Protocol of an agreement between the Secretary of State of the United States of America and the plenipotentiary of the Republic of Venezuela for submission to arbitration of all unsettled claims of citizens of the United States of America against the Republic of Venezuela.

The United States of America and the Republic of Venezuela, through their representatives, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America, and Herbert W. Bowen, the plenipotentiary of the Republic of Venezuela, have agreed upon and signed the following protocol:

ARTICLE I.

All claims owned by citizens of the United States of America against the Republic of Venezuela which have not been settled by diplomatic agreement or by arbitration between the two Governments, and which shall have been presented to the commission hereinafter named by the Department of State of the United States or its legation at Caracas, shall be examined and decided by a Mixed Commission, which shall sit at Caracas, and which shall consist of two members, one of whom is to be appointed by the President of the United States and the other by the President of Venezuela.

It is agreed that an umpire may be named by the Queen of the Netherlands. If either of said Commissioners or the umpire should fail or cease to act, his successor shall be appointed forthwith in the same manner as his predecessor. Said Commissioners and umpire are to be appointed before the first of May, 1903.

The Commissioners and the umpire shall meet in the city of Caracas on the first day of June, 1903. The umpire shall preside over their deliberations, and shall be competent to decide any question on which the Commissioners disagree. Before assuming the functions of their office the Commissioners and the umpire shall take solemn oath carefully to examine and impartially decide, according to justice and the provisions of this convention, all claims submitted to them, and such oaths shall be entered on the record of their proceedings. The Commissioners, or in case of their disagreement, the umpire, shall decide all claims upon a basis of absolute equity, without regard to objections of a technical nature, or of the provisions of local legislation.

The decisions of the Commission, and in the event of their disagreement, those of the umpire, shall be final and conclusive. They shall be in writing. All awards shall be made payable in United States gold or its equivalent in silver.

ARTICLE II.

The Commissioners, or umpire, as the case may be, shall investigate and decide said claims upon such evidence or information only as shall be furnished by or on behalf of the respective Governments. They shall be bound to receive and consider all written documents or statements which may be presented to them by or on behalf of the respective Governments in support of or in answer to any claim, and to hear oral or written arguments made by the agent of each Government on every claim. In case of their failure to agree in opinion upon any individual claim, the umpire shall decide.

Every claim shall be formally presented to the Commissioners within thirty days from the day of their first meeting, unless the Commissioners or the umpire in any case extend the period for presenting the claim not exceeding three months longer. The Commissioners shall be bound to examine and decide upon every claim within six months from the day of its first formal presentation, and in case of their disagreement the umpire shall examine and decide within a corresponding period from the date of such disagreement.

ARTICLE III.

The Commissioners and the umpire shall keep an accurate record of their proceedings. For that purpose, each Commissioner shall appoint a secretary versed in the language of both countries to assist them in the transaction of the business of the Commission. Except as herein stipulated, all questions of procedure shall be left to the determination of the Commission, or in case of their disagreement, to the umpire.

ARTICLE IV.

Reasonable compensation to the Commissioners and to the umpire for their services and expenses, and the other expenses of said arbitration, are to be paid in equal moieties by the contracting parties.

ARTICLE V.

In order to pay the total amount of the claims to be adjudicated as aforesaid, and other claims of citizens or subjects of other nations, the Government of Venezuela shall set apart for this purpose, and alienate to no other purpose, beginning with the month of March, 1903, thirty per cent in monthly payments of the customs revenues of La Guaira and Puerto Cabello, and the payments thus set aside shall be divided and distributed in conformity with the decision of The Hague tribunal.

In case of the failure to carry out the above agreement, Belgian officials shall be placed in charge of the customs of the two ports and shall administer them until the liabilities of the Venezuelan Government in respect of the above claims shall have been discharged. The reference of the question above stated to The Hague tribunal will be the subject of a separate protocol.

ARTICLE VI.

All existing and unsatisfied awards in favor of the United States shall be promptly paid, according to the terms of the respective awards.

ARTICLE VI.

Any nation having claims against Venezuela may join as a party in the arbitration provided for by this protocol.

Mr. Bowen to Sir Michael H. Herbert.

THE ARLINGTON, March 19, 1903.

DEAR SIR MICHAEL: You understand, of course, that if, as rumor says, the allied powers are not disposed to sign The Hague protocol, Venezuela will not be bound to pay to the representative of the Bank of England, at Caracas, the 30 per cent of the customs receipts of La Guaira and Puerto Cabello, for it was agreed that if the money were paid to him he should distribute it in conformity with the decision of The Hague tribunal. As April 1, the time for the first payment to be made, is near at hand, it would seem as if you should inform me promptly just what the intentions of the allied powers are in this matter.

Believe me, etc.,

HERBERT W. BOWEN.

Sir Michael H. Herbert to Mr. Bowen.

BRITISH EMBASSY, Washington, March 20, 1903.

DEAR MR. BOWEN: I know nothing about the rumor referred to in your letter of yesterday, to the effect that the three powers are not disposed to sign The Hague protocol.

As you have obtained an extension of leave, and as you proposed that The Hague tribunal should not meet until next September, there appears to me to be no necessity for immediate action in connection with the The Hague protocol; but, as a matter of fact, I expect to be in a position to discuss it with you next week unless I receive further instructions from my Government.

I am, etc.,

MICHAEL H. HERBERT.

Mr. Bowen to Sir Michael H. Herbert.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 20, 1903.

DEAR SIR MICHAEL: In answer to your letter of to-day in regard to The Hague protocol, I have the honor to say that as the British protocol of February 13 last provides that, in default of arrangement, the question of preferential treatment shall be decided by The Hague tribunal, it is necessary for me to know whether you intend to propose an arrangement of that question or whether it is to be submitted to the The Hague tribunal for decision. In case it is left to The Hague, the said protocol of the 13th of February provides that, pending the decision, the 30 per cent is to be paid over to the representative of the Bank of England at Caracas.

When you notify me which method of settlement you have decided upon, I will notify the Venezuelan Government. If the case is not to go to The Hague, it would, of course, be improper to have the 30 per cent paid over to the representative of the Bank of England at Caracas, if for no other reason than that no authority has been given to him to pay out the money except in conformity with the decision of The Hague.

I thought it would be in your interest to have this matter cleared up before the 1st of April; but if you are willing to delay, I shall not object, only, of course, I shall not be able to request the Venezuelan Government to pay the 30 per cent to the representative of the Bank of England at Caracas on the 1st of April unless before that date you inform me that you have decided to submit the said question to The Hague tribunal.

I am, etc.,

HERBERT W. BOWEN.

Sir Michael H. Herbert to Mr. Bowen.

BRITISH EMBASSY, Washington, March 20, 1903.

DEAR MR. BOWEN: I have received your letter of to-day, and regret that my letter sent to you this morning was not clear to you.

So far as I am aware, His Majesty's Government wish to submit the question of preferential treatment to The Hague, and unless otherwise instructed, I propose to submit the draft protocol of reference to The Hague tribunal, with certain amendments, to you some time next week.

I am, etc.,

MICHAEL H. HERBERT.

Mr. Bowen's draft protocol, as amended by Sir Michael H. Herbert.

[Received April 2, 1903.]

Whereas protocols, the texts of which are given in an annex to the present agreement, have been signed between Great Britain, Germany, Italy, the United States of America, France, Spain, Belgium, the Netherlands, Sweden and Norway, and Mexico on the one hand, and Venezuela on the other hand, containing certain conditions agreed upon for the settlement of claims against the Venezuelan Government;

And whereas certain further questions arising out of the action taken by the Governments of Great Britain, Germany, and Italy in connection with the settlement of their claims have not proved to be susceptible of settlement by ordinary diplomatic methods;

And whereas the powers interested are resolved to determine these questions by reference to arbitration in accordance with the provisions of the convention for the pacific settlement of international disputes signed at The Hague on the 29th July, 1899.

The said powers have, with a view to carry out that resolution, authorized their representatives, that is to say—

For Great Britain, etc., to conclude the following agreement:

ARTICLE I.

The question as to whether or not Great Britain, Germany, and Italy are entitled to preferential or separate treatment in the payment of their claims against Venezuela shall be submitted for final decision to the tribunal at The Hague.

Venezuela having agreed to set aside 30 per cent of the customs revenues of La Guaira and Puerto Cabello for the payment of the claims of all nations against Venezuela, the tribunal at The Hague shall decide how the said revenues shall be divided between the blockading powers on the one hand and the other creditor powers on the other hand, and its decision shall be final.

If preferential or separate treatment is not given to the blockading powers, the tribunal shall decide how the said revenues shall be distributed among all the creditor powers, and its decision shall be final.

In deciding the questions of preferential or separate treatment to be granted to the blockading powers, the tribunal shall have regard to the resources of Venezuela other than the 30 per cent of the customs revenues so set aside, which may be available for the payment of claims of other powers.

ARTICLE II.

If preferential or separate treatment is not given to Great Britain, Germany, and Italy, the tribunal may consider whether any and what compensation should be made by Venezuela out of the 30 per cent of the customs revenues set aside to these powers for the expense which they have incurred in connection with the blockade.

ARTICLE III.

The facts on which shall depend the decision of the questions stated in Article I shall be ascertained in such manner as the tribunal may determine.

ARTICLE IV.

The Emperor of Russia shall be invited to name and appoint from the members of the permanent court of The Hague three arbitrators to constitute the tribunal which is to determine and settle the questions submitted to it under and by virtue of this agreement. None of the arbitrators so appointed shall be a subject or citizen of any of the signatory powers.

This tribunal shall meet on the first day of September, 1903, and shall render its decision within six months thereafter.

ARTICLE V.

The proceedings shall be carried on in the English language.

Except as herein otherwise stipulated the procedure shall be regulated by the convention of The Hague of July 29, 1899.

ARTICLE VI.

The tribunal shall, subject to the general provision laid down in article 57 of the international convention of July 29, 1899, also decide how, when, and by whom the costs of this arbitration shall be paid.

ARTICLE VII.

Any nation having claims against Venezuela may join as a party in the arbitration provided for by this agreement.

Mr. Bowen to Sir Michael H. Herbert.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 2, 1903.

DEAR SIR MICHAEL: Your amendments leave unchanged about nine-tenths of the articles of my draft protocol. I infer, therefore, that you and your colleagues accept all of my said protocol except the remaining one-tenth. The nine-tenths on which we all agree state substantially and clearly the subjects we decided to submit to The Hague tribunal, and would in themselves constitute a very fair and equitable protocol. Some of your amendments I am willing, however, to accept. I see no objection whatever to leaving out of Article I the words "by reason of the fact that they blockaded the ports of Venezuela so as to compel her to make a settlement with them," nor to substituting the words "divided between the blockading powers on the one hand and the creditor powers on the other hand" for my words "distributed among the said nations." The new paragraph is objectionable, however, that you add to Article I, to wit—

"In deciding the question of preferential or separate treatment to be granted to the blockading powers, the tribunal shall have regard to the resources of Venezuela other than the 30 per cent of the customs revenues so set aside, which may be available for the payment of claims of other powers." and my objections to it are the same as are those I have for your amendment which you offer in the form of an entirely new article, designated by you as Article II, and thus worded:

"If preferential or separate treatment is not given to Great Britain, Germany, and Italy, the tribunal may consider whether any and what compensation should be made by Venezuela out of the 30 per cent of the customs revenues set aside to these powers for the expense which they have incurred in connection with the blockade."

My said objections are these:

I. They constitute new demands or claims, and consequently can have no place in this protocol nor in this controversy.

II. You are precluded from gaining recognition and favor for them by Article V of the British protocol of February 13, 1903, which states that the 30 per cent of the customs revenues of La Guaira and Puerto Cabello are to be assigned for the payment of the British claims specified in Article III of the said protocol and similar claims preferred by other governments, and are to be alienated to no other purpose. It is evident from that agreement that no part of the said 30 per cent can be assigned to pay these new demands or claims.

III. By the terms of the British protocol of February 13, 1903, the only questions that are to be submitted to The Hague tribunal are those relating to the distribution of the said 30 per cent and to preferential or separate treatment. These new demands or claims, therefore, can not be submitted to The Hague tribunal.

IV. Inasmuch as the German and Italian protocols of February 13, 1903, contain the same provisions in regard to this matter as the said British protocol does, and as all three of the said protocols are duly signed and sealed, they must be considered binding on all the parties thereto.

V. The said protocols of February 13, 1903, being binding on all parties thereto, were accepted as one of the bases for negotiating protocols with the other powers having claims against Venezuela. Your new demands or claims must for that reason alone be denied recognition and favor.

In my Article III, I have no objection to your substituting the word "Emperor" for "Czar," and the words "from the members of the permanent court of The Hague three arbitrators to constitute the tribunal which" for the words "three arbitrators to constitute the court that;" nor to your adding the sentence "none of the arbitrators as appointed shall be a subject or citizen of any of the signatory powers."

I should like to amend the first sentence of my Article IV so that after the words "the proceedings shall be carried on in the English language," the words shall appear "but arguments to the tribunal may be made in any other language also."

I trust you will have no objection to that amendment, and I ask that you accept it. I prefer that my Article V should not contain your amendment "subject to the general provision laid down in article 57 of the international convention of July 29, 1899," as I hold that the tribunal ought itself to decide without any restriction how, when, and by whom the costs of the arbitration shall be paid.

As regards your preamble, I have to ask that you insert the words "except as herein otherwise stipulated" between the words "accordance" and "with," in the third line of the third paragraph. The preamble thus amended will be satisfactory to me, and I accept it with the understanding, however, that when the definitive protocol shall have been signed by you and your Italian and German colleagues and myself, the other powers having claims against Venezuela may join as parties to the arbitration, and not until then.

I am, etc.

Sir Michael H. Herbert to Mr. Bowen.

BRITISH EMBASSY, Washington, April 3, 1903.

DEAR MR. BOWEN: Referring to our interview of this morning, I find, on looking up my papers, that I sent a telegram to my Government on February 24 recording a conversation which I had with you on that day when you handed me your draft protocol for reference of the question of preferential treatment to The Hague tribunal. According to this telegram, I informed you that I had no instructions to draw up the protocol here, and that it was possible that Lord Lansdowne would prefer the terms of reference set forth in my note to Mr. Hay of February 6.

You replied that you were ready to accept any alterations which His Majesty's Government might suggest, and you asked me to telegraph the terms of your protocol to Lord Lansdowne, which I accordingly did.

I am, etc.,

MICHAEL H. HERBERT.

Mr. Bowen to Sir Michael H. Herbert.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 3, 1903.

DEAR SIR MICHAEL: In answer to your kind letter of this date, I have the honor to inform you that the most I have ever said to you regarding amendments to either the protocol of the 13th of February or The Hague protocol was that I should be pleased to accept any unimportant amendments your Government may suggest.

You never gave me a copy of your note of February 6 to Mr. Hay, and I have never possessed a copy of it. I can not be bound by what you wrote to Mr. Hay on February 6, for, if I remember rightly, your letter to him of that date was a proposition that the question of preferential treatment be left to the President of the United States to decide. That proposition I opposed the moment your said letter was read to me. There the matter ended; and I am surprised that you should now intimate that I am in any way bound by the terms of a proposition I declined to accept. I am also greatly surprised that you should have interpreted anything I said as indicating my willingness to give you or your allies or your respective Governments carte blanche in regard to amending my protocols; for my principal and openly declared aim has been to prevent any new demands or claims from being brought forward after our agreements have been made. I am very sorry that you should have misunderstood me, and I am,

Yours, very truly,

HERBERT W. BOWEN.

Mr. Bowen to Sir Michael H. Herbert.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 25, 1903.

DEAR SIR MICHAEL: During our negotiations I have been not only willing, but also anxious, to concede to you and your colleagues everything that I thought you could fairly and justly expect of me. In pursuance of that policy I believe that I can now remove the only obstacle that prevents us from signing The Hague protocol. All that is necessary, it would seem, to accomplish that purpose is to insert at the end of Article I before the words "and its decision shall be final" the words "and in making such adjudication the said tribunal shall consider any preferences or pledges of revenue enjoyed by any of the creditor powers."

That concession I consider equitable and also sufficient.

Amending, then, my draft protocol in conformity with our previous agreements and with this concession, I have rewritten the protocol and I send a copy of it to you herewith, trusting that you and your colleagues will consent to sign it with me without delay.

Believe me, etc.,

HERBERT W. BOWEN.

The Hague protocol, amended as stated in the preceding letter.

Mr. Bowen to Baron von Sternburg.

MAY 2, 1903.

"If preferential or separate treatment is not given to the blockading powers the tribunal shall decide how the said revenues shall be distributed among all the creditor powers, and the parties hereto agree that the tribunal in that case shall consider any preference or pledges of revenue enjoyed by any of the creditor powers, and shall so decide the question of distribution that no power shall obtain preferential treatment, and its decision shall be final."

Mr. Bowen to the representatives of the allies.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 8, 1903.

Their Excellencies Signor MAYOR DES PLANCHES, Sir MICHAEL H. HERBERT, and Baron VON STERNBURG.

DEAR SIRS: Our negotiations ended, I thank you for having done all in your power to conclude them expeditiously and fairly.

The work we have done will tend without doubt to promote peace and good will, not only among the governments and peoples we have represented, but also among all mankind.

With kindest and friendliest regards, etc.,

HERBERT W. BOWEN.

AWARD OF THE PERMANENT COURT OF ARBITRATION AT THE HAGUE, A TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION CONSTITUTED IN VIRTUE OF THE PROTOCOLS SIGNED AT WASHINGTON ON MAY 7, 1903, BETWEEN GERMANY, GREAT BRITAIN, AND ITALY AND VENEZUELA.

The tribunal of arbitration, constituted in virtue of the protocols signed at Washington on May 7, 1903, between Germany, Great Britain, and Italy on the one hand and Venezuela on the other hand.

Whereas other protocols were signed to the same effect by Belgium, France, Mexico, the Netherlands, Spain, Sweden and Norway, and the United States of America, on the one hand, and Venezuela, on the other hand;

Whereas all these protocols declare the agreement of all the contracting parties with reference to the settlement of the claims against the Venezuelan Government;

Whereas certain further questions, arising out of the action of the governments of Germany, Great Britain, and Italy concerning the settlement of their claims, were not susceptible of solution by the ordinary diplomatic methods;

Whereas the powers interested decided to solve these questions by submitting them to arbitration, in conformity with the dispositions of the Convention, signed at The Hague on July 29, 1899, for the pacific settlement of international disputes;

Whereas in virtue of Article III of the protocols of Washington of May 7, 1903, His Majesty the Emperor of Russia was requested by all the interested powers to name and appoint from among the members of the permanent court of arbitration of The Hague three arbitrators, who shall form the tribunal of arbitration charged with the solution and settlement of the questions which shall be submitted to it in virtue of the above-named protocols;

Whereas none of the arbitrators thus named could be a citizen or subject of any of the signatory or creditor powers; and whereas the tribunal was to meet at The Hague on September 1, 1903, and render its award within a term of six months;

His Majesty the Emperor of Russia, conforming to the request of all the signatory powers of the above-named protocols of Washington of May 7, 1903, graciously named as arbitrators the following members of the permanent court of arbitration:

His excellency Mr. N. V. Mourawieff, secretary of state of His Majesty the Emperor of Russia, actual privy councillor, minister of justice, and procurator-general of the Russian Empire;

Mr. H. Lammasch, professor criminal and of international law at the University of Vienna, member of the Upper House of the Austrian Parliament; and

His excellency Mr. F. de Martens, doctor of law, privy councillor, permanent member of the council of the Russian ministry of foreign affairs, member of the "Institut de France;"

Whereas by unforeseen circumstances the tribunal of arbitration could not be definitely constituted till October 1, 1903, the arbitrators, at their first meeting on that day, proceeding in conformity with Article XXXIV of the convention of July 29, 1899, to the nomination of the president of the tribunal, elected as such his excellency Mr. Mourawieff, minister of justice;

And whereas in virtue of the protocols of Washington of May 7, 1903, the above-named arbitrators, forming the legally constituted tribunal of arbitration, had to decide, in conformity with Article I of the protocols of Washington of May 7, 1903, the following points: "The question as to whether or not Germany, Great Britain, and Italy are entitled to preferential or separate treatment in the payment of their claims against Venezuela, and its decision shall be final.

"Venezuela having agreed to set aside 30 per cent of the customs revenues of La Guaira and Puerto Cabello for the payment of the claims of all nations against Venezuela, the tribunal at The Hague shall decide how the said revenues shall be divided between the blockading powers on the one hand and the other creditor powers on the other hand, and its decision shall be final.

"If preferential or separate treatment is not given to the blockading powers, the tribunal shall decide how the said revenue shall be distributed among all the creditor powers, and the parties hereto agree that the tribunal, in that case, shall consider, in connection with the payment of the claims out of the 30 per cent, any preference or pledges of revenues enjoyed by any of the creditor powers, and shall accordingly decide the question of distribution, so that no power shall obtain preferential treatment, and its decision shall be final."

Whereas the above-named arbitrators having examined with impartiality and care all the documents and acts presented to the tribunal of arbitration by the agents of the powers interested in this litigation, and having listened with the greatest attention to the oral pleadings delivered before the tribunal by the agents and counsel of the parties to the litigation;

Whereas the tribunal in its examination of the present litigation had to be guided by the principles of international law and the maxims of justice;

Whereas the various protocols signed at Washington since February 13, 1903, and particularly the protocols of May 7, 1903, the obligatory force of which is beyond all doubt, form the legal basis for the arbitral award;

Whereas the tribunal has no competence at all either to contest the jurisdiction of the mixed commissions of arbitration established at Caracas, nor to judge their action;

Whereas the tribunal considers itself absolutely incompetent to give a decision as to the character or nature of the military operations undertaken by Germany, Great Britain and Italy against Venezuela;

Whereas also the tribunal of arbitration was not called upon to decide whether the three blockading powers had exhausted all pacific methods in their dispute with Venezuela in order to prevent the employment of force;

And it can only state the fact that since 1901 the Government of Venezuela categorically refused to submit its dispute with Germany and Great Britain to arbitration, which was proposed several times, and especially by the note of the German Government of July 16, 1901.

Whereas after the war between Germany, Great Britain, and Italy on the one hand, and Venezuela on the other hand, no formal treaty of peace was concluded between the belligerent powers;

Whereas the protocols signed at Washington on February 13, 1903, had not settled all the questions in dispute between the belligerent parties, leaving open in particular the question of the distribution of the receipts of the customs of La Guaira and Puerto Cabello;

Whereas the belligerent powers in submitting the question of preferential treatment in the matter of these receipts to the judgment of the tribunal of arbitration, agreed that the arbitral award should serve to fill up this void and to insure the definite reestablishment of peace between them;

Whereas on the other hand the warlike operations of the three great European powers against Venezuela ceased before they had received satisfaction on all their aims, and on the other hand the question of preferential treatment was submitted to arbitration, the tribunal must recognize in these facts precious evidence of the great principle of arbitration in all phases of international disputes;

Whereas the blockading powers in admitting the adhesion to the stipulations of the protocols of February 13, 1903, of the other powers which had claims against Venezuela, could evidently not have the intention of renouncing either their acquired rights or their actual privileged position;

Whereas the Government of Venezuela in the protocols of February 13, 1903 (Art. I), itself recognizes "in principle the justice of the claims" presented to it by the Governments of Germany, Great Britain, and Italy;

While in the protocol signed between Venezuela and the so-called neutral or pacific powers the justice of the claims of these latter was not recognized in principle;

Whereas the Government of Venezuela until the end of January, 1903, in no way protested against the pretension of the blockading powers to insist on special securities for the settlement of their claims;

Whereas, Venezuela itself during the diplomatic negotiations always made a formal distinction between "the allied powers" and "the neutral or pacific powers;"

Whereas the neutral powers, who now claim before the tribunal of arbitration equality in the distribution of the 30 per cent of the customs receipts of La Guaira and Puerto Cabello, did not protest against the pretensions of the blockading powers to a preferential treatment, either at the moment of the cessation of the war against Venezuela or immediately after the signature of the protocols of February 13, 1903;

Whereas it appears from the negotiations which resulted in the signature of the protocols of February 13 and May 7, 1903, that the German and British Governments constantly insisted on their being given guaranties for "a sufficient and punctual discharge of the obligations" (British memorandum of December 23, 1902, communicated to the Government of the United States of America);

Whereas the plenipotentiary of the Government of Venezuela accepted this reservation on the part of the allied powers without the least protest;

Whereas the Government of Venezuela engaged with respect to the allied powers alone, to offer special guaranties for the accomplishment of its engagements;

Whereas the good faith which ought to govern international relations imposes the duty of stating that the words "all claims" used by the representative of the Government of Venezuela with his conferences with the representatives of the allied powers (statement left in the hands of Sir Michael Herbert by Mr. H. Bowen, of January 23, 1903), could only mean the claims of these latter and could only refer to them;

Whereas the neutral powers having taken no part in the warlike operations against Venezuela, could in some respects profit by the circumstances created by those operations, but without acquiring any new rights;

Whereas the rights acquired by the neutral or pacific powers with regard to Venezuela remain in the future absolutely intact and guaranteed by respective international arrangements;

Whereas in virtue of Article V of the protocols of May 7, 1903, signed at Washington, the tribunal "shall also decide, subject to the general provisions laid down in Article LVII of the international convention of July 29, 1899, how, when, and by whom the costs of this arbitration shall be paid;"

For these reasons the tribunal of arbitration decides and pronounces unanimously that:

1. Germany, Great Britain, and Italy have a right to preferential treatment for the payment of their claims against Venezuela;

2. Venezuela having consented to put aside 30 per cent of the revenues of the customs of La Guaira and Puerto Cabello for the payment of the claims of all nations against Venezuela, the three above-named powers have a right to preference in the payment of their claims by means of these 30 per cent of the receipts of the two Venezuelan ports above mentioned.

3. Each party to the litigation shall bear its own costs and an equal share of the costs of the tribunal.

The Government of the United States of America is charged with seeing to the execution of this latter clause within a term of three months.

Done at The Hague, in the permanent court of arbitration, February 22, 1904.

WARS OF VENEZUELA FROM 1898 TO 1903.—DATA COMPILED BY MANUEL LARDAETA ROSÁLES.

[Translation.]

FIRST NATIONALIST REVOLUTION, IN 1898.

This revolution began on March 2, 1898, with the publication on that day by Gen. José Manuel Hernandez of a proclamation in Queipa, in the State of Carabobo. It extended to all the States of the Republic, and ended with the capture of General Hernandez at La Vega, in the State of Yaracuy, on June 12 of the same year, after the following clashes had been recorded:

Battles .....	3
Skirmishes .....	13
Minor engagements .....	67
Total armed encounters .....	83

Loss of life to the Republic by both parties, 1,800.

In this war Gen. Joaquín Crespo, ex-President of the Republic, fell on the battlefield of Carmelora, on April 16, 1898.

General Hernandez was conveyed a prisoner to San Carlos Fortress, and remained there until May, 1899, when he was set at liberty.

For further information see the accompanying pamphlet, entitled "The Venezuelan War of 1898." <sup>a</sup>

REBELLION OF GEN. RAMÓN GUERRA, IN 1899.

This general, who was President of the State of Guarico, raised the cry of rebellion in that section of the Republic, issuing on February 20, 1899, a proclamation, dated at Cañabozo, calling men to arms to overthrow the government of Gen. Ygnacio Andrade, raising troops in the locality which he governed (but response to this was made in Apure and Cojedes only, until the engagement at "El Morichal de Lambadero," in Guarico, on March 22, 1899, between General Guerra and Gen. Lorenzo Guevara, in which the latter was victorious, the remnants of the revolutionary forces being scattered. The war came to an end in the beginning of April through the departure of the revolutionary leader to Colombia and thence to Curaçao.

In this war the following actions took place:

Battles .....	1
Skirmishes .....	3
Surprises .....	1
Total armed encounters .....	5

In this short war there were more than 200 killed and 250 wounded in the opposing ranks.

REVOLUTION OF THE RESTORATION, IN 1899.

On April 22, 1899, Congress passed an act declaring the immediate autonomy of the twenty States of the Republic, which was put into effect by President Andrade on the 27th of the same month.

This measure, which could not legally take effect until the next term, from: 1902 to 1906, furnished its standard to the revolution commanded by Gen. Cipriano Castro, who advanced to overthrow the administration of Andrade.

To this end General Castro, who was then at his country seat at Bella Vista, near Rosario de Cúcuta, in the neighboring Republic of Colombia, heedful of the plan which was being elaborated, launched himself into the conflict, invading the territory of the State of Táchira, accompanied by 60 men, on the night of May 23, 1899; and on the same day which marked his first victory, at Tonono, he issued a manifesto at Independencia, or Capacho Nuevo, taking for the standard of his armed movement the restoration of the constitution which had been violated by the high powers of the nation.

General Castro, after sundry notable feats of arms, advanced upon Mérida, where he gained another complete victory, and afterwards upon Trujillo, whose towns he threatened on the way to Barquisimeto, where he gained a victory at El Paraparo, which made him master of a large body of infantry and artillery and gave him possession of the west.

He then continued his march in the neighborhood of the towns of Barquisimeto and Yaracuy until he gained the victory at Nirgua, which placed him in a position to descend upon Carabobo and open the battle of Tocuyito on September 14, which gave him possession of Valencia, and in which action he had 1,500 men, against 6,000 in the army of General Andrade, commanded by Gens. Diego Bautista Ferrer and Antonio Fernandez.

In the course of this war Andrade raised another army of 4,000 men, in command of Gen. Luciano Mendoza, and whilst General Castro was reorganizing his forces to commence the final operations against the capital, other local movements arose in the States of Caracas, Barcelona, and Cumaná.

Whilst matters were at this pass negotiations were opened between Generals Castro and Andrade, but the latter, without awaiting their definite result, abandoned Caracas on the morning of October 20, and taking the road to the port of La Guaira, he there disbanded the 1,000 men who remained faithful to him (for he was no longer obeyed by the 4,000 under Mendoza). He departed from Barlovento for the Antilles.

Thereupon Gen. Victor Rodriguez, president of the Government council, assumed the executive power on the same day and named a ministry.

Generals Rodriguez, Mendoza, and Castro having come to terms, the triumph of the revolution of the restoration was complete, and its leader made his entrance into Caracas at 6.30 o'clock in the afternoon of October 22, 1899, assuming power on the following day as supreme chief of the Republic and appointing a cabinet.

In this war the following actions took place:

Battles .....	3
Sieges .....	1
Skirmishes.....	26
Minor engagements.....	12

Total armed encounters.....	42
-----------------------------	----

The killed on both sides numbered 3,500, with as many more wounded.

SECOND NATIONALIST REVOLUTION, IN 1899 AND 1900.

On the day after Gen. Cipriano Castro had made his triumphal entrance into Caracas (October 23, 1899) he set at liberty the political prisoners whom the government of Andrade had placed in durance, and among them Gen. José Manuel Hernandez, leader of the first nationalist revolution.

On the same day General Castro assumed the power and named his cabinet, appointing Hernandez as minister of public works, which appointment the latter neither accepted nor declined, and at daybreak on October 27, or three days after having been set at liberty, he left Caracas by stealth, taking with him a division commanded by Gen. Samuel Acosta, companion in arms of Hernandez in the first nationalist revolution, and following first the El Valle and then the La Victoria road, he returned by way of the valleys of the Tuy, augmenting his forces with other troops which joined him on the way.

On the next day, October 28, there was circulated in Caracas a proclamation signed by Hernandez and dated on the 26th at Las Tejerias, through which place he appears to have meditated directing his march, calling upon the country to subvert the government of General Castro, and at the same time a note declining the office of minister of public works.

Pursued immediately from two directions, he was overtaken on October 30 at San Casimiro, where he was routed in the night by Gen. Natividad Mendoza, taking the Guarico road, and being twice come up with and engaged; but he then took the road to Cojedes, where he was awaited by various bodies of troops who were loyal to him, and succeeded in gathering a force of some 5,000 men, owing to the fact that the government of Castro had not only to cope with the revolution under consideration, but also with an insurrection under Gen. Antonio Paredes in Puerto Cabello, of which we shall speak hereafter.

At length, on December 14 and 15, 1899, the battle of Tacuyito was fought, in which Gens. Natividad Mendoza, Esteban C. Cardona, and Victor Rodriguez defeated Hernandez, who fell back upon Cojedes, where he was put to flight by Gen. Victor Rodriguez, in the place called Mata de Agua, returning in the direction of Portuguesa, Barinas, and Apure, crossing the river of this name, and falling upon Guayana, where he was defeated by Gen. José Manuel Paredes on March 21 and 22, 1900, in the battle of Manocal.

Hernandez then crossed the Orinoco and made his way to Guarico and thence to Cojedes, where he was captured, in the place called Tierra Negra, on May 27, entering Caracas a prisoner on the 31st of the same month, and was conducted to the rotunda and later to the fortress of San Carlos, where he remained a captive until the 11th of December, 1902, when he was set at liberty and came to Caracas to parley with President Castro.

In this campaign the actions in all parts of the Republic were as follows:

Battles .....	3
Skirmishes .....	53
Minor engagements .....	37
Total armed encounters .....	93

The losses on both sides amounted to 3,100 killed and 1,648 wounded.

INSURRECTION OF GEN. ANTONIO PAREDES IN PUERTO CABELLO IN 1899.

When General Andrade abdicated the public power on October 20, 1899, Gen. Antonio Paredes was military governor of Puerto Cabello and its fortifications, and entered into negotiations with General Castro on the inauguration of the latter's government, signing an agreement on November 3 of the same year, which instrument Paredes repudiated on the 7th because it had been signed by Gen. Benjamín Ruiz, who at that time signed himself Rafael Bolívar, the former being his true name.

Paredes fortified the town completely, and was attacked by an army under Gens. Ramón Guerra and Julio Sarria Hurtado, who engaged him victoriously on November 11 and 12, 1899.

By sea the ships of the National navy, in command of Gen. Carlos E. Echeverría, also attacked him in the town, and four steamers, respectively Dutch, English, German, and American, lay in the harbor witnessing the assault.

Paredes was taken prisoner and was brought to Caracas and lodged in the Rotunda, and thence was conveyed to the Fortress of San Carlos, where he was confined until December 11, 1902, when he was set at liberty because of the international difficulty.

The losses on both sides in Puerto Cabello amounted to 220, including a number of women and children, who were killed by the shells of the national fleet.

REVOLT OF GEN. CELESTINO PERAZA IN THE STATE OF GUARICO IN 1900.

Early in December, 1900, Gen. Celestino Peraza left Caracas bound for eastern Guarico, and on the 14th of the same month he rose in revolt at the place called La Mercedes, near the town of Chaguaramas, where he issued a proclamation inciting an insurrection against the government of General Castro.

Pursued at first by the forces of Gen. Aristides Fandeo and later by those of Gen. Carlos Echeverría, he was compelled to disband the few troops he had collected, as no response was made in other parts of the Republic, and made off toward the Colombian frontier, whence he returned in the direction of Ciudad Bolívar, where he was captured and conveyed to Fort Libertador, in which he was confined until the incident with the Allied Powers in December, 1902, when he was set at liberty.

In this revolt there were no engagements beyond two light exchanges of fire.

REVOLT OF GEN. PEDRO JULIAN ACOSTA IN THE EAST IN 1900.

On October 24, 1900, Gen. Pedro Julian Acosta raised the standard of revolt in Yrapa, and after a number of engagements in the States of Cumaná and Margarita the movement was put down early in February, 1901, Acosta falling a prisoner, and he was on the point of being shot in Carúpano.

This general held a military office on the Parian coast, and the revolution was directed from Trinidad by divers leaders who had taken refuge there.

Acosta was brought to Caracas and confined in the Rotunda, and thence was conveyed to the Fortress of San Carlos, where he still remains a prisoner.

In this revolt the following engagements took place:

In Cumaná .....	5
In Margarita .....	4
Total armed encounters .....	9

Losses on both sides, 360 killed.

INVASION OF GEN. CARLOS RÁNGEL GARBIRAS IN 1901.

In July, 1901, Gen. Carlos Rángel Garbiras had for sometime been harboring in Colombian territory, lying in wait for an opportunity to invade the country in the character of a revolutionist, and as Gen. José Manuel Hernandez was a prisoner in the Fortress of San Carlos, and in his stead Rángel Garbiras had been named provisional leader of the Nationalist party, he united a considerable force of Venezuelans and troops of the regular army of the neighboring Republic of Colombia (whose Government aided him) amounting to more than 4,000 soldiers, with which he invaded Táchira by way of Encontrados and by the road to the city of San Cristóbal.

In Encontrados a light clash occurred on July 28, 1901, the invading forces being commanded by Gens. Juan Marquez and José Trinidad Zuleta, and those of the Government by Gen. Regulo Olivares, which latter obtained the advantage, capturing arms, ammunition, flags, and prisoners, very few falling on either side, owing to the light encounter.

In San Cristóbal, the capital of the State of Táchira, a great battle was fought with the main body of the invading army, commanded by Rángel Garbiras in person, from July 28, at 2 p. m., until 4 p. m. on the 29th, victory resting upon the national arms under Gen. Celestino Castro, president of the State, and commander-in-chief of the army by appointment of the President, Gen. Cipriano Castro.

In this engagement 800 fell in the invading army and 350 in that of the Government, which captured from the enemy arms, ammunition, flags, prisoners, etc. Among the killed on the Government's side were several important officers.

On the 8th of August following another armed force invaded Venezuela by way of San Faustino, but was repulsed by Gen. Rubén Cardenas at Las Cumbres.

Finally, in February of 1902, Rángel Garbiras, with other leaders and 400 soldiers, including a Colombian line battalion, once more invaded the country by way of San Antonio, as at the same time did other officers from different points, but they were all defeated in three bodies, losing arms, ammunition, flags, prisoners, and a number of dead. There also occurred the horrible murder of Col. José Miguel Crespo, his son, a nephew, and ten other companions, all of the invading army, who were slaughtered by their own comrades.

Owing to the international difficulty between Venezuela and England, Germany, and Italy, Rángel Garbiras issued a manifesto on January 9, 1903, by which it appears that he has abandoned his pretensions, but he remains a refugee in Colombia.

Gen. Horacio Ducharme, Nationalist leader in the east, was the only one who answered there the call of Rángel Garbiras, coming from Trinidad to the Parian coast, but, being hard pressed, he was forced to reembark. Ducharme issued a proclamation, dated at Caño Colorado, September 30, 1901, and his brother, Alejandro, was also in revolt during this movement until the beginning of November, when that section of the country was pacified.

INSURRECTION OF GEN. RAFAEL MONTILLA IN 1901.

In the beginning of October, 1901, Gen. Rafael Montilla rose in revolt within the jurisdiction of the State of Lara and collected a number of troops, with which he occupied Carora, where he was attacked by Gen. Rafael Gonzalez Pacheco, president of the State, who defeated him on October 25, Montilla losing 32 killed and as many more in wounded, and the Government 42 in killed and wounded.

Montilla took refuge in the mountains of Guaito, where he lay until the revolution headed by Matos gained volume, when he joined it and followed its fortunes until the end.

REVOLUTIONARY DESIGNS OF GEN. JUAN PIETRI IN 1901 AND 1902.

At the end of October, 1901, Gen. Juan Pietri left Caracas secretly, bound for La Sierra de Carabobo, with subversive designs against the government of Gen. Cipriano Castro, a proclamation of the said Pietri appearing in Caracas, dated at La Sierra de Carabobo, where it appears to have been his purpose to sound the note of insurrection.

This proclamation was dated October 22, 1901, at said Sierra de Carabobo, but the National Government being appraised of his plot, he was pursued and captured incontinently, and was brought to Caracas, where he was set at liberty in the Plaza Bolívar, while the band of revolutionists on which he had counted for the execution of his plan was routed at Guigue, in the State of Carabobo.

Pietri remained in his house, but toward the end of December of the same year he again secretly left Caracas in a hostile attitude, it is not known whether as leader for his own account or to join the marauding bands of the so-called Revolution of Liberation commanded by Gen. Manuel A. Matos; but he was captured by a number of citizens on the night of December 31, 1901, at La Toma, near Antímano, several of his companions being wounded, and was conveyed to Caracas and thence to the Fortress of San Carlos, where he was confined until December 11, 1902, when he was set at liberty by reason of the incident with the Allied Powers of England, Germany, and Italy, and returned to his house, where he still remains.

SO-CALLED REVOLUTION OF LIBERATION FROM 1901 TO 1908.

On November 21, 1901, the minister of the interior announced in a circular that for days the Government had been aware of the existence of a revolutionary committee in Caracas, as a result of which various citizens were arrested, and also Gen. Ramón Guerra, minister of war and navy, who was at the hot baths at Agua Caliente, all of whom had acknowledged the authority of Gen. Manuel Antonio Matos, who from Paris was stirring up the insurrection and providing means for same—over which he was to preside as chief—uniting the disaffected Liberal elements and those of the Nationalist party, whose leader, Gen. José Manuel Hernández, was a prisoner in the Fortress of San Carlos, to which Gen. Guerra was also conveyed, and in which he is still confined.

On December 19, 1901, Gen. Luciano Mendoza, provisional president of the State of Aragua, whose term of office was expiring and who was about to assume the constitutional presidency of Carabobo, to which his word was pledged, departed secretly from La Victoria. He went to Villa de Cura, collecting on the way some 300 men, whom he had caused to be in readiness for insurrection, counting upon the various uprisings which were to occur on that same day in Carabobo, Aragua, Guarico, Cojedes, Lara, and Coro, and further relying upon the German railway to aid him by delaying the dispatching of troops from Caracas in his pursuit.

The Government sent after him a detachment under Gen. J. V. Gomez, who beset him all the way to Guarico and Cojedes, finally dispersing his forces. Mendoza was compelled to remain in hiding, after losing his troops and the few supplies he carried.

At the end of December of the same year a proclamation of Gen. Manuel Antonio Matos was circulated, dated on board the steamer Libertador, formerly the Ban Rich, which was cruising in Venezuelan waters and which was declared a pirate by the national Government by decree of December 30.

There were further defeated and destroyed the guerillas of Gen. Antonio Fernández in Aragua and the rebels in Coro, who lost everything.

Early in January, 1902, bodies of rebels began to rise in the East, relying on the support of the steamer of Matos, which was sailing the neighboring seas, aided by the authorities of the island of Trinidad.

Matters being in this situation on February 7, 1902, the steamer of Matos went into action with the national steamer Crespo, which latter was defeated in the waters of Cumarobo and reduced to a condition of uselessness by Matos himself, who was on board the Libertador aiding the uprisings in Coro, where Gen. Gregorio S. Riera landed at the point called Sauca, issuing a proclamation on February 14, and presently there begun a series of combats between the troops of Riera and those of the Government under Gen. Ramón Ayala, to whose assistance came Gen. Juan V. Gomez, Second Vice-President of the Republic and national delegate to the western States, who annihilated the rebels in Coro.

By March the east of the Republic was in arms in support of the revolution, with veteran troops commanded by Gen. Domingo Monagas in Barcelona and Gen. Nicolás Rolando in Maturín and Cumaná; and in that section were fought the tremendous battles of La Sileta in Barcelona, on March 27, in which Domingo Monagas defeated Gen. Martín Marcano, of San Agustín del Pilar, on April 2, in which Rolando was completely victorious; of Guanaguana, on April 22, in which Rolando routed the military expedition to the east conducted by Gen. Calixto Escalante, who lost everything, himself and many other officers of the Government falling prisoners. Rolando then occupied Carúpano, where, on the 6th of May, he fought a furious battle with Gen. Juan V. Gomez, who had arrived at that port with the national fleet. Gomez was wounded, and lost a large number of troops, and was forced to retire.

Shortly afterwards General Matos reached Carupano and commenced his march toward the center by way of Maturín and Carupano.

By this time Gen. Amabili Solagnie had acquired strength in the States of Lara and Yaracuy, and was winning over the southwestern States to the insurrectionary movement, coming in touch with Gen. Rafael Montilla, who had reappeared in his old haunts in the State of Lara, and with Gens. Luciano Mendoza and Francisco Batalla, who had also appeared again in the west.

On his march toward the center, Matos learned of the occupation of Ciudad Bolívar, through the treason of Col. Ramón Farreras, who defeated Gen. Julio Sarria Hurtado on May 23, gaining possession of the State of Guayana, in which serious engagements were fought at Ciudad Bolívar, San Felix, and other points, the revolution being uniformly victorious.

By now the guerillas near La Guaira, in the valleys of the Tuy and in Guarico, had been reorganized and awaited the coming of the army of the east, while in Coro General Riera obtained decisive victories, which made him master of the State, where Gen. Ramón Ayala was taken prisoner, being later conveyed a captive to the center and thereafter to Barcelona.

While these events were taking place, General Castro dispatched Gen. José Antonio Velutini to Barcelona at the head of troops to check the advance of Matos's army, and a fierce battle was fought at Aragua de Barcelona on June 30 and July 1, between the army of the east, commanded by Rolando, and the Government forces under Gen. M. Castro, the latter being defeated.

Matters being at this pass, General Castro intrusted the executive power to the Second Vice-President, Gen. Juan Vicente Gomez, and set out for the east of the Republic, but concluded that it would be better to begin operations in the center, where the army of the east was advancing, and to deal with the fresh uprisings in the Federal district and the State of Miranda.

On August 3 General Castro again set out with a considerable army for San Casimero, where he was joined by the Trujillo division, under Gen. Leopoldo Baptista, and other bodies from the Tuy, Matos being now at Orituco with more than 6,000 soldiers, beginning operations against Guarico and Aragua.

General Castro then moved rapidly to Cua, whence, owing to the defection of the troops under Gen. P. Perez Crespo, he removed to Ocumare, where he remained until the beginning of September, when he returned by the right flank to Valencia to meet the enemy in the west, who had there obtained victories which gave him the control of Coro, Barquisimeto, Cojedes, Portuguesa, Yaracuy—all this after severe encounters in Tinaquillo and its neighborhood, about the middle of September, with the revolutionary army, which was endeavoring to effect a junction with that of the east advancing under Matos. To oppose this, General Castro marched by way of Villa de Cura, and succeeded in engaging the army of the west at Masparo, on the road to Guarico, but this did not prevent the revolutionary armies from uniting their entire forces at San Sebastián.

At this juncture Castro fell back upon La Victoria and awaited the approach of the great hostile army which concentrated at that point and attacked the place, which was heroically defended by the Government forces from October 13 to November 2, when the army of Matos withdrew from the field, each group retiring toward its former positions and Matos taking passage for Curaçao.

This long and bloody conflict cost the revolution more than 1,500 in killed and wounded and the Government as many more, the former army having contained upwards of 10,000 men and that of Castro 5,500.

This disaster led many of the revolutionists to surrender themselves and enabled the Government to recover the coast and interior towns which it had lost.

While the revolution was in process of reorganization there occurred the incident with the Germans and English which induced General Castro to set the political prisoners at liberty and part of the Nationalist element to return to the ways of peace.

By the end of January the revolution had effected a reorganization in the following manner: In Orituco and Barlovento General Rolando with a considerable force; in Guarico Gen. Antonio Fernandez; in Coro Gen. Gregorio S. Riera; in Barquisimeto and Yaracuy Generals Penaloza, Solagnie, and Montilla.

The conflict with the foreign powers having been brought to a close on February 14, the revolution once more broke out, thus: The troops in Guarico were scattered as the result of a tireless pursuit and the return to peace of the Nationalists who accompanied them; Rolando came up to the gates of Caracas with a large army, but was forced to withdraw to a farther point by the action at Tacarigua, which caused him to lose his rear positions; the revolutionary forces obtained important victories in the west, etc.

At this juncture Gen. Juan Vicente Gomez marched to Barlovento and met the enemy in the great battle of El Guapo on April 13, 14, and 15, one of the most bloody engagements in the civil wars of Venezuela. Rolando retired by way of Barcelona and thence to Guayana, the State of Miranda being now free from disorder, as the rest of the rebels in the Tuy surrendered themselves. Matos, who had been sojourning in Curaçao, believing that Rolando had been victorious at El Guapo, landed on the eastern coast of Coro and joined the revolutionary forces in the west.

Then General Gomez, moving his troops by way of Tucacas with those of Gen. Pedro Linares by way of Yaracuy, and the contingent saved by Gen. Gonzales Pacheco in the State of Lara, successfully attacked the enemy along the line of the railroad, at Barquisimeto, and finally at Palo Seco, the fragments of the rebel armies in Coro, Barquisimeto, and Yaracuy melting away, while Matos, Riera, Solagnie, and others embarked for Curaçao, where they arrived on the 9th of June, and on the 11th Matos issued a manifesto declaring the war at an end.

This great revolution, which more than any other has desolated the country, was of eighteen months' duration and cost the nation more than 12,000 lives.
